NOTES ON E-COURSEBOOK

This E-Coursebook is divided into 3 Volumes, each covering 2 credits of material in a standard law school course. The two Volumes here are Volume 1: THE STRUCTURAL CONSTITUTION: SEPARATION OF POWERS AND FEDERALISM & Volume 2: INDIVIDUAL ECONOMIC, CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS IN THE CONSTITUTION EXCLUSIVE OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT. Volume 3 is entitled: THE FIRST AMENDMENT, and is available at: http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials. Each Volume comprises 14 Chapters, with each Chapter representing material typically addressed in a 2-hour class session.

Within cases, case names are italicized when used in a sentence. All citations to cases, and citation references (such as “id.” or “see, e.g.”) are non-italicized. As is typical in Coursebooks, no indication is given when paragraphs have been excised from Court opinions. Relevant footnotes in cases are moved directly into the case text and indicated as such. Occasionally, “[Ed.:]” is used when material is added into a case reflecting a comment from the authors, not from the Court. The standard phrase now used at the end of Court opinions (“It is so ordered.”) typically is removed.

* Chief Justice Rutledge returned to the Court after serving previously as an Associate Justice. Chief Justice Hughes returned to the Court after serving previously as an Associate Justice.

 Chief Justice White was confirmed as Chief Justice, moving from his existing position as an Associate Justice.

 To prevent President Johnson from filling the position left by Justice Catron’s death in 1865, or filling any other vacancies that might occur, such as Justice Wayne’s death in 1867, Congress reduced the size of the Court from 10 Justices to 7 in 1866. In 1869, once Johnson was no longer President, Congress increased the size of the Court back to 9. In these moves, Justice Catron’s position 8 is typically viewed as removed; Justice Davis’ position 9 is renumbered as position 8, and filled by Justice Harlan on Davis’ death; Justice Field’s position 10 is renumbered as position 9. Justice Bradley’s appointment is typically viewed as recreating Wayne’s seat.

* Make-up of the Court during the Spring of 1937, during the “Court-packing Plan” and Justice Roberts’ “switch in time.”

 Chief Justice Stone was confirmed as Chief Justice, moving from his existing position as an Associate Justice. Chief Justice Rehnquist was confirmed as Chief Justice, moving from his existing position as an Associate Justice.

* Justice Black replaced Justice Van Devanter at the end of that Term of the Court.

 When Chief Justice Warren announced an intention to retire from the Court in 1968, President Johnson's nomination of Associate Justice Fortas to replace him was eventually withdrawn. President Nixon successfully nominated Judge Warren Burger. After his nomination to be Chief Justice failed, Justice Fortas retired in 1969, but his position was not filed by Judge Blackmun until 1970, following the failed nominations of Judge Clement Haynesworth and Judge G. Harrold Carswell. Justice Powell resigned at the end of the Court's Term in 1987, but Justice Kennedy was not confirmed until 1988, following the failed nominations of Judge Robert Bork and Judge Douglas Ginsburg.

 Justice Scalia died on February 13, 2016. Judge Merrick Garland's nomination by President Obama was not considered by the Republican-controlled Senate.

* Following the election of President Trump, his nomination of Judge Neil Gorsuch was confirmed by the Senate and he was sworn in on April 10, 2017.

 Justice Kennedy resigned effective July 31, 2018. President Trump nominated Judge Brett Kavanaugh. After a 51-49 vote, he was sworn in on October 6, 2018.

The listing of “positions” of Supreme Court Justices used here is the standard account. The ordering of positions 1-6 in this Table conforms to the date when each of the initial Justices were confirmed by the Senate and thus received their commissions, consistent with the Judiciary Act of 1789, which provided that “the associate justices shall have precedence according to the date of their commissions, or when the commissions of two or more of them bear date on the same day, according to their respective ages.”

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

Section 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2. [1] The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

[2] No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

[3] Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made with three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States.
States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

[4] When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

[5] The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Section 3.  [1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

[2] Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the Second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

[3] No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

[4] The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

[5] The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

[6] The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

[7] Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust, or Profit under the United States; but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment, and Punishment, according to Law.
Section 4.  [1] The Times, Place and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

[2] The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section 5.  [1] Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

[2] Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

[3] Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

[4] Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, not to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section 6.  [1] The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

[2] No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

Section 7.  [1] All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

[2] Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two third of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent together with the Objections, to the other House, but which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall become a Law, in like Manner as if he signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return in which Case it shall not be a Law.

[3] Every Order, Resolution, or Vote, to Which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section 8.
[1] The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

[2] To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

[3] To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

[4] To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

[5] To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

[6] To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

[7] To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

[8] To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

[9] To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

[10] To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offenses against the Law of Nations;
[11] To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

[12] To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

[13] To provide and maintain a Navy;

[14] To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

[15] To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

[16] To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

[17] To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cessation of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislatures of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings; – And

[18] To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

Section 9. [1] The Migration or Importation of Such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

[2] The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

[3] No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

[4] No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

[5] No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.
[6] No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another; nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another;

[7] No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account on the Receipts and Expenditures on all public Money shall be published from time to time.

[8] No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

Section 10. [1] No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post factor Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

[2] No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controll of the Congress.

[3] No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

Section 1. [1] The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

[2] Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

[3] The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greater Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

[4] The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

[5] No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

[6] In case of the removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may be Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

[7] The President shall, as stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

[8] Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation: “I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.”

Section 2. [1] The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.
[2] He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law; but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

[3] The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Section 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executes, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

Section 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behavior, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Section 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority; – to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls; – to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction, – to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party; – to Controversies between two or more States; – between a State and Citizens of another State; – between Citizens of different States; – between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under the Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens, or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.
The trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Section 3. [1] Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or, in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses of the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attained.

ARTICLE IV

Section 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section 2. [1] The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

[2] A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

[3] No person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section 3. [1] New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one of the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI

[1] All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

[2] This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judge in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

[3] The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever by required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

Done in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth.

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS, AND RATIFIED
BY THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION

Amendment I [1791]

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Amendment II [1791]

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendment III [1791]

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time or war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Amendment IV [1791]

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons of things to be seized.

Amendment V [1791]

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Amendment VI [1791]

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.
Amendment VII [1791]

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right or trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Amendment VIII [1791]

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Amendment IX [1791]

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment X [1791]

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Amendment XI [1798]

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

Amendment XII [1804]

The Electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all person voted for as President, and of all person voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; – the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; – The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member of members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President; – The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

Amendment XIII [1865]

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Amendment XIV [1868]

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may be a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.
Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Amendment XV [1870]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Amendment XVI [1913]

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Amendment XVII [1913]

[1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

[2] When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

[3] This amendment shall not be construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it become valid as part of the Constitution.

Amendment XVIII [1919]

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof, from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

    Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Amendment XIX [1920]

[1] The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

[2] Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Amendment XX [1933]

    Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

    Section 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

    Section 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If the President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

    Section 4. The Congress may be law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons form whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.
Section 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

Section 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

Amendment XXI [1933]

Section 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

Section 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Amendment XXII [1951]

Section 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who had held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Amendment XXIII [1961]

Section 1. The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of President and Vice President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representative in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous state; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the states, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice President, to be electors appointed by a state; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

Amendment XXIV [1964]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll or other tax.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Amendment XXV [1967]

Section 1. In case of removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

Section 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

Section 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

Section 4. Whenever the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may be law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office of Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may be law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

Amendment XXVI [1971]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

Amendment XXVII [1992]

No law, varying the compensation for the services of Senators or Representatives, shall take effect, until an election for Representatives shall have intervened.

§ 1.1 Introduction to Constitutional Law Decisionmaking

1. Judicial Decisionmaking Styles

Constitutional law in the United States is understood and studied today primarily in terms of interpretations and applications of the United States Constitution by the United States Supreme Court. Other government officials and lower courts make initial determinations on constitutionality. But the final and authoritative say is that of the Supreme Court when deciding cases that involve judicial review of the constitutionality of governmental action. For this reason, the study of constitutional law is centered upon the study of leading cases decided by a majority of Justices on the Supreme Court.

In deciding these cases, different Justices have adopted different styles of interpretation to resolve the issues presented in the cases. The fundamental theme of this Coursebook is that four basic styles of interpretation have characterized the approach of Supreme Court Justices to the interpretation and application of the Constitution during five basic eras of constitutional interpretation. The four styles of interpretation are natural law, formalism, Holmesian, and instrumentalism. The five eras are represented in Table 1:

Eras of United States Constitutional Interpretation

The foundation for the four styles of interpretation are judicial views on the nature of law (analytic or functional) and on the role of court (positivist or normative). Concerning the nature of law, two main approaches have appeared in jurisprudential writings. These two approaches differ over whether law should be judged primarily in terms of its success in developing a set of logically consistent, universal rules. Under one approach, law is seen as a primarily a set of rules and principles whose application is guided by an analytic methodology of logic and reason. This has been called the analytic, or conceptualist, approach. Alternatively, law can be seen as ultimately to be judged not in terms of logical consistency, but as a means to some social end through a pragmatic or functional treatment of rules and principles. This has been called the functional, or pragmatic, approach. A similar discussion of the difference between an analytic and functional approach is as follows:

[The functional approach] views law not as a set of general axioms or conceptions from which legal personnel may formally derive particular decisions [the analytic approach], but as a body of practical tools for serving substantive goals. Second, [the functional approach] conceives law not as an autonomous and self-sufficient system [the analytic approach], but as merely a means to achieve external goals that are derived from sources outside the law, including the dictates of democratic processes and the “policy sciences.” Third, [the functional approach] assumes that a particular use of law cannot be a self-justifying “end in itself.” Uses of law can be justified only by reference to whatever values they fulfill. Finally, the law is considered to serve generally instrumental values rather than intrinsic ones. That is, law’s function is to satisfy democratically expressed wants and interests, whatever they may be (within constitutional limits).

1 See generally Ernest J. Weinrib, Legal Formalism: On the Immanent Rationality of Law, 97 Yale L.J. 949, 955 (1988) (“[L]egal ordering [under an analytic approach] is not the collective pursuit of a desirable purpose. Instead, it is the specification of the norms and principles immanent to juridically intelligible relationships.”).

2 Id. at 964-65 (“The dominant tendency today [under a functional approach] is to look upon the content of law from the standpoint of some external ideal that the law is to enforce or make authoritative. Implicit in contemporary scholarship is the idea that the law embodies or should embody some goal (e.g., wealth maximization, market deterrence, liberty, utility, solidarity) that can be specified apart from law and can serve as the standard by which law is to be assessed. Thus law is regarded as an instrument for forwarding some independently desirable purpose given to it from the outside.”). See generally Felix S. Cohen, Transcendental Nonsense and the Functional Approach, 35 Colum. L. Rev. 809, 840 (1935) (“If the functionalists are correct, the meaning of a definition is found in its consequences.”).

Concerning the nature of the judicial task, any judge must ask whether judicial decisionmaking should be separable from morals or social values, i.e., should judges view law solely as a body of rules and principles from which legal conclusions are derived -- the positivist assumption -- or should judges view law as a body of rules and principles testable by reference to some external standard of rightness, some social or moral value -- law as normative or prescriptive, not descriptive. On the one hand, a judge could aim at producing decisions and opinions that are "good law" in the narrow sense of being clear, certain, and predictable, and unquestionably within the legitimate power of the court. Such judges are typically described as following a "positivist" approach to judicial decisionmaking. As has been noted: "If one has a positivist view of legal identification, pursuant to which items of law can be 'recognized' without satisfying a moral standard, . . . then one whose job partly involves law application could do that part of the job without having to engage in any moral reasoning whatsoever. . . . As a result, positivist judges, were they so inclined, could in some systems get away with an amoral conception of their task . . . ."\(^4\)

In contrast, a judge could aim at producing law and applications of law that accord with certain moral principles embedded in the society's legal and moral culture. Judges adopting this more "normative" perspective view the judge's role as requiring the judge to give some weight to the moral insights and traditions that lie behind legal rules and that may develop over time. As Professor Ronald Dworkin has noted, "[W]hat an individual is entitled to have, in civil society, depends upon both the practice and the justice of its political institutions."\(^5\)

Given these considerations, the four styles can be summarized as follows: formalism (analytic positivism); Holmesian (functional positivism); instrumentalism (functional normative); and natural law (analytic normative). These relationships are represented in Table 2:

As noted, the positivist view is that judges may only discover, declare, and apply the law as it already exists. For analytic positivists (formalists), only the logic of existing concepts controls; for functional positivists (Holmesians), both the logic and purpose of existing concepts control, as functional jurists are sensitive to the purposes of legal rules as part of their pragmatic means-end reasoning. The final cause or end of the judicial task for positivists is whether the law is traceable to an authoritative source. Any departure from this view represents for positivists a form of illegitimate law-making.

In contrast to the positivist view, the judicial task for judges who adopt the normative view includes background norms that infuse existing common-law, statutory, and constitutional enactments. The normative view is that judges have the power to make law based on these norms, and regularly do so, covertly as well as overtly. For analytic normative theorists (natural law), these background norms are limited to logical elaboration of background moral principles; for functional normative theorists (instrumentalists), these background norms can include both principles and policies.

Professor Ronald Dworkin has noted a difference between arguments of principle and arguments of policy. He has stated:

I call a “policy” . . . a statement that sets out a goal to be reached, generally an improvement in some economic, political, or social feature of the community. . . . I call a “principle” a standard that is to be observed, not because it will advance or secure an economic, political, or social situation deemed desirable, but because it is a requirement of justice or fairness or some other dimension of morality. Thus the standard that automobile accidents are to be decreased is a policy, and the standard that no man may profit by his own wrong is a principle.6

In terms of what kinds of background considerations judges may use to resolve “hard cases,” the functional instrumentalist approach is willing to consider both arguments of principle and arguments of policy, with an emphasis on functional consideration of social policy calculations. In contrast, under a natural law theory, judges in considering background considerations should limit themselves to reasoned, or analytic, balancing of moral principles.

A short-hand reference for the major differences among the four interpretation styles is the following: formalist judges tend to emphasize the logical or literal elaboration of existing legal categories; Holmesian judges add to this focus a functional emphasis on deference to legislative and executive action, which typically reflects the purposes intended to be advanced by the existing legal categories; natural law judges add to this positivist focus on the logic and purpose of existing legal categories a normative emphasis on just evolution of the law through considering background moral principles embedded in the law and reasoned elaboration of judicial precedents; instrumentalist judges add to this more analytic just evolution of the law an emphasis on functional case-by-case consideration of social policies embedded in the law, which become particularly relevant when existing legal categories yield indeterminate results.

These differences can be summarized in a more detailed version of Table 2:

2. United States Supreme Court Decisionmaking Styles

With regard to United States Supreme Court decisionmaking, there is a gradual transformation today from precedents and law designed by Justices who adhered to one style of constitutional interpretation—the instrumentalist, policy-driven, perspective that flourished on the Supreme Court in the 1960s, and predominated generally on the Court from 1954-86 — to law designed by a contemporary group of non-instrumentalist Justices.

In contrast to the instrumentalist approach, popular usage is that a non-instrumentalist judge rejects policy-driven judicial activism and will not legislate from the bench. Instead, the judge adheres to a policy of “strict construction” of the “plain meaning of text” consistent with the “original intent” of a doctrine’s framers and ratifiers. A more precise formulation would note that there are three different concepts used in the preceding sentence – plain meaning of text, strict construction, and original intent – and thus at least three different kinds of non-instrumentalist judges.\footnote{See, e.g., Morell E. Mullins, Sr., \textit{Coming to Terms with Strict and Liberal Construction}, 64 Alb. L. Rev. 9 (2000) (contrasting “strict construction”; “plain meaning”; and “original intent”).}

One kind of non-instrumentalist judge focuses on a doctrine’s text, whether in terms of the literal text of prior judicial decisions for common-law decisionmaking, the plain meaning of a statute for statutory construction, or the plain meaning of the text of the Constitution for constitutional interpretation. Since the text of the Constitution does not change absent formal constitutional amendment, this “textualist” approach concludes that the meaning of any provision is fixed at the time of ratification. Because the meaning is “fixed,” or as is sometimes stated “static,” the term “originalism” has also been used to describe this approach. However, since this approach does not likely reflect the “original intent” of the framers and ratifiers, the term “originalism” is not used in this Coursebook to describe this approach. The approach has also been called a “formalist” or “textualist” approach, and was most popular on the Supreme Court from 1873-1937. The term “formalism” is used in this Coursebook, not “textualism,” since each approach to constitutional interpretation starts with the constitutional text, and thus is “textualist” to that extent. The various approaches differ on what sources in addition to “text” are used to complete the process of constitutional interpretation, and how much weight to give those sources. In his 1997 book, \textit{A Matter of Interpretation}, Justice Scalia has embraced the term “formalism” when noting, “Of all the criticisms leveled against textualism, the most mindless is that it is ‘formalistic.’ This answer to that is, \textit{of course it’s formalistic!} The rule of law is \textit{about} form. . . . Long live formalism. It is what makes a government a government of laws and not of men.”\footnote{\textit{ANTONIN SCALIA, A MATTER OF INTERPRETATION} 25 (1997).}

A second kind of non-instrumentalist judge focuses on “strict construction” of doctrine. With respect to the Constitution, the emphasis of “strict construction” is on a presumption of constitutionality given to legislative and executive actions, and thus deference to such legislative and executive actions, as they reflect society’s “dominant forces.” A judge following this approach will find governmental action unconstitutional only if the action is clearly unconstitutional. In this Coursebook, this approach is called a Holmesian approach, after Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., who popularized this approach while on the Supreme Court from 1902-32. This approach is also associated with Professor James Bradley Thayer, and his view that courts should defer to governmental action out of respect for the other branches of government, unless the unconstitutionality of the governmental action is “so clear that it is not open to rational question.”\footnote{James B. Thayer, \textit{The Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law}, 7 Harv. L. Rev. 129, 144 (1893). On Thayer's views generally, \textit{see Symposium: One Hundred Years of Judicial Review: The Thayer Centennial Symposium}, 88 Nw. U.L. Rev. 1-468 (1993).} This approach was most popular among a majority of Supreme Court Justices from 1937-54. The Holmesian approach is a “strict construction” approach only for cases involving individual rights. challenges to the constitutionality of governmental action. For structural issues of federalism or separation of powers, the Holmesian deference-to-government approach does not call for “strict construction” of governmental powers, but rather for deference to governmental powers.

A third kind of non-instrumentalist judge focuses attention on the “original intent” of a doctrine’s framers and ratifiers, and therefore asks in the context of the constitutional law how the framers and ratifiers would have gone about interpreting the provision in question. In this Coursebook, this approach is called a natural law approach to interpretation, since the Constitution’s framers and ratifiers, at least from the Constitution’s drafting through the Civil War Amendments, were guided by 18th- and 19th-century theories of natural law. It has been noted:

Beginning in the 1760's, Americans separated ideas about the principles of government from the product of its actions; the law. They did so by tying the idea of a written constitution to two related notions, natural law and social contract. . . . Natural law theory and the social contract gave American public law its emphasis on limiting governmental power. If government violated the social contract and if it denied natural rights and abused public trust, the people retained a right to overthrow it.10

Under this approach, which predominated on the Supreme Court from 1789-1873, and is reflected in Chief Justice John Marshall’s approach from 1801-35, a judge follows principles associated with reasoned elaboration of the law, giving due weight to constitutional text, purpose, structure, and history contemporaneous with the drafting and ratifying of the Constitution, including the framers’ belief in certain natural law principles like the “inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness” mentioned in the Declaration of Independence, or the 5th Amendment’s due process protections for “life, liberty, and property,” as well as to the subsequent events of legislative, executive, and social practice and judicial precedents. As discussed at § 5.2.nn.26-29, legislative, executive, and social practice, as well as judicial precedents, were critical to Chief Justice Marshall in the foundational 1819 case of McCulloch v. Maryland, as well as relevant to why President James Madison signed the bill creating the Second National Bank of the United States, at issue in the case.

Since Justice Thurgood Marshall’s retirement from the Supreme Court in 1991, there have been no Justices on the Court who have embodied the robust instrumentalist approach of Chief Justice Earl Warren, and Justices William Douglas, William Brennan, Abe Fortas, and Thurgood Marshall of the Warren Court of the 1960s. To a lesser extent, however, a more moderate instrumentalist approach survived on the Court in the personages of Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer. At least since 1986, however, a majority of Justices have not adopted an instrumentalist perspective on constitutional interpretation.

Instead, the other Justices on the Court have opted for one of the non-instrumentalist approaches. Chief Justice William Rehnquist usually adhered to Justice Holmes’ philosophy of giving great deference to legislative and executive actions. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas have usually applied an interpretation theory characteristic of a formalist approach. This led them often to join with Chief Justice Rehnquist, but not always.\textsuperscript{11} After 1991, the typical swing votes on the Court were held by Justices Sandra Day O’Connor, Anthony Kennedy, and David Souter. They usually adhered to a natural law style of interpretation, although each sometimes adopted a different style: Kennedy, formalist; O’Connor, Holmesian; and Souter, instrumentalist.

Constitutional law today reflects the clash and accommodation of these four interpretation styles. As stated above in Table 1, each of these interpretation styles was adopted by a majority of Justices at some earlier time: natural law, 1789-1873; formalism, 1873-1937; Holmesian, 1937-54; and instrumentalism, 1954-86. None are adopted by a majority of Justices today, although each has had at least one adherent since 1972. This clash among the approaches is likely to continue in the near future. For Justices appointed since 2005, Chief Justice Roberts has tended to follow a Holmesian interpretation style similar to Chief Justice Rehnquist, whom he replaced. Justice Alito and Gorsuch have tended to follow a formalist style similar to Justices Scalia and Thomas, while having an occasional affinity for Holmesian deference. Justices Sotomayor and Kagan have tended to follow a liberal moderate instrumentalist style similar to Justices Ginsburg and Stevens. Given recent Court membership, the controlling swing vote on the Court from 2005-2018 was usually Justice Kennedy who, like Justices O’Connor and Souter, tended to follow a modern version of Chief Justice Marshall’s natural law style of interpretation. With Justice Kennedy’s retirement, effective July 31, 2018, the swing vote on the Court awaits confirmation of a new Supreme Court Justice.

That four styles of interpretation are in today’s Supreme Court opinions makes it more difficult to predict outcomes and underlying reasoning. However, there is some value in not having one dominant perspective. The University of Chicago’s distinguished scholar, the late Professor Richard McKeon, believed that with “every fundamental problem, be it scientific or humanistic, there are ‘alternative approaches which are in fruitful relation to each other.’ This applies to thinkers who were contemporaries – or centuries apart. McKeon demanded his students learn more than what Plato or Aristotle had said on a given subject. . . . ‘[H]e wanted them to understand how Plato would have handled Aristotle’s position, and how Aristotle would have handled Plato’s position.’”\textsuperscript{12}

Similarly, in this Coursebook an effort has been made to show how each of the four perspectives on judicial decisionmaking has handled the others by supporting its own premises and questioning the principles and applications of the other approaches. Because each of the four interpretation styles is reflected in some Justice’s approach today, the Justices engage in this process of questioning principles and contrasting premises on a daily basis, especially when there are concurring or dissenting opinions. However, their discussion usually focuses on justifying specific decisions that may be substantially influenced by particular facts. In contrast, this Coursebook takes the discussion to a higher level of abstraction, often by dealing with groups of cases on similar issues, so that general principles about the competing perspectives can emerge and be stated more clearly.

For more detailed discussion of these decisionmaking styles in the context of United States constitutional interpretation, see Charles D. Kelso & R. Randall Kelso, The Path of Constitutional Law Ch. 9-12 (2007) (Chapter 9: Formalism; Chapter 10: Holmesian; Chapter 11: Instrumentalism; Chapter 12: Natural Law) (available at http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials).

As noted therein, and suggested above, most Justices are not purists in their interpretation style, having occasional affinities for a different style than their predominant style. This underscores that each of the two dichotomies, analytic/functional and positivist/normative, are opposite ends of a continuum along which any judge may fall. With that caveat, Table 3 attempts to give a sense of the approach of each Justice on the Court since 1968.

3. Sources Used in Constitutional Law Interpretation

The sources of interpretation used by Supreme Court Justices to decide cases can be divided into two broad categories: contemporaneous sources and subsequent sources. Contemporaneous sources are those existing when the Constitution was framed, and thus contemporaneous to ratification. There are three kinds of such sources: text, context, and history. Regarding these sources, any interpreter must decide, among other things, how much weight to give arguments about the plain, literal meaning of the Constitution's text versus the text's purpose or spirit; the context of that text, including verbal maxims (normal rules of grammatical construction) or policy maxims (such as the “rule of lenity” to construe ambiguities in criminal statutes in favor of the defendant), related provisions in the Constitution or other related documents, like the earlier enacted Articles of Confederation, and structural arguments involving the structure of government contemplated by the framers and ratifiers, including theories of judicial review, federalism, separation of powers, and checks and balances; and historical evidence concerning the intent of the framers and ratifiers, both specific historical evidence (Notes of the Constitutional Convention or inferences from The Federalist Papers), particularly as related to specific historical intent about a particular provision, and general historical evidence (general background societal history), particularly as related to general concepts or principles in which the framers and ratifiers believed, rather than a focus on the specific historical intent about any particular provision. The difference between specific intent and general concepts is explored more fully at § 20.3 nn.43-46, when noting that a Justice faithful to the general concept of equality in the 14th Amendment could hold, as in Brown v. Board of Education, that racially segregated schools deny individuals equal protection of the laws, despite segregated schools being common in 1868, suggesting the framers did not specifically intend to abolish them.

Subsequent sources are those which came into being after the Constitution was framed and ratified. These sources involve legislative, executive, and social practice under the Constitution; judicial precedent interpreting the Constitution, both core holdings of precedent and general reasoning of judicial opinions; and prudential arguments concerning the consequences of a particular judicial decision, both from the perspective of text, context, history, practice, and precedent, and whether that decision would advance a particular background principle of justice or social policy that the judge believes is “embedded” in the Constitution or existing constitutional doctrine, or perhaps a principle of justice or social policy that is “not so embedded” in the Constitution or existing constitutional doctrine.

All of these sources can be organized by resort to whether they involve relatively specific and limited interpretive tasks, or resort to more general kinds of reasoning. Specific interpretive tasks – like those involving the plain meaning of text; verbal maxims; specific historical evidence, particularly involving specific historical practices; or the core holdings of precedent – are more capable of being applied through deductive logic. In contrast, more general interpretive tasks – like those involving determining purposes behind text; resort to background structural arguments; resort to general historical evidence; reasoned elaboration of the law based on reasoning of prior judicial opinions; or prudential consideration of background principles or policies embedded in the law – involve greater use of the inferential logic of inductive reasoning. Table 4 summarizes these sources, separating them into contemporaneous and subsequent, and specific versus general.
In theory, the formalist style of interpretation uses only contemporaneous sources of meaning because of its belief in a static model where constitutional meaning is fixed at the time of ratification. Among contemporaneous sources, the formalist style places greatest weight on the specific interpretive tasks, viewing general kinds of reasoning as entitled to lesser weight because such general reasoning does not yield as specific, certain answers as specific interpretive tasks. The formalist style is thus most comfortable with considering “general” arguments of purpose only if the provision’s “specific” literal meaning is ambiguous or absurd. Similarly, formalists typically reject use of legislative history to interpret provisions, since only text was adopted, not the easier-to-manipulate legislative history. While in theory formalists will not rely on subsequent sources, based on their static constitution model, in practice most formalists, if text is not determinative, will give weight to legislative or executive practice (our Nation’s history and traditions), noted at §§ 25.1 n.9 & 25.2, and weight to core holdings of precedent which are “settled law,” noted at § 2.4.6 n.79.

Holmesian jurists, with their functional focus on a doctrine’s purposes, are more willing to embrace general kinds of contemporaneous source reasoning, like arguments of purpose, than are formalist jurists. Given their deference-to-government posture, Holmesian jurists are the most willing to give great weight to arguments of legislative or executive practice, and are more willing than formalists to consider prudential arguments of judicial restraint. Because of their functional attitude, they are slightly more willing to follow the core holdings of precedents based upon “substantial reliance,” as noted at § 2.4.6 n.80-83. As positivists, however, Holmesian jurists tend to share with formalists a rejection of the more normative task of judicial reasoned elaboration of the law, and a rejection of judicial resort to background principles of justice or social policies to resolve leeways in the law.
The main differences between natural law and instrumentalist jurists are the natural law great respect for precedent and reasoned elaboration of law, grounded in judicial elaboration through reason of background moral principles embedded in the Constitution, and the instrumentalist greater focus on prudential considerations, which reflects a concern with achieving justice given what Professor Karl Llewellyn called the “situation-sense” of each case, and the instrumentalist willingness to consider background principles of social policy, a willingness rejected by the natural law focus on background principles of justice alone. These tendencies are reflected below in Table 5:

For discussion of all these aspects of interpretation, see Charles D. Kelso & R. Randall Kelso, The Path of Constitutional Law Ch. 5, 6 (2007) (http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials) (including § 6.2.1.2 on literal versus purposive interpretation and § 6.2.3.1 on use of legislative history). In his Constitutional Law coursebook, Dean Chemerinsky summarizes these approaches similarly. He calls “originalists” those who follow the static constitution model of interpretation [formalism], and he notes three variations focusing on “text”; “specific intent”; and “abstract intent [general concepts].” For those who use subsequent considerations, whom he calls “nonoriginalists,” he notes three variations: “tradition [legislative, executive and social practice of the Holmesians]”; “those who stress natural law principles [natural law]”; and those who emphasize “improving the processes of government, those who emphasize contemporary values [instrumentalism].”

13 Karl Llewellyn called this approach to judicial decisionmaking the “Grand Style,” which looks at the “situation-sense” of each case. Llewellyn noted: “[A]s overt marks of the Grand Style: “precedent” is carefully regarded, but if it does not make sense it is ordinarily re-explored; “policy” is explicitly inquired into; alleged “principle” must make for wisdom as well as for order if it is to qualify as such . . . [W]here the reason stops there stops the rule . . . in accordance with purpose and reason.” Karl Llewellyn, On the Current Recapture of the Grand Tradition, in Jurisprudence: Realism in Theory and Practice 215, 217 (1962).

4. The Structure of Law as Determined by Judges

Because of their different perspectives on the nature of law and the nature of the judicial task, the four styles of decisionmaking tend to have different predispositions on the nature of legal reasoning and the structure of legal doctrine. One difference that can be observed concerns whether legal reasoning tends to be predominantly deductive or inductive. Because of their focus on logical elaboration of existing legal categories, formalists tend to be deductive. Because of their focus on background social policies and social welfare, instrumentalists tend to be more inductive. Holmesians and natural law Justices fall somewhere in between. For all Justices, there is a tendency to reason deductively where the Constitution’s terms are relatively detailed and specific. For more general terms, like equal protection or due process, judicial elaboration tends to be more inductive.

The four judicial decisionmaking styles also differ on the four most important kinds of decisions that determine the form or shape of any legal doctrine. The first decision is whether doctrine should be phased in absolute, categorical terms or as a balancing test. Once that decision is made, the next decision is whether the test should be phrased in terms of elements to meet or factors to weigh. The third is whether the elements or factors should be phrased in the language of specific rules or of broader standards. The final decision is whether the rules or standards should be viewed as questions of law to be decided by a judge or questions of fact to be determined by the trier of facts.

Table 6 suggests how these decisions tend to be made by the various styles of decisionmaking:

As might be predicted, analytic approaches to law, like formalism and natural law, have a predisposition for as many categorical rules to be adopted as possible. In contrast, balancing developed based on the pragmatic, functional theories used by Holmesians and Instrumentalists, which predominated on the Supreme Court between 1937-1986. In modern times, the natural law judge’s great respect for these precedents, and willingness to consider background moral principles embedded in the law, has pushed natural law judges more in the direction of a willingness to accept balancing tests. Thus, despite adopting the same natural law style of interpretation, natural law judges today may reach different conclusions on the proper form or shape of doctrine than natural law judges in the past, based on today’s different landscape of precedents.15

Regarding elements versus factors, formalists tend to prefer doctrine to be stated as elements to meet. Doctrines stated as elements are more likely to be capable of mechanical, logical, analytic application. In contrast, any weighing of factors is necessarily going to be an imprecise science. Instrumentalists, not surprisingly, tend to be receptive to doctrine stated as factors because most factor schemes permit judges to take into account through the weighing of factors full consideration of the social policies involved in the case.

As a positivist approach committed to following existing legal categories, most Holmesian judges are predisposed to favor doctrine phrased as more certain and predictable elements, except where the purposes behind the law are sufficiently complex that they can only be adequately reflected in a weighing of factors. The background moral principles of a society are likely to be similarly complex. Thus, although the analytic side of the natural law style would prefer doctrine to be stated more as elements to meet, the normative side of the natural law style, which is sensitive to the law’s purposes and to the background moral principles embedded in the law, counsels for some greater amount of doctrine to be phrased as factors than the formalist or Holmesian styles of interpretation.

Not surprisingly, given their focus on analytic, logical treatment of positive law, formalists have the greatest predisposition to frame doctrine as rules. Not surprisingly, instrumentalists, tend to have a preference for standards. Formalist Justice Scalia has led “the charge” on the Court for rules, while instrumentalist Justice Stevens has been “his most consistent, standard-bearing antagonist.” Justice Stevens often prefers multi-factored contextual analysis and opposes rule-based or categorical decisionmaking, while Justice Scalia has indicated his reluctance to employ balancing tests, factor analysis, particularly in the form of “totality of the circumstances” tests, and standards of “reasonableness.” He has indicated a preference for categorical rules of general applicability.

Because of their positivist desire for certainty in following existing legal doctrine, Holmesian judges tend to have a preference for doctrine to be phrased more in terms of rules, than standards. On the other hand, the concern that too great an adherence to rules might distort the underlying moral basis of the law pushes the natural law style somewhat in the direction of standards, rather than rules. The language of standards is often better at encapsulating some background moral principle embedded in the law, such as the restitution principle that “no person should be permitted to profit from his own wrong”; or the contract principle that “promises should be kept”; or the tort principle that “persons should behave reasonably under the circumstances.”

The desire for certainty in existing legal categories typically has meant that formalists and Holmesian prefer legal doctrines to be phrased as issues of law for court resolution. Indeed, one of Holmes’ premises was that as standards of reasonable behavior became clear, judges should lay them down once and for all as per se rules of conduct. Justice Scalia has also pointed out a connection among balancing tests, factor analysis, and whether doctrine is phrased as an issue of fact or law. He has noted that where “an appellate judge says that the remaining issue must be decided on the basis of the totality of the circumstances, or by a balancing of all the factors involved, he [or she] begins to resemble a finder of fact more than a determiner of law. To reach such a stage is, in a way, a regrettable concession of defeat – an acknowledgment that we have passed the point where ‘law,’ properly speaking, has any further application.” In contrast, the instrumentalist style, with its emphasis on the social policies underlying a case, often prefers doctrine to be phrased as facts for the social sensibilities of the triers of fact to be determinative. For the natural law style, the analytic side of natural law pushes in the direction of the formalist predisposition, while the normative side pushes in the instrumentalist direction.

As with the other aspects of the form or shape of law, these observations reflect general judicial predispositions that can be overridden for other reasons with respect to any particular doctrine. For example, a conservative, law-and-order formalist may prefer a multi-factored “reasonableness” analysis instead of a categorical requirement of a “warrant and/or particularized cause”; a liberal instrumentalist may prefer categorical protection of some free speech right, rather than a free speech balancing approach. However, such observations regarding the possibility of judges departing for tactical conservative/liberal reasons from their general predisposition with respect to a particular doctrine do not upset the general predisposition of the judicial decisionmaking styles noted here.

Table 7 below summarizes some of the different predispositions of conservative versus liberal judges. As noted at § 8.1.1(E) n.30, on issues of federalism, conservative judges tend to prefer states’ rights, while liberal judges tend to favor exercises of federal power. As noted at § 9.1.1 n.14, on separation of powers issues, conservative judges tend to favor the executive, while liberal judges tend to favor the legislative branch. On individual rights, conservative judges tend to focus on the protection of economic rights, while liberal judges tend to support economic regulation, focusing on the protection of non-economic civil/political rights, as suggested by comparing the conservative formalist Court to the liberal instrumentalist Court at §§ 2.3.2 - 2.3.4. Each style of decisionmaking has conservative and liberal adherents. Justice Scalia is best viewed as a conservative formalist, while Justice Black was a liberal formalist; Chief Justice Rehnquist was a conservative Holmesian, while Justice White was a liberal Holmesian. However, in general, conservatives tend to favor tradition and the status quo, which more often suggests the static constitution model of formalism, or the Holmesian deference-to-government model, while liberals tend to favor instrumentalism, which authorizes judges prudentially to aid the unempowered in the progressive reform of society.

For more detailed discussion on all these structure of law considerations as determined by judges, see CHARLES D. KELSO & R. RANDALL KELSO, THE PATH OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW Ch. 4 (Table 6 considerations) & § 6.4 (Table 7 considerations) (2007) (http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials).

§ 1.2 Political and Legal Background for Marbury v. Madison Article III defines the nature of the federal judicial power. It has a number of provisions. First, Article III, § 1 includes a general grant of power: “The judicial power of the United States is granted to the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress, from time to time, may establish.”

Second, Article III, § 2, cl. 1 provides that this power extends to all “Cases,” defined by subject matter or impact: (1) “arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made”; (2) “affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls”; or (3) “admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction.” Article III, § 2, cl. 1 also extends federal judicial power to all “Controversies,” defined by parties, to which: (1) “the United States shall be a party”; or (2) between (a) “two or more States”; (b) “a State and Citizens of another State”; (c) “Citizens of different States”; (d) “Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States”; or (e) “a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.”

Third, Article III, § 2, cl. 2 provides that the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction over cases (1) “affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls,” and (2) “those in which a State shall be a Party.” In “all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.”

Commentators have sometimes proposed drawing distinctions between “cases” and “controversies.” This has included distinctions like “cases” involve civil and criminal actions, while “controversies” only involve civil actions; or “cases” involve judicial exposition of the law, while “controversies” merely require the judge to act as a neutral decisionmaker to resolve the case; or Congress cannot both limit lower federal court jurisdiction and Supreme Court jurisdiction over “cases” so as to give state courts the last word on such issues, but can exercise both powers over “controversies.”

In contrast, the Supreme Court has never drawn any such distinction between the two terms. Similarly, the framers never drew any distinction in using the phrase “all the other Cases before mentioned” to refer to both “cases” and “controversies” in the “Exceptions” Clause of Article III, § 2, cl. 2, cited above. It is universally accepted that the Court’s appellate jurisdiction applies to all the disputes listed as “cases” or “controversies” in Article III, § 2, cl. 1, despite the “Exceptions” Clause only using the word “Cases” to describe them. Following that practice, this Coursebook will use the word “cases” to include all the disputes listed as “cases” or “controversies” in Article III.

In Marbury v. Madison, the Court made clear the distinction between original and appellate jurisdiction. The facts in Marbury are relatively simple. As summarized by Dean Chemerinsky:

> On February 27, 1801, less than a week before the end of [President] Adams’s term, Congress adopted the Organic Act of the District of Columbia, which authorized the President to appoint 42 justices of the peace. [Ed.: This was part of moving the Nation’s capitol from Philadelphia, where the government had sat from 1790-1800, to Washington, D.C., thus fulfilling the Compromise of 1790 where Southern politicians agreed to permit the federal government to take over state Revolutionary War debts in exchange for the Nation’s capitol being located in the South.] Adams announced his nominations on March 2, and on March 3, the day before Jefferson’s inauguration, the Senate confirmed the nominees. Immediately, Secretary of State (and Chief Justice) John Marshall signed the commissions for these individuals and dispatched his brother, James Marshall, to deliver them. A few commissions, including one for William Marbury, were not delivered before Jefferson’s inauguration. President Jefferson instructed his Secretary of State, James Madison, to withhold the undelivered commissions.

William Marbury filed suit in the United States Supreme Court seeking a writ of mandamus to compel Madison, as Secretary of State, to deliver the commission. A writ of mandamus is a petition to a court asking it to order a government officer to perform a duty. Marbury claimed that the Judiciary Act of 1789 authorized the Supreme Court to grant mandamus in a proceeding filed initially in the Supreme Court. Although Marbury’s petition was filed in December, 1801, the Supreme Court did not hear the case until 1803 because Congress, by statute, abolished the June and December 1802 Terms of the Supreme Court.22

As a historical matter, the Federalist-dominated Supreme Court, and the Jefferson Administration and its supporters who controlled a majority in the House and Senate, were at loggerheads on many issues at the time. Many Federalists were concerned about the possible “radicalism” of the new Jefferson Administration, particularly against the backdrop of Jefferson’s sympathy for the French Revolution, despite the associated “Terror.” The Federalists, who first came to national offices under George Washington and John Adams, wanted a strong national government. They favored commercial and manufacturing interests by: (1) assuming State revolutionary war debts to improve the United States’ credit rating; (2) passing taxes and tariffs to pay the debts and protect infant domestic manufacturing industries, a majority in Northern states, from foreign competition, particularly from England and other European countries; and (3) chartering a national bank to stabilize the currency. They also created a set of federal courts and passed the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 which punished the defamation of government officials. The Jeffersonians arose to preserve state power in order to favor agriculture interests, by keeping tariffs low on their products for sale, and keeping the federal government out of regulating slavery. They also vigorously opposed the Alien and Sedition Acts, whose main purpose seemed to be to prosecute Jeffersonians criticizing the Adams Administration in the run-up to the 1800 presidential and congressional elections. In that election, the Jeffersonians won control of the presidency, both houses of Congress, and several state legislatures.

Before they left office, the Adams Administration, in their final days, enacted the Judiciary Act of 1801, which created 6 new circuit courts, staffed by 16 new judgeships; eliminated the Justices’ duty to serve as circuit judges in lower federal courts and “ride circuit” by traveling to lower federal courts to help out in hearing cases; and reduced the size of the Court in the future from six to five, in order to limit opportunities by the Jefferson Administration to fill any later vacant Supreme Court positions. The Federalists also created the 42 Justices of the Peace positions at issue in Marbury, as noted above. Seventeen of the commissions, including one for William Marbury, were not delivered before Jefferson’s inauguration. President Jefferson ordered his Secretary of State, James Madison, not to deliver those commissions. Marbury and three others then filed suit in the Supreme Court, seeking a writ of mandamus ordering Madison to deliver the commission.

The Jefferson Administration repealed the Judiciary Act of 1801 in 1802. Both the requirement of “circuit riding” by the Justices and the repeal of the new circuit judgeships were challenged as unconstitutional in 1802, but no decision could be reached until 1803, as the Supreme Court Terms in 1802 were abolished by Congress through refusing to fund Court operations, probably to prevent the Court from ruling on these issues. The Justices during 1802 had to decide whether to begin “riding circuit” again, or risk impeachment if they did not. Eventually, given political realities, which involved increasing support for the Jefferson Administration, and increased Jeffersonian majorities in the House and Senate following the mid-term elections in 1802, the Court members did agree to “ride circuit” again. This duty, while burdensome in terms of travel, would not have compromised the ability of Justices to decide cases, as the Supreme Court’s docket in the early years was often less than 10 cases each Term.

Despite abolishing the 1802 Term, Congress did provide for one Justice to hear procedural matters on one day in August, 1802. That August Term was held each year until Congress abolished it in removing judges who had been appointed to the now-repealed judicial positions violated the life tenure provision of Article III – was rejected in Stuart v. Laird, decided one week after Marbury. In this climate, Marbury can be seen as a warning to Jefferson that attempts at radicalism would be met with at least some Supreme Court response in the form of constitutional judicial review.

At the time, the relevant provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789, § 13, provided:

> And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature, where the state is a party, except between a state and its citizens; and except also between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens, in which latter case it shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction. And shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors or other public ministers, or in which a consul, or vice consul, shall be a party. And the trial of issues of fact in the Supreme Court, in all actions at law against citizens of the United States, shall be by jury. The Supreme Court shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the circuit courts and courts of the several states, in cases herein specially provided for; and shall have power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States.

The most natural reading of this statute, consistent with the context of the mandamus provision among the related provisions in § 13, would be that the Supreme Court’s mandamus power exists only as a part of the Court’s appellate jurisdiction. The first half of § 13 deals with the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for cases involving states, ambassadors, and other public ministers and consuls. The last part of § 13, where mandamus is mentioned, deals with appellate jurisdiction regarding circuit courts and state courts, and writs of prohibition to district courts in admiralty and maritime cases originally brought in district courts. Under this reading, Marbury’s attempt to bring a mandamus action originally in the Supreme Court should fail as a matter of statutory interpretation, unless the case could be viewed as involving an aspect of appellate jurisdiction.

Marbury’s attorney did note in the oral argument before the Supreme Court that perhaps the case did involve appellate jurisdiction, since the Court was reviewing Marbury’s appeal from the actions of a government official, James Madison, in refusing to deliver him his commission. Chief Justice Marshall rejected this characterization in Marbury, stating, “It is the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction, that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause. Although, therefore, a mandamus may be directed to courts, yet to issue such a writ to an officer for the delivery of a paper, is in effect the same as to sustain an original action for that paper, and therefore seems not to belong to appellate jurisdiction, but to original jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{27}

In his opinion in \textit{Marbury v. Madison}, Chief Justice Marshall avoided reading § 13 as authorizing mandamus only as a matter of appellate jurisdiction by citing only the language dealing with mandamus in the last part of § 13, without regard to its context in the entire provision. By focusing on the mandamus clause, Marshall could correctly state that \textit{Marbury} was a case where mandamus would be the appropriate remedy, and by reading the statute to authorize a petition for mandamus to be brought originally in the Supreme Court, Marshall created a conflict between § 13, so read, and the limited grant of original jurisdiction in Article III, § 2, cl. 2 of the Constitution to cases involving ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and states. By creating a constitutional issue, Marshall then used \textit{Marbury v. Madison} to establish the constitutional doctrine of judicial review.

Given this result, it has always been a matter of some speculation whether \textit{Marbury} was conceived by the Court as a vehicle to establish judicial review only after the case was filed, or whether from the very beginning the case was “set up” by Marbury to provide Chief Justice Marshall and the Court with an opportunity to use the case to establish the doctrine of judicial review. The case was filed by Marbury in December, 1801, over seven months after his commission was not delivered by Jefferson’s Secretary of State, James Madison. By this time, Marbury already had another government position in Maryland, due to his long-time friends in that state. Marbury could likely have filed his mandamus petition in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, and then appealed to the Supreme Court if met with an unfavorable ruling in that court. In theory, after \textit{Marbury v. Madison}, Marbury could have re-filed in that district court, which neither he, nor any of the other individuals denied their commissions, ever did. These facts all suggest that Marbury was not really interested in obtaining the justice of the peace position, but filed the case for other reasons. Indeed, Chief Justice Marshall seemed to acknowledge the possibility that the case could have been brought first in a lower federal court, when he stated in \textit{Marbury} that finding jurisdiction was not “necessary in a case such as this to enable the court to exercise its appellate jurisdiction."\textsuperscript{28}

The Court’s opinion in \textit{Marbury} is distinctive in at least three respects. First, Marshall used the first part of the opinion to scold the Jefferson Administration for wrongly refusing to deliver Marbury’s commission, even though normal judicial practice, once a Court determines it has no jurisdiction, is to refuse to comment on the merits of the case.\textsuperscript{29} This aspect of the opinion apparently infuriated

Jefferson and his supporters, both on the ground that Jefferson believed, as for gifts or deeds, that delivery was essential for the commission to be valid, and on the grounds that this part of the decision was clearly obiter dicta.\textsuperscript{30} Indeed, one might well ask if delivery of the commissions was not essential to the commissions being valid, as the Court held in \textit{Marbury}, why did John Marshall, and his brother James, make such extraordinary efforts the night of March 3 to get as many commissions delivered as possible? Was it just an overabundance of caution, or at that time did they think delivery was essential for validity? Second, the normal judicial practice is to read statutes, if possible, to avoid constitutional problems. Instead, the Court reached out in \textit{Marbury} to create a constitutional problem.\textsuperscript{31} Finally, under contemporary standards of conflict of interest, Chief Justice Marshall should not have sat on the case, since it was his own behavior as Adams’ Secretary of State in failing to ensure delivery of Marbury’s commission that was at issue in the case.\textsuperscript{32}

All the above observations suggest it is often important to know the political and social context within which the decision is being made in order to understand fully the Court’s decision.

\textbf{§ 1.3 The Leading Case on Judicial Review: \textit{Marbury v. Madison}}

\textit{Marbury v. Madison}

5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)

Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court.

1st. Has the applicant a right to the commission he demands?

In the case of commissions, the law orders the secretary of state to record them. When therefore they are signed and sealed, the order for their being recorded is given; and whether inserted in the book or not, they are in law recorded.

That this is the understanding of the government, is apparent from the whole tenor of its conduct.

A commission bears the date, and the salary of the officer commences from his appointment; not from the transmission or acceptance of his commission. When a person, appointed to any office, refuses to accept that office, the successor is nominated in the place of the person who has declined to accept, and not in the place of the person who had been previously in office, and had created the original vacancy.

It is therefore decidedly the opinion of the court, that when a commission has been signed by the President, the appointment is made; and that the commission is complete, when the seal of the United States has been affixed to it by the secretary of state.

2dly. If he has a right, and that right has been violated, do the laws of this country afford him a remedy?

The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection.

The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.

By the constitution of the United States, the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority and in conformity with his orders.

But when the legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties; when he is directed peremptorily to perform certain acts; when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts; he is so far the officer of the law; is amenable to the laws for his conduct; and cannot at his discretion sport away the vested rights of others.

It remains to be inquired whether,

3dly. He is entitled to the remedy for which he applies. This depends on,

1st. The nature of the writ applied for, and,

2dly. The power of this court.

1st. The nature of the writ.

The act to establish the judicial courts of the United States authorizes the supreme court "to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States."
The secretary of state, being a person holding an office under the authority of the United States, is precisely within the letter of the description; and if this court is not authorized to issue a writ of mandamus to such an officer, it must be because the law is unconstitutional, and therefore absolutely incapable of conferring the authority, and assigning the duties which its words purport to confer and assign.

The constitution vests the whole judicial power of the United States in one supreme court, and such inferior courts as congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. This power is expressly extended to all cases arising under the laws of the United States; and consequently, in some form, may be exercised over the present case; because the right claimed is given by a law of the United States.

In the distribution of this power it is declared that "the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party. In all other cases, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction."

It has been insisted, at the bar, that as the original grant of jurisdiction, to the supreme and inferior courts, is general, and the clause, assigning original jurisdiction to the supreme court, contains no negative or restrictive words; the power remains to the legislature, to assign original jurisdiction to that court in other cases than those specified in the article which has been recited; provided those cases belong to the judicial power of the United States.

If it had been intended to leave it to the discretion of the legislature to apportion the judicial power between the supreme and inferior courts according to the will of that body, it would certainly have been useless to have proceeded further than to have defined the judicial powers, and the tribunals in which they should be vested. The subsequent part of the section is mere surplusage, is entirely without meaning, if such is to be the construction. If congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction, where the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original; and original jurisdiction where the constitution has declared it shall be appellate; the distribution of jurisdiction, made in the constitution, is form without substance.

Affirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed; and in this case, a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them or they have no operation at all.

It cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect; and therefore such a construction is inadmissible, unless the words require it.

If the solicitude of the convention, respecting our peace with foreign powers, induced a provision that the supreme court should take original jurisdiction in cases which might be supposed to affect them; yet the clause would have proceeded no further than to provide for such cases, if no further restriction on the powers of congress had been intended. That they should have appellate jurisdiction in all other cases, with such exceptions as congress might make, is no restriction; unless the words be deemed exclusive of original jurisdiction.
When an instrument organizing fundamentally a judicial system, divides it into one supreme, and so many inferior courts as the legislature may ordain and establish; then enumerates its powers, and proceeds so far to distribute them, as to define the jurisdiction of the supreme court by declaring the cases in which it shall take original jurisdiction, and that in others it shall take appellate jurisdiction; the plain import of the words seems to be, that in one class of cases its jurisdiction is original, and not appellate; in the other it is appellate, and not original. If any other construction would render the clause inoperative, that is an additional reason for rejecting such other construction, and for adhering to their obvious meaning.

To enable this court then to issue a mandamus, it must be shown to be an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, or to be necessary to enable them to exercise appellate jurisdiction.

It has been stated at the bar that the appellate jurisdiction may be exercised in a variety of forms, and that if it be the will of the legislature that a mandamus should be used for that purpose, that will must be obeyed. This is true, yet the jurisdiction must be appellate, not original.

It is the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction, that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause. Although, therefore, a mandamus may be directed to courts, yet to issue such a writ to an officer for the delivery of a paper, is in effect the same as to sustain an original action for that paper, and therefore seems not to belong to appellate, but to original jurisdiction. Neither is it necessary in such a case as this, to enable the court to exercise its appellate jurisdiction.

The authority, therefore, given to the supreme court, by the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, appears not to be warranted by the constitution; and it becomes necessary to enquire whether a jurisdiction, so conferred, can be exercised.

The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognize certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis, on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority, from which they proceed, is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns, to different departments, their respective powers. It may either stop here; or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.
The government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined, and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction, between a government with limited and unlimited powers, is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law: if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power, in its own nature illimitable.

Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void.

This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and is consequently to be considered, by this court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not therefore to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

If then the courts are to regard the constitution; and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature; the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.
Those then who controvert the principle that the constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the constitution, and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act, which, according to the principles and theory of our government, is entirely void; is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare, that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions – a written constitution – would of its elf be sufficient, in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favor of its rejection.

The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the constitution.

Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that, in using it, the constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?

This is too extravagant to be maintained.

In some cases then, the constitution must be looked into by the judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read, or to obey?

There are many other parts of the constitution which serve to illustrate this subject.

It is declared that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Suppose a duty on the export of cotton, of tobacco, or of flour; and a suit instituted to recover it. Ought judgment to be rendered in such a case? ought the judges to close their eyes on the constitution, and only see the law.

The constitution declares that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

If, however, such a bill should be passed and a person should be prosecuted under it; must the court condemn to death those victims whom the constitution endeavors to preserve?

"No person," says the constitution, "shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."
Here the language of the constitution is addressed especially to the courts. It prescribes, directly for them, a rule of evidence not to be departed from. If the legislature should change that rule, and declare one witness, or a confession out of court, sufficient for conviction, must the constitutional principle yield to the legislative act?

From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent, that the framers of the constitution contemplated that instrument, as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature.

Why otherwise does it direct the judges to take an oath to support it? This oath certainly applies, in an especial manner, to their conduct in their official character. How immoral to impose it on them, if they were to be used as the instruments, and the knowing instruments, for violating what they swear to support!

The oath of office, too, imposed by the legislature, is completely demonstrative of the legislative opinion on the subject. It is in these words, "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent on me as according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution, and laws of the United States."

Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the constitution of the United States, if that constitution forms no rule for his government? if it is closed upon him, and cannot be inspected by him?

If such be the real state of things, this is worse than solemn mockery. To prescribe, or to take this oath, becomes equally a crime.

It is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank.

Thus, the particular phraseology of the constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

A most remarkable thing about this opinion is how Justice Marshall diverted attention away from the major weak spot in his decision. A gap in the opinion was the assumption that if Congress enacts a law, having decided that it is not repugnant to the Constitution, the Court has been granted the authority to disagree with Congress and find that the law conflicts with the Constitution. Justice Marshall dealt with this issue only indirectly when, to support the proposition that courts are not bound by a legislative act that is void because repugnant to the Constitution, he said it is "emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.” This argument merely assumes that courts can find a law repugnant to the Constitution even though Congress has made a contrary judgment.

Professor William Winslow Crosskey contended in his massive 1953 treatise, Politics and the Constitution, that the framers intended to adopt a "tripartite theory" of judicial review. That theory contends that each branch of government is the judge of the constitutionality of its own powers. The tripartite theory, which was supported by Thomas Jefferson, was suggested as the only true basis for judicial review in 1825 by Justice Gibson, of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, dissenting in Eaking v. Raub. Justice Gibson said:

In the very few cases in which the judiciary, and not the legislature, is the immediate organ to execute its [the Constitution's] provisions, they are bound by it, in preference to any act of assembly to the contrary. But what I have in view in this inquiry, is, the supposed right of the judiciary, to interfere, in cases where the constitution is to be carried into effect through the instrumentality of the legislature, and where that organ must necessarily first decide on the constitutionality of its own act.

Under this view, for a court to declare a law void, which has been enacted according to the forms prescribed in the Constitution, was to usurp legislative power. To affirm the right of judges to determine the existence of a collision between a law and the Constitution was to take for granted the very thing to be proved. Where laws are passed, the legislature must decide the constitutionality of its act. For his own part, Justice Gibson retracted this view in 1845, and, consistent with a natural law theory of interpretation, embraced judicial review based upon practice and precedent.

Chief Justice Marshall avoided a discussion of the tripartite or other theories of judicial power by finding in Marbury that Congress' grant of original jurisdiction to the Court in mandamus cases was repugnant to the Constitution and then focusing attention on why courts are not bound by such a law. On these points he could rely on the supremacy of the Constitution over other laws, a concern about legislative omnipotence, and Article VI's reference to laws made "in pursuance" of the Constitution.

As a general matter, the fact that a majority of the framers and ratifiers may have been operating under a belief in natural law theory does not answer the question of whether they endorsed judicial review. As Professor Robert P. George has noted:

It is certainly true that believers in natural law consider positive law to be legitimate and binding to conscience only where it conforms to natural law and, as such, respects the natural rights of people subject to it. But natural law itself does not settle the question of whether it falls ultimately to the legislature or the judiciary in any particular polity to insure that the positive law conforms to natural justice and respects natural rights. . . .

[I]t is clear that authority to enforce the natural law may reasonably be vested primarily, or even virtually exclusively, with the legislature; or, alternatively, a significant measure of such authority may be granted to the judiciary as a check on legislative power. . . . And that is because questions of the existence and content of natural law and natural rights are, as a logical matter, independent of questions of institutional authority to give practical effect to natural law and to protect natural rights.37

Whether any particular society will adopt some form of judicial review is ultimately dependent upon the customs and traditions of that society. For societies like England and France, democratic revolutions against the authority of the King took place against a background of close connections between the King and the King’s courts. Thus, those democratic revolutions emphasized strongly the legislative supremacy of parliament, and rejected any concept of judicial review of the constitutionality of legislative acts. In the United States, however, the reality was different. In an article entitled The Origins of Judicial Review, a treatment of judicial review in America during the post-Revolutionary War and ratification era, Professors Saikrishna B. Prakash & John C. Yoo noted:

Written in the aftermath of the Revolution, the first state constitutions did not explicitly establish judicial review. . . . [W]hen the early state constitutions were drafted the “judiciary was not yet seen as guardian of the constitutional order.” Nonetheless, the state assemblies were not to be omnipotent. Some state constitutions expressly incorporated Montesquieu’s famous maxim that the executive, legislative, and judicial powers ought to be kept separate. Other constitutions created institutions devised to check the legislature. Pennsylvania and Vermont . . . each had a Council of Censors . . . . [New York had] a council of revision . . . .

At some point, however, these declarations and institutions came to be viewed as insufficient. . . . [A]s the instances where the state courts engaged in judicial review (or were perceived as having done so) accumulated and as fundamental changes occurred in American ideas of government and law, judicial review came to be generally understood as an important check on the legislature under a written, limited constitution with a separation of powers.

Judicial review responded to, and was consistent with, several historical trends, circumstances, and problems in American constitutional and political thought of this period. First was the generic problem of a newly hyperactive legislative power. . . . Some came to believe that another institution was necessary to check the legislative vortex.

Second, there was a need to prevent states from ignoring or frustrating national enactments, particularly treaties. The Continental Congress lacked any formal method to enforce state compliance with the Articles of Confederation, federal resolves, and treaties. Judicial review by state courts over state legislatures arose as . . . to check the legislature. . . .

Third, the concept of the separation of powers grew in importance . . . . The separation of powers was not simply a check on the executive, but a guard against arbitrary, centralized government power and a protection of liberty. To the extent that this more robust concept of the separation of powers took hold . . . , it is more likely that the Founders would have understood judicial review as a product of the separation of powers.

Finally, one cannot overestimate the significance of the written nature of . . . constitutions. Before written constitutions were adopted, it might have been difficult to determine whether a legislature was acting unconstitutionally – after all, there was no baseline text; with a written constitution, however, all could compare a statute with actual constitutional text.38

This history suggests that Chief Justice Marshall accurately reflected the views of the framers and ratifiers when he announced the principle of judicial review in Marbury v. Madison. Further examples of historical evidence supporting Marbury, including evidence of the framing and ratifying period, and of legislative and executive practice and judicial precedents after the Constitution was ratified, but prior to Marbury, appear in the aforementioned article, The Origins of Judicial Review, and also in Professor Randy Barnett’s article, The Original Meaning of Judicial Power.39

Despite this evidence, the specific result in Marbury could be defended under the tripartite theory since the statute in question dealt directly with the nature of the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction, and even under the tripartite theory judges are the appropriate actors to resolve questions of judicial power. If Marbury had been vigorously challenged by the Jeffersonians, the Court could have retreated to the tripartite position. This could have been supported by viewing the language in Article VI regarding laws made “in pursuance” of the Constitution as referring only to whether the laws were passed “according to the procedures of” the Constitution, such as following the bicameralism and presentment clauses of Article I, § 7, cl.2. As long as procedures were followed, under the tripartite theory the question of whether the substance of any legislative enactment was consistent with the Constitution would be determined by the legislative branch itself, not the courts.

An additional aspect of Marbury also deserves comment. Under a literal interpretation of Article III, there would perhaps be original jurisdiction for Marbury’s mandamus plea, since his case, brought against Madison as Secretary of State, did involve a case affecting a “public minister” of the United States. The related use of the language “Ambassadors, other public ministers or consuls, Justices of the Supreme Court, or other officials” in the Appointments Clause, Article II, § 2, cl. 2, suggests that Secretaries of Cabinet Departments are “public ministers” for purposes of that Clause, although perhaps “public ministers” in the Appointments Clause, like “consuls,” refers only to United States diplomats, and Cabinet Secretaries are covered by the “other officials” language. However, Marbury’s attorney did refer to Madison as a “public ministerial officer” in his oral argument before the Supreme Court, suggesting that such a characterization of Madison was viewed as plausible by Marbury’s attorney.40

This possible argument was not mentioned by the Court in Marbury because the purpose of granting original jurisdiction to cases involving “Ambassadors” and “other public Ministers and Consuls” in Article III relates to “foreign” ambassadors or public ministers who are serving in the United States in a diplomatic capacity, not United States officials. To encourage such foreigners to serve in the United States, they are given the protection of having their cases heard directly by the Supreme Court. This purpose emerges from the text of § 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 which, as cited above at § 1.2 n.26, defined such cases as involving “ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently with the law of nations.”

The “law of nations” refers to international law, and its rules regarding, among other things, diplomatic immunity. The reference to “domestic servants” indicates the provision includes all those persons serving as part of the country’s diplomatic mission. Section 13 states that cases brought against such diplomats must be brought in the Supreme Court, while giving such diplomats the option of suing either in district courts or the Supreme Court if the diplomat is the plaintiff. The contemporary version of § 13 makes this point clear, stating that the original jurisdiction of the Court extends to “actions or proceedings to which ambassadors, other public ministers, consuls, or vice-consuls of foreign states are parties.”41 This example, however, underscores the dangers of a literal approach to interpretation, and the wisdom of considering a provision’s purpose.

Evaluating judicial review remains a relevant exercise because a contemporary judge who has doubts as to the legitimacy or social benefit of judicial review may be less inclined to invalidate a particular law or its application. Chief Justice Marshall’s use of purpose and structural arguments in Marbury v. Madison, combined with the force of practice and precedent, should have strong appeal to contemporary judges who, like Marshall, bring a natural law approach to the decision of cases. As Justice Kennedy noted in the context of justifying the Supreme Court’s intervention in the 2000 Presidential election in Bush v. Gore, “Sometimes you just have to step up to the plate.”

Professor Herbert Wechsler, a distinguished constitutional law scholar, stated, "Let me begin by saying that I have not the slightest doubt respecting the legitimacy of judicial review, whether the action called in question in a case which otherwise is proper for adjudication is legislative or executive, federal or state." A number of his contemporaries have agreed: “The grant of judicial power was to include the power, where necessary in the decision of cases, to disregard state or federal statutes found to be unconstitutional. Despite the curiously persisting myth of usurpation, the Convention's understanding on this point emerged from its records with singular clarity.”

The approach also has instrumentalist appeal because it gives the courts the wherewithal to protect individual liberty, free speech, political processes, minorities, and individual freedoms. It is thus consistent with liberal instrumentalist views regarding social policy. Professor Laurence Tribe has said that by debating our fundamental values and deepest differences in the shared language of constitutional rights and responsibilities, the possibility is created for persuasion and moral education in national life. Dean Jesse Choper has said that the Court can use its power to secure individual liberty by protecting individuals from overexpansive uses of governmental power.

From a social policy perspective, one negative aspect of judicial review on constitutional grounds is that it can produce long delays in learning whether a law is valid, and it is possible that certain cases may not be presented by the most able advocates. Also, the Supreme Court, a non-democratic body, may impede an enlightened democratic consensus, a matter that concerned President Lincoln, as discussed in this Coursebook at § 2.3.1 n.60.

42 Newsweek, Cover Story: The Secret Vote That Made Bush President (Sept. 9, 2001) (quoting a remark by Justice Kennedy in a meeting at the Supreme Court with Russian judges).

Furthermore, the Supreme Court has not always used its power wisely, as is indicated by cases such as Dred Scott v. Sandford, Plessy v. Ferguson, Lochner v. New York, and Hammer v. Dagenhart. Perhaps not surprisingly, each of these cases advanced the interests of dominant white propertied or corporate interests, the segment of society from which most Supreme Court Justices have typically been drawn. The possibility of judicial review may also result in Congress passing constitutional questions to the Court rather than giving the questions full consideration themselves.

These kinds of considerations have led a number of progressive theorists to become increasingly skeptical of judicial review, particularly given a Supreme Court majority since 1991 of 5 more conservative jurists, as indicated in a number of 5-4 opinions regarding states’ rights and federalism issues under the 10th and 11th Amendments, addressed in Chapter 8; cutting back on various forms of aggressive affirmative action, addressed in Chapter 21; and the 5-4 decision in Bush v. Gore, addressed in Chapter 24. Prominent among such commentators sharing this concern is Professor Mark Tushnet. Professor Tushnet has noted a number of alternative forms of judicial review to Marbury, and has proposed moving away from Marbury’s “court-centered” approach in favor of “populist” interpretation by citizens and elected government officials. Other progressive commentators have also focused on this problem, as have proponents of deliberative democracy.

With regard to judicial review, Holmesian jurist Dean John Hart Ely noted that judicial review can help create democracy by sustaining our political process in a variety of ways, such as removing impediments to free speech, publication, and political association, and by striking down discrimination against certain classes of voters.\textsuperscript{51} However, given Holmesian deference, court review should be limited. As Justice Frankfurter, citing 19th-century Harvard Law School Professor Thayer, noted in \textit{West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette}: “Let [courts] consider how narrow is the function which the constitutions have conferred on them – the office merely of deciding litigated cases; how large, therefore, is the duty intrusted to others, and above all to the legislature. It is that body which is charged, primarily, with the duty of judging of the constitutionality of its work.”\textsuperscript{52} In the same case, Justice Frankfurter also cited a passage from Holmes, stating, “When Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for this Court, wrote that ‘it must be remembered that legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts,’ . . . he went to the very essence of our constitutional system and the democratic conception of our society.”\textsuperscript{53} Professor Lino Graglia has similarly written that courts should not be public policy makers in society.\textsuperscript{54}

Formalist jurists should have a little more difficulty with the doctrine of judicial review, because the doctrine has no explicit grounding in literal constitutional text. Some formalist commentators have questioned \textit{Marbury} and what it says about judicial review. For example, Professor Michael Paulsen has stated that \textit{Marbury} does not stand for a robust theory of judicial review, and that to the extent it says anything about judicial review it mandates strict, textual construction of the Constitution. Professor Paulsen’s basic argument was that \textit{Marbury} stands for the tripartite theory of judicial review. Further, adopting a purist formalist theoretical position that rejects any use of subsequent sources, including precedent, on the grounds that the formalist \textit{static} constitution model should use only contemporaneous sources of interpretation, Professor Paulsen rejected the influence of 200 years of constitutional precedents since \textit{Marbury}. Professor Paulsen also stated that \textit{Marbury} implicitly supported a formalist, static, textualist model of constitutional interpretation.\textsuperscript{55}

As an historical matter it is difficult to claim that the framers and ratifiers predominantly believed in a formalist theory of interpretation. The 18th century was dominated by Enlightenment theories of natural law. Positivist theories, like formalism, only became more popular in the 19th century under the influence of Jeremy Bentham and John Austin in England. In any event, even if \textit{Marbury} could be read in the narrower sense of supporting a tripartite theory of judicial review, under a natural law theory of interpretation, the 200 years of legislative, executive, and social practice and judicial precedent supporting the broader reading of Marbury fix the broader theory as authoritative today. This would be true under the natural law theory of interpretation even if one believes, likely erroneously, that Professor Paulsen, as opposed to Professors Prahesh and Yoo, has a better sense of what text, context, and history reveal about judicial review and the 1803 decision in Marbury.56

Given our Nation’s history, our traditions have been more in favor of judicial review, although occasional attempts to limit, or alter, judicial review have been made, such as Senator Robert La Follette’s proposal in 1922 to let 2/3 of both Houses of Congress overrule Supreme Court decisions invalidating federal statutes, or numerous proposals both before and after the Civil War to require supra-majority votes on the Supreme Court to hold statutes unconstitutional, such as a 2/3 majority, or 7 of 9 Justices, or unanimity.57 It has also been suggested that Justices should have fixed terms of office, such as 15 years, rather than life-time appointments, in order to minimize Supreme Court independence.58 On the other hand, the importance of life-tenure in terms of the independence of the federal judiciary has often been noted. Indeed, “[O]ne of the valuable things courts do is make unpopular decisions that stick: decisions protecting the rights of minorities or preserving structural features of the Constitution that frustrate the majority's will but have long-run benefits.”59

Societies based on the rule of law are more likely to evolve some form of robust judicial review.
This is because, as Alexander Hamilton observed in The Federalist No. 78:

The executive not only dispenses the honors, but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse, but prescribes the rules . . . . The judiciary on the contrary has no influence over either the sword or the purse . . . . It may truly be said to have neither Force nor Will, but merely judgment . . . . It is far more rational to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts.

The precise form of judicial review will naturally depend initially on the customs and traditions from which a society is evolving. Societies without a tradition of judicial review, such as most European countries, have tended to develop judicial review in the 20th century through the form of special constitutional courts, which resolve constitutional issues when referred to them by “elected politicians or ordinary judges,” rather than as part of ordinary judicial practice in the court system, as in America. Of course, the exact structure and design of these courts varies from country to country, including the provisions for service on the court, which in other countries have rejected life-tenure for judges in favor of fixed terms, in Europe typically between 6-12 years.60

The development of this form of judicial review, with the practice of European courts typically having the power to issue advisory opinions based on issue referral, is elaborated in an article by Professor Alec Sweet entitled, Why Europe Rejected American Judicial Review – And Why it May Not Matter.61 As Professor Sweet discussed, over time constitutional review in Europe and the United States have tended to merge, since “ordinary” judges in Europe “now engage in a great deal of constitutional interpretation and review”; European constitutional courts “routinely determine outcomes, just as any [American] court with general appellate jurisdiction”; and American courts are more willing today, as European constitutional courts have always been willing, to engage in the “abstract” review of legislation “prior to its application or enforcement,” typically through the power to issue declaratory judgments.

At the beginning of the 21st century, only a few Western industrialized countries, such as New Zealand and Australia, have no real form of judicial review. Canada has judicial review, subject to a limited legislative override in the “notwithstanding clause” of § 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms – a clause which as of 2014 had never been used by the federal government, and used by 3 of Canada’s 10 provinces only in a few instances where subsequent events mooted its use in any event. England has judicial review to ensure conformity of parliamentary enactments with European Union laws, such as the European Convention on Human Rights. De Tocqueville’s famous observation in 1835 that in America “every political question becomes a judicial question” is increasingly true for all Western industrialized countries under doctrines of judicial review.

Regarding the nature of adjudication in these countries, Professor Thomas Gray has noted:

Modern rights typically are phrased in terms of broad moral concepts – for example, the right of human dignity was made the central organizing value in the German Constitution, and the prestige of that constitution, and of the German Constitutional Court in implementing it, have made that "dignity clause" particularly influential for other constitutional regimes around the world. In several instances, courts have found the authority to articulate and enforce a body of unwritten constitutional rights, most notably in the European Court of Justice's determination that European Union legislation is implicitly subject to a body of general human rights drawn from the common traditions of the member states.

[Further] is a cluster of phenomena usefully grouped under the label "judicial globalization." In Europe, the treaties establishing the European Union, and the European Convention on Human Rights agreed to by members of the Council of Europe, have taken on higher-law status within the domestic law of European states, and the European Court of Justice and the European Court for Human Rights have increasingly exercised active judicial review powers over trade and human rights law respectively. Systems that come relatively late to strong judicial review, like the Eastern European countries after 1989, and the democratizing countries in Asia during the 1990s, find an established international style of constitutional and human rights adjudication ready for adoption. Human rights provisions are often borrowed from existing constitutions and conventions in the drafting of new ones, and this makes it natural for courts of different countries to cite each other's decisions, thus furthering the emergence of a new jus gentium of human rights. Judges increasingly meet with each other across national lines to discuss their work, and this creates more avenues for transmitting judicial techniques and doctrines that have proved successful and prestigious, for building judicial esprit de corps, and encouraging newer or less secure constitutional judiciaries to imitate the confident exercise of sweeping powers of the most admired and best-established ones.

63 For an article acknowledging the general triumph around the world of judicial review, but discussing alternatives to complement that power, see Christopher S. Elmendorf, Advisory Counterparts to Constitutional Courts, 56 Duke L.J. 953 (2007).

This style of natural law decisionmaking focused on universal principles of human rights has been criticized by formalists, both on the static constitution model ground that at the founding Americans and Europeans had very different notions of constitutional democracy then, as noted by Justice Scalia, and by other formalists, such as Professor John Yoo, on the ground that the United States should not be in sync with Europe in moving in the direction of a society based on “laws and rules and transnational negotiation and cooperation,” but rather should advance a vision more in line with “power politics,” a vision reminiscent of the McKinley era of “Manifest Destiny.”

Use of international norms to advance human rights is separate from traditional interactions between domestic courts and international legal bodies. Given increasing globalization of commerce and travel, these traditional interactions have also increased over the past 25 years. It has been noted:

> The World Trade Organization Dispute Settlement Body considers whether U.S. regulations designed to protect endangered sea turtles violate free trade rules. The U.S. Supreme Court considers whether to stay the execution of foreign citizens at the request of the International Court of Justice. A French court decides whether it has the power to regulate websites in the United States that violate French law but are protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia considers whether to follow a precedent of the International Court of Justice on the issue of state responsibility for war crimes. . . . [E]ach case represents a facet of an emerging and interconnected international judicial system [of] transsubstantive rules of process and procedure that govern relationships among courts involved in international adjudication.

Prudentially, the practice of judicial review as it has evolved in most Western industrialized democracies seems sound. Under a tripartite model of review, as Professor Paulsen has stated, there would be a “constitutional world in which multiple actors [courts, legislators, executives, in federal and state governments], exercising their independent interpretive power, strive in good faith to check one another and hold each other to the meaning of the words of the Constitution’s text, and to guard against departures from the nation’s paramount law by any of the branches or organs of the federal or state government. What a wonderful, wonderful world that would be.” Contrary to this view, the conclusion reached by most governments in practice has been that such a vision would be a recipe for anarchy and chaos. Someone needs to have a final say on what is constitutional, and a Supreme Court is better suited than other constitutional actors because of its independence, detachment from politics, and tradition of reasoned decisionmaking. Further, judicial review encourages legislatures to consider the legitimacy of their goals, the extent to which a law's means relate to its goals, and the extent to which a law may interfere with individual or state rights, as they know their actions will be reviewed by courts. Finally, judicial review tends to insure against legislative omnipotence and executive abuses of power, and, thus, protects liberty.68

As practiced in the United States, judicial independence is aided by lifetime appointment and a prohibition against diminished compensation. The Court, in turn, is checked by the manner in which its members are appointed, by Congress' power over its jurisdiction and its size, and by the threat of impeachment. Further, judicial decrees must be enforced by the executive branch. If the executive branch threatens to break the law, the Court may check its activity. Judicial review thus complements Congress' impeachment power to prevent a threat of tyranny.

Study of the cases indicates that although there have been a number of unfortunate Supreme Court decisions, the long-run systemic consequences for the Nation of the Marbury v. Madison approach to judicial review have been more positive than negative. The most significant result is that constitutional questions are subjected to a deliberative process with several levels of review and a tradition of reasoned elaboration of constitutional principles of justice through the rule of law.

It is important to note that there is a distinction between positivism versus normativism as an approach to judicial decisionmaking, discussed here, and positivism versus normativism as a theory of law. For example, in his famous book, The Concept of Law, English legal philosopher H.L.A. Hart postulated that each society has a positive “rule of recognition” that defines which acts count as valid legal enactments.69 As phrased by Professor Hart: “What [positivists like Jeremy] Bentham and [John] Austin were anxious to assert were the following simple two things: first, in the absence of an expressed constitutional or legal provision, it could not follow from the mere fact that a rule violated standards of morality that it was not a rule of law; and, conversely, it could not follow from the mere fact that a rule was morally desirable that it was a rule of law.”70

In contrast, a normative theory of law counsels that there are moral restraints on what can constitute a valid “rule of recognition.” The classic defense of this position, by Harvard University Law Professor Lon Fuller, noted: “There is a twofold sense in which it is true that law cannot be built on law. First of all, the authority to make law must be supported by moral attitudes that accord to it the competency it claims. Here we are dealing with a morality external to law, which makes law possible. But this alone is not enough. . . . We still cannot have law until our monarch is ready to accept the internal morality of the law itself.”71 Regarding the “inner morality of law,” Professor Fuller concluded that there are at least 8 different ways in which a possible “rule of recognition” could fail to reflect valid law. As stated by Fuller: “[(1)] The first and most obvious lies in a failure to achieve rules at all, so that every issue must be decided on an ad hoc basis. The other routes are: (2) a failure to publicize, or at least to make available to the affected party, the rules he is expected to observe; (3) the abuse of retroactive legislation, which not only cannot itself guide action, but undercuts the integrity of rules prospective in effect, since it puts them under the threat of retrospective change; (4) a failure to make rules understandable; (5) the enactment of contradictory rules or (6) rules that require conduct beyond the powers of the affected party; (7) introducing such frequent changes in the rules that the subject cannot orient his action by them; and, finally, (8) a failure of congruence between the rules as announced and their actual administration. A total failure in any one of these eight directions does not simply result in a bad system of law; it results in something that is not properly called a legal system at all, except perhaps in the Pickwickian sense in which a void contract can still be said to be one kind of contract.”72

A discussion about judicial decisionmaking styles is not about the legitimacy of Professor Hart’s rule of recognition as a general theory of law, but about noting that any society’s rule of recognition may be that judges should adopt a positivist or normative approach in their judicial capacities. For example, even if a judge held a generally “positivist” theory of the law, the judge might still adopt a natural law theory of interpretation if the judge decided that theory reflects the original “positive” intent of the framers and ratifiers. As has been noted, “[C]onsistent with this . . . understanding of the positivist claim, the act of constitutional interpretation in the United States may require every bit as much moral inspection as would be required by the most morally thick of natural law theories. The difference would be only that the tradition of positivism would see this as a contingent feature of modern American constitutionalism [based on natural law concepts like due process and equal protection, making an amoral conception of interpretation virtually impossible], while the natural law tradition [such as espoused by Fuller] would see this as an instance of a conceptual truth equally applicable to all existing and possible legal systems.”73 Justice Kennedy made a similar point in *Alden v. Maine,*74 in a passage not excerpted at § 8.3, when he noted that the relevant question was what approach was favored by the framers and ratifiers of the Constitution and the 11th Amendment, stating, “[T]he contours of sovereign immunity are determined by the founders’ understanding, not by the principles or limitations derived [independently] from natural law.”

§ 2.1 Congressional Regulation of the Supreme Court’s Appellate Jurisdiction

1. The Doctrine of Ex parte McCardle

After providing for original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court, Article III, § 2 provides that “In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations, as the Congress shall make.” Can such legislation, once enacted, deprive the Court of jurisdiction even as to pending cases? That was the issue presented in Ex parte McCardle.

In McCardle, a defendant challenged a judgment from the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, which had denied his application for habeas corpus relief from his custody by military authorities while his trial was pending before a military commission. Defendant, a newspaper editor in Vicksburg, Mississippi, was held in military custody for trial before a military commission, based on his writing a series of articles critical of Reconstruction. A statute was in force that provided that judicial courts of the United States had the power to grant a writ of habeas corpus. The statute further stated that an appeal could be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district, and from the judgment of the said circuit court to the United States Supreme Court. After oral argument was heard in McCardle’s case on March 9, 1868, the Radical Republican Congress apparently became concerned that the Supreme Court might use the case not only to release McCardle, but also to declare unconstitutional the Military Reconstruction Act on which was based the entire military occupation of the South. On March 12, 1868, Congress passed a bill which repealed that part of the earlier statute that allowed an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Supreme Court or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by the Supreme Court on appeals. On March 25, 1868, President Johnson vetoed the bill. Congress overrode that veto by 2/3 majorities in each House on March 27, 1868. On March 30, 1868, the Senate was scheduled to begin the impeachment trial of President Johnson, which was addressed in this Coursebook at § 10.2.2 n.36. In the 20th century, the Supreme Court has indicated that Presidents have the authority to fire Cabinet Secretaries at-will, discussed at § 10.2.1(B) nn.25-28. Against the backdrop of President Johnson’s impeachment, the Court considered the case of Ex parte McCardle.
Chief Justice CHASE delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question necessarily is that of jurisdiction; for, if the act of March, 1868, takes away the jurisdiction defined by the act of February, 1867, it is useless, if not improper, to enter into any discussion of other questions.

It is quite true, as was argued by the counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make."

It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the first Congress, at its first session, was the act of September 24th, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

The source of that jurisdiction, and the limitations of it by the Constitution and by statute, have been on several occasions subjects of consideration here. In the case of Durousseau v. The United States, [10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 307 (1810)], particularly, the whole matter was carefully examined, and the court held, that while "the appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act, but are given by the Constitution," they are, nevertheless, "limited and regulated by that act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject." The court said, further, that the judicial act was an exercise of the power given by the Constitution to Congress "of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court." "They have described affirmatively," said the court, "its jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negation of the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it."

The principle that the affirmation of appellate jurisdiction implies the negation of all such jurisdiction not affirmed having been thus established, it was an almost necessary consequence that acts of Congress, providing for the exercise of jurisdiction, should come to be spoken of as acts granting jurisdiction, and not as acts making exceptions to the constitutional grant of it.

The exception to appellate jurisdiction in the case before us, however, is not an inference from the affirmation of other appellate jurisdiction. It is made in terms. The provision of the act of 1867, affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception.

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words.
What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We cannot doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the court cannot proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle.

Several cases were cited by the counsel for the petitioner in support of the position that jurisdiction of this case is not affected by the repealing act. But none of them, in our judgment, afford any support to it. They are all cases of the exercise of judicial power by the legislature, or of legislative interference with courts in the exercising of continuing jurisdiction.

On the other hand, the general rule, supported by the best elementary writers [4 Dwarris on Statutes 538], is, that "when an act of the legislature is repealed, it must be considered, except as to transactions past and closed, as if it never existed." And the effect of repealing acts upon suits under acts repealed, has been determined by the adjudications of this court. The subject was fully considered in Norris v. Crocker [54 U.S. (13 How.) 429 (1852)] and more recently in Insurance Company v. Ritchie [72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 541 (1867)]. In both of these cases it was held that no judgment could be rendered in a suit after the repeal of the act under which it was brought and prosecuted.

It is quite clear, therefore, that this court cannot proceed to pronounce judgment in this case, for it has no longer jurisdiction of the appeal; and judicial duty is not less fitly performed by declining ungranted jurisdiction than in exercising firmly that which the Constitution and the laws confer.

Counsel seem to have supposed, if effect be given to the repealing act in question, that the whole appellate power of the court, in cases of habeas corpus, is denied. But this is an error. The act of 1868 does not except from that jurisdiction any cases but appeals from Circuit Courts under the act of 1867. It does not affect the jurisdiction which was previously exercised. [Ex Parte McCardle, 6 Wallace 324 (1867)].

The appeal of the petitioner in this case must be Dismissed for Want of Jurisdiction.

The Court’s holding that Congress may withdraw appellate jurisdiction from the Supreme Court, even as to pending cases after oral argument, but before a decision was released, was based on the literal text of the “Exceptions” Clause, which provides in Article III, § 2, cl. 2 no limitation on “such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.” As the Court noted at the end of its opinion, other statutes providing for habeas jurisdiction in related cases were still in force, as noted in the Court’s decision later that year in Ex parte Yerger, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 85, 102-06 (1868).

Congress has used this power sparingly in our Nation’s history. However, where a strong enough political need has arisen, that power has been used, as in, for example, the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, involving limiting federal court power to issue injunctions or restraining orders in labor disputes; the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, restraining federal court review of selective service cases, principally by providing the individual must submit to induction and then challenge the induction while in service; the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, which provided that individuals can only challenge allegations of violations of price control measures before a special Emergency Court of Appeals; the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, which removed jurisdiction from the federal courts to hear cases on whether under the Fair Labor Standards Act certain work must be counted as overtime; the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which required state challenges to the Attorney General’s decision to suspend state voting regulations to be brought in the District of Columbia; and provisions limiting rights to appeal (typically prohibiting multiple appeals) for criminal defendants and aliens, such as in the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, and the Illegal Immigrant Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996. In interpreting Congress’ intent, courts typically read limitations on jurisdiction narrowly, and have required a clear statement from Congress to remove jurisdiction from the federal courts.

2. Limits on Ex parte McC cardle

One limitation stated in Ex parte McC cardle itself is for “transactions past and closed.” Thus, when a final decision has been reached by the courts, that decision is res judicata, and cannot be altered by Congress. As the Court stated in Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., “The record of history shows that the framers crafted this charter of the judicial department [Article III of the Constitution] with an expressed understanding that it gives the Federal Judiciary the power, not merely to rule on cases, but to decide them, subject to review only by superior courts in the Article III hierarchy– with an understanding, in short, that ‘a judgment conclusively resolves the case’ because ‘a “judicial Power” is one to render dispositive judgments.’ By retroactively commanding the federal courts to reopen final judgments, Congress has violated this fundamental principle.”

The Court’s holding in Ex parte McC cardle was also limited in United States v. Klein. In Klein, the Supreme Court refused to dismiss an action after the Civil War brought by a Southerner to recover property confiscated by Union forces, despite a congressional act requiring dismissal of such an action if the plaintiff’s loyalty was based on a Presidential pardon. Under the relevant Act, only loyal claimants, not rebels, could recover property under the law, and Congress did not want a Presidential pardon to make a person a loyal claimant, although the Court had ruled to the contrary in interpreting the effect of a Presidential pardon in United States v. Padelford, 76 U.S. 531 (1869).

The Court held the Act invalid because Congress had violated the separation of powers doctrine in two ways: it had denied effect to a Presidential pardon, and it had attempted to dictate how the Court should decide the factual issue of who was a loyal claimant. A principle was thus established that Congress cannot use its exceptions and regulations power to overrule a Court decision on constitutional meaning, as that would violate Marbury’s principle that it is “emphatically the province of the judicial department to say what the law is.” This is true, as in Klein, even if the congressional action is literally a regulation of the Court’s jurisdiction. Reflecting a natural law approach, the critical issue was the purpose and practical effect of Congress’ action, not a formalist focus on whether the Act was literally a regulation of jurisdiction.

United States v. Klein
80 U.S. 128 (1871)

Chief Justice CHASE delivered the opinion of the court.

The general question in this case is whether or not the proviso relating to suits for the proceeds of abandoned and captured property in the Court of Claims, contained in the appropriation act of July 12th, 1870, debars the defendant in error from recovering, as administrator of V. F. Wilson, deceased, the proceeds of certain cotton belonging to the decedent, which came into the possession of the agents of the Treasury Department as captured or abandoned property, and the proceeds of which were paid by them according to law into the Treasury of the United States.

It is to be observed, however, that the Abandoned and Captured Property Act was approved on the 12th of March, 1863, and on the 17th of July, 1862, Congress had already passed an act – the same which provided for confiscation – which authorized the President, "at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare." The act of the 12th of March, 1863, provided for the sale of enemies' property collected under the act, and payment of the proceeds into the treasury, and left them there subject to such action as the President might take under the act of the 17th of July, 1862. What was this action?

The suggestion of pardon by Congress, for such it was, rather than authority, remained unacted on for more than a year. At length, however, on the 8th of December, 1863, the President issued a proclamation, in which he referred to that act, and offered a full pardon, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves and property in which rights of third persons had intervened, to all, with some exceptions, who, having been engaged in the rebellion as actual participants, or as aiders or abettors, would take and keep inviolate a prescribed oath. By this oath the person seeking to avail himself of the offered pardon was required to promise that he would thenceforth support the Constitution of the United States and the union of the States thereunder, and would also abide by and support all acts of Congress and all proclamations of the President in reference to slaves, unless the same should be modified or rendered void by the decision of this court.
On the 29th of May, 1865, amnesty and pardon, with the restoration of the rights of property except as to slaves, and that as to which legal proceedings had been instituted under laws of the United States, were again offered to all who had, directly or indirectly, participated in the rebellion, except certain persons included in fourteen classes. All who embraced this offer were required to take and subscribe an oath of like tenor with that required by the first proclamation.

On the 7th of September, 1867, still another proclamation was issued, offering pardon and amnesty, with restoration of property, as before and on the same oath, to all but three excepted classes.

And finally, on the 4th of July, 1868, a full pardon and amnesty was granted, with some exceptions, and on the 25th of December, 1868, without exception, unconditionally and without reservation, to all who had participated in the rebellion, with restoration of rights of property as before. No oath was required. [Ed.: This final pardon was done by President Johnson after the 1868 Presidential election when Ulysses S. Grant, former General of the United States Army, was elected President.]

What, then, was the effect of the provision of the act of 1870 upon the right of the owner of the cotton in this case? He had done certain acts which this court has adjudged to be acts in aid of the rebellion; but he abandoned the cotton to the agent of the Treasury Department, by whom it has been sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States; and he took, and has not violated, the amnesty oath under the President's proclamation. Upon this case the Court of Claims pronounced him entitled to a judgment for the net proceeds in the treasury. This decree was rendered on the 26th of May, 1869; the appeal to this court made on the 3d of June, and was filed here on the 11th of December, 1869.

The judgment of the court in the case of Padelford [76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 531 (1869)], which, in its essential features, was the same with this case, was rendered on the 30th of April, 1870. It affirmed the judgement of the Court of Claims in his favor.

Soon afterwards the provision in question was introduced as a proviso to the clause in the general appropriation bill, appropriating a sum of money for the payment of judgments of the Court of Claims, and became a part of the act, with perhaps little consideration in either House of Congress.

This proviso declares in substance that no pardon, acceptance, oath, or other act performed in pursuance, or as a condition of pardon, shall be admissible in evidence in support of any claim against the United States in the Court of Claims, or to establish the right of any claimant to bring suit in that court; nor, if already put in evidence, shall be used or considered on behalf of the claimant, by said court, or by the appellate court on appeal. Proof of loyalty is required to be made according to the provisions of certain statutes, irrespective of the effect of any executive proclamation, pardon, or amnesty, or act of oblivion; and when judgment has been already rendered on other proof of loyalty, the Supreme Court, on appeal, shall have no further jurisdiction of the cause, and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction. It is further provided that whenever any pardon, granted to any suitor in the Court of Claims, for the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, shall recite in substance that the person pardoned took part in the late rebellion, or was guilty of any act of rebellion or disloyalty, and shall have been accepted in writing without express disclaimer and protestation against the fact so recited, such pardon or acceptance shall be taken as conclusive evidence in the Court of Claims, and on appeal, that the claimant did give aid to the rebellion; and on proof of such pardon, or acceptance, which proof may be made summarily on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court shall cease, and the suit shall be forthwith dismissed.

The substance of this enactment is that an acceptance of a pardon, without disclaimer, shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court on appeal.

Undoubtedly the legislature has complete control over the organization and existence of that court and may confer or withhold the right of appeal from its decisions. And if this act did nothing more, it would be our duty to give it effect. If it simply denied the right of appeal in a particular class of cases, there could be no doubt that it must be regarded as an exercise of the power of Congress to make "such exceptions from the appellate jurisdiction" as should seem to it expedient.

But the language of the proviso shows plainly that it does not intend to withhold appellate jurisdiction except as a means to an end. Its great and controlling purpose is to deny to pardons granted by the President the effect which this court had adjudged them to have. The proviso declares that pardons shall not be considered by this court on appeal. We had already decided that it was our duty to consider them and give them effect, in cases like the present, as equivalent to proof of loyalty. It provides that whenever it shall appear that any judgment of the Court of Claims shall have been founded on such pardons, without other proof of loyalty, the Supreme Court shall have no further jurisdiction of the case and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction. The proviso further declares that every pardon granted to any suitor in the Court of Claims and reciting that the person pardoned has been guilty of any act of rebellion or disloyalty, shall, if accepted in writing without disclaimer of the fact recited, be taken as conclusive evidence in that court and on appeal, of the act recited; and on proof of pardon or acceptance, summarily made on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court shall cease and the suit shall be forthwith dismissed.

It is evident from this statement that the denial of jurisdiction to this court, as well as to the Court of Claims, is founded solely on the application of a rule of decision, in causes pending, prescribed by Congress. The court has jurisdiction of the cause to a given point; but when it ascertains that a certain state of things exists, its jurisdiction is to cease and it is required to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction.

It seems to us that this is not an exercise of the acknowledged power of Congress to make exceptions and prescribe regulations to the appellate power.

The court is required to ascertain the existence of certain facts and thereupon to declare that its jurisdiction on appeal has ceased, by dismissing the bill. What is this but to prescribe a rule for the decision of a cause in a particular way? . . . We are directed to dismiss the appeal, if we find that the judgment must be affirmed, because of a pardon granted to the intestate of the claimants. . . .
Can we do so without allowing that the legislature may prescribe rules of decision to the Judicial Department of the government in cases pending before it?
We think not; and thus thinking, we do not at all question what was decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company [59 U.S. (18 How.) 421 (1856)]. In that case, after a decree in this court that the bridge, in the then state of the law, was a nuisance and must be abated as such, Congress passed an act legalizing the structure and making it a post-road; and the court, on a motion for process to enforce the decree, held that the bridge had ceased to be a nuisance by the exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress, and denied the motion. No arbitrary rule of decision was prescribed in that case, but the court was left to apply its ordinary rules to the new circumstances created by the act. In the case before us no new circumstances have been created by legislation. But the court is forbidden to give the effect to evidence which, in its own judgment, such evidence should have, and is directed to give it an effect precisely contrary.

We must think that Congress has inadvertently passed the limit which separates the legislative from the judicial power.

It is of vital importance that these powers be kept distinct." The Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish. The same instrument, in the last clause of the same article, provides that in all cases other than those of original jurisdiction, "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

Congress has already provided that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of the judgments of the Court of Claims on appeal. Can it prescribe a rule in conformity with which the court must deny to itself the jurisdiction thus conferred, because and only because its decision, in accordance with settled law, must be adverse to the government and favorable to the suitor? This question seems to us to answer itself.

The rule prescribed is also liable to just exception as impairing the effect of a pardon, and thus infringing the constitutional power of the Executive.

It is the intention of the Constitution that each of the great co-ordinate departments of the government – the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial – shall be, in its sphere, independent of the others. To the executive alone is intrusted the power of pardon; and it is granted without limit. Pardon includes amnesty. It blots out the offence pardoned and removes all its penal consequences. It may be granted on conditions. In these particular pardons, that no doubt might exist as to their character, restoration of property was expressly pledged, and the pardon was granted on condition that the person who availed himself of it should take and keep a prescribed oath.

Now it is clear that the legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end.
Justice MILLER, with whom concurred Justice BRADLEY, dissenting.

I do agree to the proposition that the proviso to the act of July 12th, 1870, is unconstitutional, so far as it attempts to prescribe to the judiciary the effect to be given to an act of pardon or amnesty by the President. This power of pardon is confided to the President by the Constitution, and whatever may be its extent or its limits, the legislative branch of the government cannot impair its force of effect in a judicial proceeding in a constitutional court. But I have not been able to bring my mind to concur in the proposition that, under the act concerning captured and abandoned property, there remains in the former owner, who had given aid and comfort to the rebellion, any interest whatever in the property or its proceeds when it had been sold and paid into the treasury or had been converted to the use of the public under that act. I must construe this act, as all others should be construed, by seeking the intention of its framers, and the intention to restore the proceeds of such property to the loyal citizen, and to transfer it absolutely to the government in the case of those who had given active support to the rebellion, is to me too apparent to be disregarded. In the one case the government is converted into a trustee for the former owner; in the other it appropriates it to its own use as the property of a public enemy captured in war. Can it be inferred from anything found in the statute that Congress intended that this property should ever be restored to the disloyal? I am unable to discern any such intent. But if it did, why was not some provision made by which the title of the government could at some time be made perfect, or that of the owner established? Some judicial proceeding for confiscation would seem to be necessary if there remains in the disloyal owner any right or interest whatever. But there is no such provision.

In Bank Markazi v. Peterson, 136 S. Ct. 1310 (2016), a 6-2 Court held that Congress could make “as available for execution by holders of terrorism judgments against Iran ‘the financial assets that are identified in and subject to the proceedings’” in a specific identified case. The Court concluded that consistent with Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc. Congress could make this legal change while the case was pending, prior to a final decision in the case. The two-Justice dissent concluded that this congressional action was an attempt to usurp the judicial role by directing a result in a pending case, and thus violated general separation of powers principles discussed in Plaut and in United States v. Klein. Id. at 1332-35 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Sotomayor, J., dissenting). See also Patchak v. Zinke, 138 S. Ct. 897 (2018) (congressional statute directing courts to promptly dismiss suits relating to specific property held in trust by the federal government for a Native American tribe constitutional); id. at 912 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., concurring in the judgment) (without regard to jurisdiction, statute basically reinstates federal sovereign immunity over property, which is constitutional); id. at 914 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Kennedy & Gorsuch, J.J., dissenting) (by focusing on a specific piece of property, impermissible attempt to direct result in a particular case).

3. Additional Possible Limits on *Ex parte McCordle

A related set of issues concerns the extent to which Congress may limit the Court's appellate jurisdiction by legislation that either: (1) violates some prohibition found in the Constitution, such as relating to Equal Protection, Due Process, First Amendment, or Takings Clauses; or (2) violates general separation of powers principles by intruding too greatly into the powers of the judiciary.
With respect to the first issue, it is relatively well-established that other provisions in the Constitution do limit Congress’ power over jurisdiction. Thus, the Equal Protection Clause would likely prevent an attempt by Congress to remove jurisdiction in cases brought by women, minorities, or members of particular national origins. Limitations imposed on Congress’ jurisdiction-stripping power based on 5th Amendment Due Process Clause and Article I, § 9, cl. 2 Habeas Corpus Clause in enemy combatants cases are considered in Boumediene v. Bush, discussed at § 12.4.2 nn.44-52.

With respect to the second issue, it remains unsettled to what extent Congress can create barriers to the enforcement of constitutional rights through use of its power to create, or not, lower federal courts, and to create exceptions to the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction. Although bills have often been introduced into Congress that would limit the Supreme Court’s jurisdiction over controversial decisions, such as taking away appellate power over transportation remedies in school desegregation cases, or in abortion cases, or in cases involving the validity of gay marriage, these bills have never become law. Thus, this issue has never been faced directly by the Supreme Court.

Under one view, adopted by most non-formalists, who engage fully in general contextual reasoning, general separation of powers principles should prevent Congress from being able to use its power over jurisdiction to intrude too greatly into the powers of the judiciary. Of course, persons adopting this approach can differ over how much intrusion might be too much. The alternative view, adopted principally by formalists, notes that the power of Congress over jurisdiction in the Constitution is literally plenary, with the exception of the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction, and this suggests that Congress should have an unfettered role over jurisdiction in cases where Congress disagrees with the Court’s substantive decisions.

See, e.g., Michael J. Gerhardt, The Constitutional Limits to Court-Stripping, 9 Lewis & Clark L. Rev. 347 (2005) (proposed statute stripping federal courts over power to hear cases involving constitutionality of same-sex marriage bans would be unconstitutional); Martin H. Redish, Same-Sex Marriage, the Constitution, and Congressional Power to Control Federal Jurisdiction: Be Careful What You Wish For, 9 Lewis & Clark L. Rev. 363 (2005) (proposed statute would likely be constitutional, though perhaps politically unwise).

For non-formalist reasons of maintaining established government structures, as well as the liberal instrumentalist concern with protecting civil rights, and the natural law maxim of “where there is a right, there should be a remedy,” a Court majority today would likely view such congressional action as unwarranted. Even Holmesian deference-to-government Chief Justice Rehnquist noted in Felker v. Turpin\(^\text{10}\) that Congress had not attempted to remove all jurisdiction from the Court in the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 and thus “there can be no plausible argument that the Act has deprived [the Court] of jurisdiction in violation of Article III, § 2.” This suggests that if Congress had gone farther, Chief Justice Rehnquist might have had some concern.

A final set of issues regarding congressional control over federal court jurisdiction involves the question of the extent to which so-called Article I courts can be created to hear and try cases involving federal issues that are separate from Article III federal court jurisdiction. Congress has been held to have such power to create federal courts which do not have the Article III protections of life tenure and no diminution in salary in three general areas: (a) non-Article III courts in territories or the District of Columbia, because of the special congressional control over these areas listed in Constitution; (b) court-martial courts, because of congressional control over the military in the Constitution; and (c) legislative courts and administrative agency courts that adjudicate public, rather than private rights, by legislative and executive practice. Public rights cases involve actions to ensure compliance with a regulatory scheme. Since these rights are created by the legislature, and do not depend on common-law or constitutional rights, Congress can provide for Article I courts to adjudicate these claims since the rights did not have to be created by Congress in the first instance. This category includes such special courts as the Tax Court, the Patent Court, and the Claims Court, which hears cases involving claims on the federal treasury where the federal government has waived sovereign immunity, as in the Federal Tort Claims Act. This category also includes decisionmaking by Administrative Law Judges, such as for social security disability claims or immigration law matters. For further discussion of Article I courts, see Charles D. Kelso & R. Randall Kelso, The Path of Constitutional Law § 17.2.3.1 (2007) [http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials]. See generally Ortiz v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2165 (2018) (Congress may grant direct appeal from Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF), the top court in the military system, to the Supreme Court); id. at 2189 (Alito, J., joined by Gorsuch, J., dissenting) (since CAAF is not Article III court, direct appeal to Supreme Court not permissible; CAAF judges must be made Article III judges or appeal from CAAF should start in lower federal courts and then appealed to the Supreme Court).

4. Congressional Control Over Lower Federal Court Power to Grant Mandamus or Exercise Jurisdiction in Cases Within The Supreme Court’s Original Jurisdiction

With respect to lower state courts, the Supreme Court held in 1821 on grounds of intergovernmental immunity that state courts could not grant writs of mandamus against federal officials.\(^\text{11}\) The doctrine of intergovernmental immunity is also reflected in § 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which provides for Supreme Court mandamus against courts only to “any court appointed . . . under the authority of the United States,” not state courts. With respect to federal district courts, the Court also held in 1821 that federal district courts were not authorized to issue writs of mandamus in aid of diversity jurisdiction. At the time, Congress had not granted the federal district courts general “federal question” jurisdiction, which only came in 1875. Lower federal court jurisdiction to grant mandamus actions against federal officials was thus limited to the federal Circuit Court of the District of Columbia. As held in 1838, that district court could exercise mandamus jurisdiction over executive officials subject to their in personam jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, as long as the executive official had offices in the District of Columbia, which was typical.

This review was expanded by later congressional acts. During the formalist era, as part of using the federal courts to advance the Republican economic agenda to limit government regulatory power over business under the Commerce Clause, discussed at § 6.1 nn.1-10, and economic substantive due process doctrine, discussed at § 17.1.2 nn.2-18, Congress expanded the jurisdiction of the district courts in 1875 to include general federal question jurisdiction. During the Holmesian era, as part of the triumph of the New Deal administrative state, Congress granted the district courts power in 1946 to review administrative agency action pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act. In 1962, as part of the instrumentalist-era focus on providing individuals with greater protection against government abuse, Congress granted all federal district courts jurisdiction “in the nature of mandamus” to compel federal officials to perform their duties.

A different interpretation of the doctrine surrounding the mandamus provision in Marbury takes the view that the writs of prohibition and mandamus provisions of § 13 involved grants of “power” to the Supreme Court, the precise language of the second and third clauses of the last sentence of § 13, cited at § 1.2 nn.26, and not questions of “jurisdiction,” the precise language of the first clause in the last sentence of § 13. Under this view, Congress actually intended in § 13 to grant the Supreme Court general “supervisory” power to issue writs of mandamus against all federal officials, in any case whatsoever, viewing this “supervisory” power as independent of any question of original or appellate jurisdiction. This interpretation can be supported by noting that the Court, prior to Marbury, had considered a number of mandamus cases without even raising the question whether original or appellate jurisdiction was involved. Under this view, the Supreme Court, faced with Jeffersonian opposition, retreated from the established, broader reading of the Court’s supervisory power over executive action, in favor of locating mandamus power principally in lower federal courts, subject to congressional authorization. By “turning the question of access over to Congress, the Court was able to draw on the support of another branch of government before taking on the executive. Giving Congress the lead also permitted a degree of legislative experimentation with different modes of action, before settling on a final institutional arrangement.”

This would have been particularly prudent since Jefferson so strongly believed that the President was charged with enforcement of the law, not courts pursuant to a mandamus power, that Jefferson did not even send an attorney to argue his side of the case in Marbury, but ignored the proceeding altogether. Despite “backing down” on general “supervisory” judicial power, the Court could use the result in Marbury to render the grant of mandamus power in § 13 unconstitutional, thus affirming the power of judicial review. This limitation on generic judicial power, independent of a statutory grant, was mirrored in a line of cases involving the issue of a federal common law of crimes, and the federal habeas power, which culminated in 1807 in Ex parte Bollman, with the Court holding that habeas jurisdiction must rest on congressional statutory authorization, and in 1812, when in United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, the Supreme Court rejected any power to enforce a federal common law of crimes, resting federal criminal jurisdiction on statutory authorization alone.

Concerning the original jurisdiction of cases involving states, § 13 indicated that only cases involving a state versus a state entity (state, federal, or foreign government) must be brought in the Supreme Court, since § 13 provided that civil cases involving a state versus citizens, whether of their own state, other states, or aliens, can be brought in the Supreme Court, but can also be brought in 19 See Pfander, supra note 15, at 1599-1604, discussing, inter alia, Ex Parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75, 94 (1807) (allowing resort to the common law to define the elements of habeas, but insisting that Congress confer the power by written law). But see Francis Paschal, The Constitution and Habeas Corpus, 1970 Duke L.J. 605, 613-17 (1970) (arguing that the Constitution intended to give courts power to issue habeas independent of statutory authorization).

district courts. This reflects the view of the drafters of § 13 that Congress can authorize cases within the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction to be brought also in lower courts, and thus make such cases part of the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction, as part of Congress’ power to make “Regulations” regarding the exercise of the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction.21

This power was used by Congress in § 13 to permit state versus citizens cases, as well as cases brought by foreign ambassadors or public ministers, to be brought in local district courts, which geographically might make better sense in an individual case rather than requiring the case to be brought in the Nation’s capitol. At the same time, § 13 required state versus state cases and cases against foreign ambassadors or public ministers, who are likely to be domiciled in the Nation’s capitol, to be brought exclusively in the Supreme Court, again making geographic sense. Since foreign consuls and vice-consuls, as opposed to ambassadors or other public ministers, are often domiciled in cities outside the Nation’s capitol, the language in § 13 permitting cases by or against a consul or vice-consul to be brought in a district court also makes geographic sense. Given less geographic concern today, under the current statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1251(b)(1), there is original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction for all cases involving “actions or proceedings to which ambassadors, other public ministers, consuls, or vice-consuls of foreign states are parties” or “the United States and a State.” Only cases of states suing states must be brought originally in the Supreme Court.

Despite this power to authorize some cases within the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction to be brought in district courts, Congress has no power to increase the Court’s original jurisdiction. This doctrine protects litigants from having to bring such cases in the Nation’s capitol, and protects the Supreme Court from having additional cases, requiring fact-finding and possibly trials, to be added to the Court’s docket.22 For most cases involving the Court’s original jurisdiction today, the Court will refer the case to a special master, who will receive evidence and prepare a record,23 rather than the Court hearing the evidence itself. In Marbury v. Madison, however, the Court did sit as a trial court to hear evidence regarding the failure of Marbury’s commission to be delivered.24

As of the late 1990s, the Court had decided roughly 170 original jurisdiction cases in its more than two hundred years of existence. While textually this original jurisdiction appears to be mandatory, the Court has refused to grant leave in some cases it regards as “picayune, such as when the state of California filed a contract action against the state of West Virginia in 1981 based on the failure of a West Virginia state university football team to play a California state team.”25 As a basis for justifying refusals to hear such cases, the Court cited in Texas v. New Mexico\(^{26}\) the burdens imposed by both its appellate docket and 28 U.S.C. § 1251, which the Court interpreted "as providing us with substantial discretion to make case-by-case judgments as to the practical necessity of an original forum in this Court for particular disputes within our constitutional original jurisdiction." The Court noted in Massachusetts v. Missouri\(^{27}\) its qualified authority to refuse to exercise its jurisdiction, given "the broad statement that a court having jurisdiction must exercise it is not universally true."

Just as Congress cannot add cases to the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction, there is no provision in Article III permitting Congress to remove cases from the Court’s original jurisdiction. Even with respect to the cases involving states versus individuals or cases brought by ambassadors or public ministers, Congress did not remove such cases from the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction, but only provided that such cases could also be brought in district courts. The Supreme Court has always held that the Court’s original jurisdiction requires no authorizing congressional statute, but is “self-executing and needs no legislative implementation” to be effective.\(^{28}\)

Criminal cases involving state prosecution of individuals have never been held to be part of Article III’s federal jurisdiction, despite a literal reading of Article III that would include such cases. The language in § 13 regarding “civil cases” involving states underscores that the understanding of the framers and ratifiers of the Constitution was that “criminal cases” involving state law would be brought in state courts, with federal court review only for those cases that involved related federal issues, such as whether the state prosecution complied with the United States Constitution. Such review can happen either through an appeal from a state Supreme Court to the United States Supreme Court, as the Court held in Cohens v. Virginia,\(^{29}\) or by a writ of habeas corpus filed in the Supreme Court for cases involving the Court’s original jurisdiction, or in federal district courts challenging the state prosecution in other cases.\(^{30}\)

\section*{§ 2.2 \textit{Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee} and Federal Court Supremacy}

1. Federal Court Review of State Court Decisions

The core holding in Marbury v. Madison applied only to Supreme Court supremacy over the legislative branch of the federal government. Similar reasoning, however, would make the Supreme Court’s interpretation of the Constitution supreme over the federal executive branch. But can that supremacy be asserted through Supreme Court review of state court decisions?

On that question it was held in Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee that Congress can authorize federal court review of state court decisions. This was said to promote uniformity in federal law. As Justice Holmes once remarked, “I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several states.”[^31] Only the Supreme Court has been authorized by Congress to review state court decisions on direct appeal. Under habeas jurisdiction, 42 U.S.C. § 2234, habeas cases may be filed in district courts reviewing the constitutionality of state court proceedings, but these are viewed as new proceedings, not appellate review.

Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee

Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court.

[Ed.: The plaintiff brought ejectment under a patent granted in 1789 by the state of Virginia, whose title was claimed to be vested in the state by escheat from the heirs of Lord Fairfax. The district court entered judgment for defendant Martin on the ground that his title, as heir of Lord Fairfax, was protected by the 1783 treaty of peace with England. The Virginia Court of Appeals (Virginia’s highest court) reversed, holding the treaty did not apply. The Supreme Court reversed the Virginia Court of Appeals and ordered that the district court’s judgment be executed. However, on remand the Virginia Court of Appeals ruled that the Supreme Court lacked jurisdiction to reexamine the title, and refused to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court. Chief Justice Marshall did not participate in the resolution of this case, as he and his brother James had signed a contract with Martin to buy the land in dispute. Martin had prevailed in the district court, but lost at the Virginia Court of Appeals, which was dominated by Jeffersonians, not Federalists like Marshall.]

This is a writ of error from the court of appeals of Virginia, founded upon the refusal of that court to obey the mandate of this court, requiring the judgment rendered in this very cause, at February term, 1813, to be carried into due execution. The following is the judgment of the court of the United States: "The court is unanimously of opinion, that the appellate power of the supreme court of the United States does not extend to this court, under a sound construction of the constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the act of congress to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court to this court, is not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States; that the writ of error, in this cause, was improvidently allowed under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the supreme court were, coram non judice, in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court."

The questions involved in this judgment are of great importance and delicacy. Perhaps it is not too much to affirm, that, upon their right decision, rest some of the most solid principles which have hitherto been supposed to sustain and protect the constitution itself. The great respectability, too, of the court whose decisions we are called upon to review, and the entire deference which we entertain for the learning and ability of that court, add much to the difficulty of the task which has so unwelcomely fallen upon us. It is, however, a source of consolation, that we have had the assistance of most able and learned arguments to aid our inquiries; and that the opinion which is now to be pronounced has been weighed with every solicitude to come to a correct result, and matured after solemn deliberation.

Before proceeding to the principal questions, it may not be unfit to dispose of some preliminary considerations which have grown out of the arguments at the bar.

The constitution of the United States was ordained and established, not by the states in their sovereign capacities, but emphatically, as the preamble of the constitution declares, by "the people of the United States." There can be no doubt that it was competent to the people to invest the general government with all the powers which they might deem proper and necessary; to extend or restrain these powers according to their own good pleasure, and to give them a paramount and supreme authority. As little doubt can there be, that the people had a right to prohibit to the states the exercise of any powers which were, in their judgment, incompatible with the objects of the general compact; to make the powers of the state governments, in given cases, subordinate to those of the nation, or to reserve to themselves those sovereign authorities which they might not choose to delegate to either. The constitution was not, therefore, necessarily carved out of existing state sovereignties, nor a surrender of powers already existing in state institutions, for the powers of the states depend upon their own constitutions; and the people of every state had the right to modify and restrain them, according to their own views of policy or principle. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the sovereign powers vested in the state governments, by their respective constitutions, remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the government of the United States.

These deductions do not rest upon general reasoning, plain and obvious as they seem to be. They have been positively recognized by one of the articles in amendment of the constitution, which declares, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people.”

The government, then, of the United States, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the constitution, and the powers actually granted, must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication. On the other hand, this instrument, like every other grant, is to have a reasonable construction, according to the import of its terms; and where a power is expressly given in general terms, it is not to be restrained to particular cases, unless that construction grow out of the context expressly, or by necessary implication. The words are to be taken in their natural and obvious sense, and not in a sense unreasonably restricted or enlarged.

The constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which, at the present, might seem salutary, might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mould and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom, and the public interests, should require.

Such is the language of the article creating and defining the judicial power of the United States. It is the voice of the whole American people solemnly declared, in establishing one great department of that government which was, in many respects, national, and in all, supreme. It is a part of the very same instrument which was to act not merely upon individuals, but upon states; and to deprive them altogether of the exercise of some powers of sovereignty, and to restrain and regulate them in the exercise of others.

This leads us to the consideration of the great question as to the nature and extent of the appellate jurisdiction of the United States. We have already seen that appellate jurisdiction is given by the constitution to the supreme court in all cases where it has not original jurisdiction; subject, however, to such exceptions and regulations as congress may prescribe. It is, therefore, capable of embracing every case enumerated in the constitution, which is not exclusively to be decided by way of original jurisdiction. But the exercise of appellate jurisdiction is far from being limited by the terms of the constitution to the supreme court. There can be no doubt that congress may create a succession of inferior tribunals, in each of which it may vest appellate as well as original jurisdiction. The judicial power is delegated by the constitution in the most general terms, and may, therefore, be exercised by congress under every variety of form, of appellate or original jurisdiction. And as there is nothing in the constitution which restrains or limits this power, it must, therefore, in all other cases, subsist in the utmost latitude of which, in its own nature, it is susceptible.

As, then, by the terms of the constitution, the appellate jurisdiction is not limited as to the supreme court, and as to this court it may be exercised in all other cases than those of which it has original cognizance, what is there to restrain its exercise over state tribunals in the enumerated cases? The appellate power is not limited by the terms of the third article to any particular courts. The words are, "the judicial power (which includes appellate power) shall extend to all cases," &c., and "in all other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction." It is the case, then, and not the court, that gives the jurisdiction. If the judicial power extends to the case, it will be in vain to search in the letter of the constitution for any qualification as to the tribunal where it depends. It is incumbent, then, upon those who assert such a qualification to show its existence by necessary implication. If the text be clear and distinct, no restriction upon its plain and obvious import ought to be admitted, unless the inference be irresistible.
If the constitution meant to limit the appellate jurisdiction to cases pending in the courts of the United States, it would necessarily follow that the jurisdiction of these courts would, in all the cases enumerated in the constitution, be exclusive of state tribunals. How otherwise could the jurisdiction extend to all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, or to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? If some of these cases might be entertained by state tribunals, and no appellate jurisdiction as to them should exist, then the appellate power would not extend to all, but to some, cases. If state tribunals might exercise concurrent jurisdiction over all or some of the other classes of cases in the constitution without control, then the appellate jurisdiction of the United States might, as to such cases, have no real existence, contrary to the manifest intent of the constitution. Under such circumstances, to give effect to the judicial power, it must be construed to be exclusive; and this not only when the casus foederis should arise directly, but when it should arise, incidentally, in cases pending in state courts. This construction would abridge the jurisdiction of such court far more than has been ever contemplated in any act of congress.

On the other hand, if, as has been contended, a discretion be vested in congress to establish, or not to establish, inferior courts at their own pleasure, and congress should not establish such courts, the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court would have nothing to act upon, unless it could act upon cases pending in the state courts. Under such circumstances it must be held that the appellate power would extend to state courts; for the constitution is peremptory that it shall extend to certain enumerated cases, which cases could exist in no other courts. Any other construction, upon this supposition, would involve this strange contradiction, that a discretionary power vested in congress, and which they might rightfully omit to exercise, would defeat the absolute injunctions of the constitution in relation to the whole appellate power.

It must, therefore, be conceded that the constitution not only contemplated, but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals. It was foreseen that in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, state courts would incidentally take cognizance of cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States. Yet to all these cases the judicial power, by the very terms of the constitution, is to extend. It cannot extend by original jurisdiction if that was already rightfully and exclusively attached in the state courts, which (as has been already shown) may occur; it must, therefore, extend by appellate jurisdiction, or not at all.

It has been argued that such an appellate jurisdiction over state courts is inconsistent with the genius of our governments, and the spirit of the constitution. That the latter was never designed to act upon state sovereignties, but only upon the people, and that if the power exists, it will materially impair the sovereignty of the states, and the independence of their courts. We cannot yield to the force of this reasoning; it assumes principles which we cannot admit, and draws conclusions to which we do not yield our assent.

It is a mistake that the constitution was not designed to operate upon states, in their corporate capacities. It is crowded with provisions which restrain or annul the sovereignty of the states in some of the highest branches of their prerogatives. The tenth section of the first article contains a long list of disabilities and prohibitions imposed upon the states. Surely, when such essential portions of state sovereignty are taken away, or prohibited to be exercised, it cannot be correctly asserted that the constitution does not act upon the states. The language of the constitution is also imperative upon the states as to the performance of many duties. It is imperative upon the state legislatures to make laws prescribing the time, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, and for electors of president and vice-president. And in these, as well as some other cases, congress have a right to revise, amend, or supercede the laws which may be passed by state legislatures. When, therefore, the states are stripped of some of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and the same are given to the United States; when the legislatures of the states are, in some respects, under the control of congress, and in every case are, under the constitution, bound by the paramount authority of the United States; it is certainly difficult to support the argument that the appellate power over the decisions of state courts is contrary to the genius of our institutions. The courts of the United States can, without question, revise the proceedings of the executive and legislative authorities of the states, and if they are found to be contrary to the constitution, may declare them to be of no legal validity. Surely the exercise of the same right over judicial tribunals is not a higher or more dangerous act of sovereign power.

Nor can such a right be deemed to impair the independence of state judges. It is assuming the very ground in controversy to assert that they possess an absolute independence of the United States. In respect to the powers granted to the United States, they are not independent; they are expressly bound to obedience by the letter of the constitution; and if they should unintentionally transcend their authority, or misconstrue the constitution, there is no more reason for giving their judgments an absolute and irresistible force, than for giving it to the acts of the other co-ordinate departments of state sovereignty.

The argument urged from the possibility of the abuse of the revising power, is equally unsatisfactory. It is always a doubtful course, to argue against the use or existence of a power, from the possibility of its abuse. It is still more difficult, by such an argument, to ingraft upon a general power a restriction which is not to be found in the terms in which it is given. From the very nature of things, the absolute right of decision, in the last resort, must rest somewhere – wherever it may be vested it is susceptible of abuse. In all questions of jurisdiction the inferior, or appellate court, must pronounce the final judgment; and common sense, as well as legal reasoning, has conferred it upon the latter.

This is not all. A motive of another kind, perfectly compatible with the most sincere respect for state tribunals, might induce the grant of appellate power over their decisions. That motive is the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different states, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the constitution itself: If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable; and it cannot be believed that they could have escaped the enlightened convention which formed the constitution.
On the whole, the court are of opinion, that the appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and that the 25th section of the judiciary act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the constitution. We find no clause in that instrument which limits this power; and we dare not interpose a limitation where the people have not been disposed to create one.

Strong as this conclusion stands upon the general language of the constitution, it may still derive support from other sources. It is an historical fact, that this exposition of the constitution, extending its appellate power to state courts, was, previous to its adoption, uniformly and publicly avowed by its friends, and admitted by its enemies, as the basis of their respective reasonings, both in and out of the state conventions. It is an historical fact, that at the time when the judiciary act was submitted to the deliberations of the first congress, composed, as it was, not only of men of great learning and ability, but of men who had acted a principal part in framing, supporting, or opposing that constitution, the same exposition was explicitly declared and admitted by the friends and by the opponents of that system. It is an historical fact, that the supreme court of the United States have, from time to time, sustained this appellate jurisdiction in a great variety of cases, brought from the tribunals of many of the most important states in the union, and that no state tribunal has ever breathed a judicial doubt on the subject, or declined to obey the mandate of the supreme court, until the present occasion. This weight of contemporaneous exposition by all parties, this acquiescence of enlightened state courts, and these judicial decisions of the supreme court through so long a period, do, as we think, place the doctrine upon a foundation of authority which cannot be shaken, without delivering over the subject to perpetual and irremediable doubts.

We have not thought it incumbent on us to give any opinion upon the question, whether this court have authority to issue a writ of mandamus to the court of appeals to enforce the former judgments, as we do not think it necessarily involved in the decision of this cause.

It is the opinion of the whole court, that the judgment of the court of appeals of Virginia, rendered on the mandate in this cause, be reversed, and the judgment of the district court, held at Winchester be, and the same is hereby affirmed.

2. Implications of Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee

The holding in Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee was extended to appeals in state criminal cases by Cohens v. Virginia. There was a literal, textual argument against this result, that is, that the Court could not have appellate jurisdiction because a state is a party in such a case, and the Court is granted original jurisdiction over cases in which "a State shall be a party." Marshall admitted there was dicta in Marbury stating that the grant of original jurisdiction implied the negative that Congress could not give the Court appellate jurisdiction over cases within its original jurisdiction. However, he distinguished Marbury, reasoning that the grant of original jurisdiction over cases in which a state is a party should not be construed to bar the appeal of cases involving a state where the subject is a question arising under federal law but where the case, from its nature, as in state criminal prosecutions, could not originate in the Supreme Court. Marshall said that to bar jurisdiction over such an appeal would destroy some purposes for which appellate power was conferred. Reflecting the natural law willingness fully to consider purpose, which is distinguishable from the formalist great reliance on literal text alone, Marshall stated that a negative should be implied from words granting original jurisdiction only where that promotes, not defeats, the intention of the framers.

Despite this concern for uniformity, state courts need not follow lower federal courts’ interpretation of the Constitution. Under the “dual theory of sovereignty,” addressed at § 8.1.2, state courts are part of an independent state judiciary, not hierarchically under the control of the lower federal courts. Thus, it is theoretically possible for a state court and a lower federal court to have differing views on the constitutionality of some state or federal law. Of course, the Supreme Court has the power under Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee to resolve the conflict with a decision binding both state and lower federal courts. Prudential considerations of uniformity of result, however, mean that most state courts pay great attention to lower federal court decisions on matters of federal statutory or constitutional law. The usual practice is that state courts ask themselves how the Supreme Court would decide a question, and use lower federal court decisions as well as Supreme Court decisions to answer that question. Not surprisingly, state courts tend to give great weight to lower federal court decisions if all the federal decisions have gone the same way. Reflecting the sovereignty of the state courts from the lower federal courts, however, a state court in California, a state part of the federal Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, noted that no greater weight need be given to decisions by the Ninth Circuit than to decisions from other circuits. In practice, most state courts do pay more attention to federal opinions from the federal circuit court overseeing their state.

Under the dual theory of sovereignty, state Supreme Courts are the authoritative interpreters of the meaning of state law matters, including whether state statutes violate state constitutional provisions. Both the United States Supreme Court, and lower federal courts, are bound by state Supreme Court decisions on state law matters, as long as that state law does not conflict with federal statutes or the United States Constitution. In case of conflict, the Supremacy Clause of Article VI, cl. 2 of the United States Constitution provides: “This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land.”

3. Doctrine of Adequate and Independent State Grounds

Reflecting the dual theory of sovereignty, state Supreme Court decisions on purely state law matters cannot be reviewed by federal courts, since state Supreme Courts are the authoritative interpreters of their own state law. See Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U.S. 590 (1875). Further, issues of federal law resolved by a state Supreme Court will not be reviewed on appeal by federal courts if the state Supreme Court judgment rests upon an "adequate and independent" state ground. See Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983). Thus, a state Supreme Court decision invalidating a state law on both state and federal constitutional grounds will not be reviewed by the United States Supreme Court because that would result in nothing more than an advisory opinion. However, a state court's decision on state law grounds will not block Supreme Court review in two rare cases. These are if the state decision involves: (1) a good faith interpretation of state law that places unreasonable obstacles in the way of enforcing federal rights, such as a rule of local procedure that would frustrate the vindication of federal rights; or (2) an attempt to evade federal law through a strained interpretation of state law, as might occur with a strained interpretation of whether a contract exists or what rights were granted in the contract to avoid Contract Clause review, or what is property to evade Takings Clause review.

Suppose it is unclear whether the state court decision rests upon an adequate and independent state ground? In Michigan v. Long, Justice O'Connor wrote for the Court that if a state decision seems to rest on or be interwoven with federal law, and the adequacy and independence of any possible state ground is not made clear by a plain statement, the Court will assume the state court believed that federal law required the decision. The Court will not review a state case if the state court makes a plain statement that federal cases are used only to guide the decision on state law. Justice O'Connor explained that this approach would serve the need for uniformity in federal law; reflect the dual theory of sovereignty, by expressing respect for state courts and minimizing interference by not asking state courts to clarify their opinions; manage the Court’s resources by minimizing the need for federal courts to determine state law; and help avoid advisory opinions. Each of these goals has been substantially served in practice by operation of the Michigan v. Long rule.

41 See generally Michael Esler, Michigan v. Long: A Twenty-Year Retrospective, 66 Albany L. Rev. 835 (2003). Each of the four liberal instrumentalists on the Court at the time Michigan v. Long was decided dissented. Justice Stevens’ dissent was the most forceful, adopting the opposite presumption that the state grounds were independent absent a clear statement to the contrary. 463 U.S. at 1066-68 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Such a presumption would also make it easier for state courts to develop their own constitutional law that might provide for greater protection for
For the separate issue of cases heard in federal court that involve resolving issues of state law, as can occur in diversity cases or interpretation of a state statute to determine if the statute violates federal law or the United States Constitution, federal courts must follow state Supreme Court opinions on point. Where the state law is not clear, federal courts will give persuasive weight to the opinions of state Supreme Courts and lower state courts on the meaning of state law; may “certify” a question on state law to a state Supreme Court asking that court for guidance in cases where the meaning of state law is not clear; or may abstain from deciding the case, based on the uncertainty.\textsuperscript{42}

The United States Supreme Court has indicated that it will give some deferential weight to a federal Court of Appeals judgment on the meaning of state law for those states covered by that federal Court of Appeals, on the ground that those judges are more likely to be familiar with those state law issues than the Supreme Court; however, that deference is often rebutted in practice.\textsuperscript{43} The Court indicated in \textit{Salve Regina College v. Russell}\textsuperscript{44} that Court of Appeals should not give such deference to district court determinations of state law, but instead apply \textit{de novo} review, based upon the better institutional competence of court of appeals judges to determine question of law, as opposed to questions of fact. Commentators have disagreed over the wisdom of the \textit{Salve Regina} decision.\textsuperscript{45}

Determining the meaning of a provision in a state Constitution can be particularly difficult for both state and federal courts where many state Constitutions have similar provisions. The question naturally arises whether the framers and ratifiers in any one state intended their provision to have similar meaning to similar provisions in other state Constitutions.46

4. Constitutional and Prudential Due Process Clause Restraints on Jurisdiction of Cases Heard in Federal and State Courts

In addition to congressional restraints on federal court jurisdiction, the Fifth and 14th Amendment Due Process Clauses impose limits on federal and state courts concerning the assertion of personal jurisdiction over defendants. There are two kinds of personal jurisdiction: general and specific. If there is general jurisdiction, the defendant must defend regardless of whether the action arose in the state where the lawsuit has been brought, the so-called “forum” state. General jurisdiction exists when a defendant’s contacts with the forum state are sufficiently substantial, continuous, and systematic, even if unrelated to the instant cause of action.47 Specific jurisdiction may be found where a foreign defendant has purposively directed activities at residents of the forum, and the litigation results from alleged injuries that arise out of, or relate to, those activities.48

During the original natural law era and the formalist era, the Court followed the customary rules regarding personal jurisdiction that focused on whether the defendant resided in the forum state, consented to suit in the forum state, or whether service on the defendant had been able to be brought in the forum state based on the defendant’s presence in the state, as in Pennoyer v. Neff.49 However, in 1945, the Court broadened the required contacts in International Shoe Co. v. Washington50 to include all non-residents who have such minimum contacts with the forum that maintenance of the suit does not offend “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” Such minimum contacts have been held to exist when “the defendant’s conduct and connection with the forum state are such that he or she should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there.”51 In assessing the defendant’s reasonable anticipation, “it is essential in each case that there be some act by which the defendant purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws.”

Reflecting the greater use of factor weighing approaches since 1937, addressed at § 1.1.4, the courts post-International Shoe examine several factors to make this “minimum contacts” determination. These include: (1) the nature and quality of the defendant’s contacts with the forum state; (2) the quantity of the contacts; (3) the relationship between the cause of action and the contacts; (4) the forum state’s interest in providing a forum for its residents; and (5) the convenience of the parties.

While the instrumentalist-era decisions had an expansive view of when personal jurisdiction could exist, so the court would have the power to hear the case and get to the merits, the modern natural law approach, being more of an analytic approach following the logic of the facts, combined with formalist literalism and Holmesian deference-to-government, has meant the Court has been less willing to find personal jurisdiction exists in close cases today.

54 Since 2010, the Court has limited “general jurisdiction” by recasting the (a) “fair play and substantial justice” and (b) “continuous and systematic” language from International Shoe, with one factor being “[a]n ‘estimate of the inconveniences’ which would result to the corporation from a trial away from its ‘home’ or principal place of business,” id. at 317, to state general jurisdiction now applies only when the “affiliations with the State are so ‘continuous and systematic’ as to render them essentially at home in the forum state.” Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 131 S. Ct. 2846, 2851 (2011) (mere fact the tires made by Goodyear’s foreign subsidiaries may have reached North Carolina through stream of commerce insufficient to create general jurisdiction); Bauman v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 644 F.3d 909 (9th Cir. 2011), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied, 676 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 2011) (Mercedes-Benz USA has substantial contacts in California, and it is DaimlerChrysler’s agent for purposes of personal jurisdiction), rev’d, 134 S. Ct. 746, 761 (2014) (no general jurisdiction over Daimler-Chrysler AG, despite Mercedes-Benz USA being Daimler’s agent for distributing Daimler-manufactured vehicles). Absent place of incorporation or principal place of business, it is now unclear what “exceptional circumstances” exist to find a business is “essentially at home” in the forum state. See, e.g., BNSF R. Co. v. Tyrrell, 137 S. Ct. 1549 (2017) (no general jurisdiction to sue BNSF Railway Co. in Montana for injuries to railroad workers outside of Montana, despite BNSF having over 2,000 employees in Montana and 2,000 miles of track in Montana, as BSNF was not incorporated in Montana, nor did it have its principal place of business in Montana, nor was it like Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co., 342 U.S. 437 (1952), where defendant temporarily located its principal place of business from the Philippines to Ohio during World War II); 137 S.Ct. at 1560 (Sotomayor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (Court should follow International Shoe and find contacts are sufficient).
In addition to this Due Process constitutional constraint, the Court also has developed a prudential restraint on the exercise of jurisdiction. Under the forum non conveniens doctrine, courts will decline constitutionally permissible jurisdiction if another court is a more convenient forum for the lawsuit. This convenience may result from the easier availability of that forum for the plaintiff, the defendant, or witnesses that may be called to testify at trial.55

§ 2.3 Judicial Review During Eras of Supreme Court Decisionmaking

1. Judicial Review During the Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

As noted at § 1.2 nn.28-30, the Court’s ultimate conclusion in Marbury was that the Court lacked original jurisdiction to grant Marbury’s mandamus request to require delivery of his commission for a position as a federal justice of the peace. Thus, Jefferson and Jefferson’s Secretary of State, James Madison, prevailed in the case. Given this conclusion, the Supreme Court, per Chief Justice Marshall, was able to criticize the Jefferson Administration for violating Marbury’s rights by denying him the commission, while avoiding the risk of impeachment by the Jeffersonians if the Court had ordered Marbury’s commission to be delivered. Federal judges who differed with the Jeffersonians faced a risk of impeachment, as shown by the impeachment of Justice Chase in 1804, discussed at § 10.2.2 n.35. As stated by Professor Kermit Hall, “Marshall seems to have believed (probably correctly) that if Chase had been convicted, he would have been the next target.”56

This result in Marbury blunted opposition by the Jeffersonians to the broader aspects of Chief Justice Marshall's reasoning on judicial review. Thus, Marshall planted a seed which grew to

Republic of Peru, 665 F.3d 384 (2nd Cir. 2011) (Peruvian statute limiting to 3 percent the portion of an agency’s budget that can go toward paying a judgment was a strong factor counseling an American court is not the proper forum to resolve $21 million dispute between American engineering company and Peruvian government). See generally Robert C. become the modern version of judicial review. Regarding the “in pursuance” language of Article VI, probably the better reading of that text, consistent with Marbury, is that it refers not only to procedural limitations on legislation action, but also to substantive limitations. For example, a law “that went through bicameralism and presentment and that abrogated the right to jury trial hardly seems to have been ‘made in pursuance’ of the Constitution. Instead, such a statute would be ‘made in opposition’ to the Constitution.”57 During Marshall's tenure as Chief Justice, the only other case holding an act of Congress unconstitutional was *Hodgson v. Bowerbank*58 in 1809. As in Marbury, the result in Hodgson could be justified under the tripartite theory because the Court struck down a provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789 regarding jurisdiction to hear cases where an “alien is a party,” which was alleged to confer jurisdiction on federal courts to try suits between aliens, a subject matter not mentioned in Article III's list of cases to which federal judicial power extends.

The next act of Congress to be found invalid, an act to which the tripartite theory could not be applied, was the Missouri Compromise, struck down, at least in dicta, in 1857 in Dred Scott v. Sandford,59 excerpted at § 16.4.2. However, that case can hardly be regarded as a solid foundation for judicial review, since it was overruled by the Civil War Amendments. The flaws in the Dred Scott opinion, however, did provoke comment regarding the nature of Supreme Court precedents. For example, in his First Inaugural Address, President Abraham Lincoln admitted that Supreme Court decisions were entitled to great respect by other departments, but expressed doubt whether a judicial declaration of unconstitutionality ought to be binding on other persons acting in their representative capacities. President Lincoln said: “The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the government upon vital questions affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased, to be their own rulers, having, to that extent, practically resigned their government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.”60

This view is consistent with Marbury. Indeed, this view had been used earlier by President Andrew Jackson, who vetoed in 1834 a bill to re-authorize the Second National Bank of the United States, whose 20-year charter ran out in 1836, in part based on his view that the bank was unconstitutional, even though the Court in 1819 had declared it constitutional in McCulloch v. Maryland. Jackson’s view was that as President he could make his own determination of constitutionality for purpose of justifying a presidential veto. Similarly, under Marbury, Congress is free to refuse to pass a bill on grounds that a majority of House or Senate believe the bill unconstitutional, even if Court precedents suggest a different result. Indeed, Congress is free to pass a bill that Court precedents suggest is unconstitutional, as Congress did when passing a “no flag burning” bill after the Court had struck down in Texas v. Johnson a similar state “no flag burning” statute. Predictably, in United States v. Eichman, the Court struck down the congressional statute.61

A more extreme view was stated in 1987 by Attorney General Ed Meese, but was later withdrawn. Under that view, a judicial decision is binding “only with respect to the named parties, leaving officials theoretically free to ignore the Supreme Court’s pronouncement in dealing with the remainder of the public – at least until officials are once again taken to court.”62 Such a view, adopting a form of civil disobedience by government actors, is contrary to respect for Marbury’s principle of judicial review. An even more vigorous rejection of Marbury is reflected in President Jackson’s ignoring the Supreme Court’s decision in 1832 in Worcester v. Georgia protecting the Cherokee tribe in Georgia, and instead marching them on the “Trail of Tears” to Oklahoma. Jackson is “apocryphally” reported to have said, “John Marshall made his decision; now let him enforce it.”63

After Dred Scott, the next case to invalidate an act of Congress was the Legal Tender Act, which made paper treasury notes valid even for preexisting debts, struck down in 1870 in Hepburn v. Griswold. That case was promptly overruled in 1871 in Knox v. Lee.64 In sum, the power of judicial review, while stated in Marbury, was not cemented by frequent use from 1789 to 1873.

2. Judicial Review During the Formalist Era: 1873-1937

Between 1873 and 1937, formalist-era courts had only to apply Marbury and Hunter’s Lessee to the cases that came before them. Despite lack of explicit textual support, the doctrine of judicial review had ceased to be an innovation and had become a part of the American legal system. In terms of formalist theories of precedent, addressed at § 2.4.6 n.79, judicial review had become “settled law.” As a consequence, during the formalist era, many statutes were struck down as unconstitutional. By the turn of the century, the Court had struck down application of the Sherman Act to manufacturers in United States v. E.C. Knight Co., and was on its way to the many cases in the early 1900s that struck down acts of Congress or state legislatures as violations of the 14th Amendment Due Process Clause or the Commerce Clause.65 During this Lochner era the Court was concerned by what it saw

as deprivations by legislatures of rights to contract and own property, rights thought necessary for a successful economy. Criticism of formalist-era decisionmaking focused more on the formalist style of constitutional interpretation, and not on the fact of judicial review itself.66

The Holmesian era between 1937 and 1954 was characterized by a retreat from Lochner-era review of social and economic legislation. Consistent with the Holmesian approach toward judicial review, the Court gave considerable deference to legislative and executive decisions. The Court invalidated only three minor actions of Congress during this period. In 1943, the Court struck down § 2(f) of the Firearms Act, which established a presumption of guilt based on a prior conviction and present possession of a firearm. In 1946, the Court held that Congress had created an invalid Bill of Attainder when it provided that no salary should be paid to certain named federal employees. In 1952, the Court held void for vagueness under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment a provision of the Federal Food and Drug Act that imposed criminal liability for refusing entry or inspection of business premises.67 The Supreme Court also held the President in check and invalidated a few state laws. For example, the Court held that President Truman violated the Constitution when he seized a steel mill to prevent a strike that could interfere with production needed for military action in Korea.68 As an example of a state law invalidated, the Court held that enforcement of a racially restrictive covenant was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.69

Despite a fewer number of cases holding governmental acts unconstitutional during the Holmesian era, as opposed to the formalist era, the basic concept of the judicial power to engage in judicial review remained as a matter of settled law. The main contribution of Holmesian jurists to the concept of judicial review was Holmesian Justice Brandeis’ statement in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority of seven basic principles of prudence that should be used to guide judicial review. Although these prudential principles are adopted by judges in each of the four decisionmaking styles, and Ashwander was decided in 1936 at the end of the formalist era, just predating the dawn of the Holmesian era, the principles are most consistent with the Holmesian focus on judicial restraint and deference to government. These Ashwander prudential principles state that the Court:

1. will not pass upon the constitutionality of legislation in a friendly, nonadversary case, because to decide such questions “is legitimate only as a last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest, and vital controversy between individuals.”
2. will not “anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it.”
3. will not “formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied.”
4. will not pass upon a constitutional question although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of.
5. will not pass upon the validity of a statute upon complaint of one who fails to show that he is injured by its operation.
6. will not pass upon the constitutionality of a statute at the instance of one who has availed himself of its benefits.
7. “. . . even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised, . . . will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.”

An additional principle of judicial restraint suggests:

8. the Court should be willing to remand cases to lower federal courts if further factual development is necessary for a truly informed decision on constitutionality to be made.

4. Judicial Review During the Instrumentalist Era: 1954-1986

The instrumentalist Court between 1954 and 1986 remade many areas of constitutional law by frequent use of the power to declare unconstitutional both federal and state laws. The Court in those 33 years invalidated more than 50 congressional acts in whole or in part, beginning in 1954 when holding that Congress may not operate racially segregated schools in the District of Columbia. Of course, the Court also applied the Marbury principle of judicial review to executive branch action, including action of the President,\textsuperscript{74} and to action by states, including state legislatures and Governors.\textsuperscript{75} Many of these cases involved civil rights challenges to government action, or involved the rights of criminal defendants. This is consistent with the instrumentalist predisposition toward judicial review, which views the Court as a protector of the unempowered in society, with a special focus on civil liberties protections in the Constitution.

5. Judicial Review During the Modern Natural Law Era: 1986-Today

The pace of invalidating laws has ebbed somewhat during the period of domination by modern natural law Justices, and the emphasis has shifted from the heightened instrumentalist concern over civil rights to a concern with structural matters as well. For example, the modern Court has invalidated a number of congressional statutes that attempted to abrogate state 11th Amendment immunity by authorizing civil actions against states as a means of enforcing the 14th Amendment. The Court found in each case that Congress exceeded its enforcement power because it had not sufficiently identified state violations of the 14th Amendment, addressed at § 8.2.3. The Court has found unconstitutional statutes exceeding Congress’ Commerce Clause power, addressed at § 6.4.\textsuperscript{76}

Based on the practice of 200 years of legislative and executive acquiescence, and uniform Court precedents, the doctrine of judicial review is firmly established in the law today. Under this doctrine, courts may declare a law invalid "on its face," so that it cannot be applied to any fact situation, or declare the law "invalid as applied" to a particular fact situation. The Court has expressed a preference for first considering an "as applied" challenge, since that enables courts to avoid making unnecessarily broad constitutional judgments.\textsuperscript{77}

As of 2000, the Supreme Court had declared 156 Acts of Congress unconstitutional, and had invalidated roughly 1,150 state laws. Among the 156 Acts of Congress, ten involved the District of Columbia. Among the remaining 146, only 26 occurred in the nineteenth century, with the remaining 120 from 1900-2000, with 37 by the Rehnquist Court since 1986.\textsuperscript{78}

\textsuperscript{74} See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974) (the President does not have an absolute claim of confidentiality for all communications).

§ 2.4 Limits on the Supreme Court’s Power of Judicial Review

There are a number of federal, state, and citizen limits on the Supreme Court’s power of judicial review.

1. Congressional Regulatory Power

As addressed at § 2.1, Congress has the power under Ex parte McCordle to regulate the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as well as regulate the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts, subject to a potential limit that Congress could not so limit the Supreme Court’s jurisdiction so at to undermine the judicial role “emphatically . . . to declare what the law is,” as stated in Marbury. As discussed at § 10.1 nn.2-3, Congress also has the power to change the size of the Supreme Court through legislation, and the Senate has the power to confirm Presidential nominees to the federal bench. This limits which judges will be deciding cases under the power of judicial review.

2. Congressional Spending and Impeachment Power

Under its Spending Clause power, addressed at § 7.2, Congress has the power to cut funding for federal courts and refuse to give pay raises to federal judges. Congress cannot decrease federal judicial salaries because of Article III, § 1 which provides, “The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, as stated Times, receive for their services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.” As discussed at § 10.2.2 n.35, Congress has the power of impeachment for both executive officials and federal judges in cases of “Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors,” a power Congress has used sparingly, removing only a handful of judges, most for bribery.

3. Executive Limitations

As discussed at § 10.1 nn.1-2, the President is given the power to nominate judges to the federal bench. In practice, for judges appointed to the lower federal courts, Presidents often consult with Senators from the affected States before making a nomination. As discussed at § 2.3.1 nn.60-61, Presidents have their own power to make judgments on the constitutionality of government action in the absence of direct Supreme Court precedent on point, as indicated by President Lincoln’s response to the Supreme Court’s decision in Dred Scott v. Sanford. As discussed at § 10.3 nn.47-50, Presidents have prosecutorial discretion to make decisions regarding enforcement of the law, subject to the reminder in Article II, § 3 that “he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.”

4. State and Individual Citizen Limitations

State officials, and the populace generally, also have the ability to protest federal court decisions with which they disagree, and may be reluctant to enforce vigorously or abide by decisions with which they disagree. A prominent example involves certain societal responses to the Supreme Court’s decision in 1954 in Brown v. Board of Education to require schools to desegregate, discussed at § 21.1 nn.1-2, 16-18.
5. Justiciability Limitations

An additional set of limitations, discussed in Chapters 3 & 4, is that federal courts can only hear cases which are justiciable. This requires that a party bring a lawsuit, that party have standing, the case is ripe for resolution, is not moot, and does not involve an issue which is a political question inappropriate for Court review. The Supreme Court has no power to reach out and render advisory opinions on the constitutionality of government action.

6. Judicial Precedents

Prior court precedents also limit, to some extent, how the Supreme Court decides cases today. Formalist and natural law judges, whose analytic approach to law makes highly relevant the logical elaboration of doctrine, tend to weigh heavily in their consideration of precedent whether it appears to represent "settled law." Holmesian judges, because they take a positivist approach to the law, also evidence a willingness to follow precedents with which they disagree if the precedent represents settled law. Justice Scalia has defined such "settled law" as "long-standing and well-accepted principles (not out of accord with the general practices of our people, whether or not they were constitutionally required as an original matter)."

A second reason to follow a precedent even if it was wrongly decided is that individuals have substantially relied on the precedent. It is a familiar notion that where individuals have substantially relied to their detriment on some promise, or some represented state of affairs, other individuals may be estopped from changing or denying that state of affairs in order to protect the reliance interest. This can also be true of precedents. As Justice Brandeis observed in Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., "Stare decisis is usually the wise policy, because in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right." In Payne v. Tennessee, Justice Rehnquist noted that cases "involving contract and property rights" are the ones most likely to engender substantial reliance that is important from the perspective of stare decisis. This is because overruling would upset expectations upon which people have relied in making financial, business, employment, or other kinds of important commitments. In contrast, according to Justice Rehnquist, cases "involving procedural or evidentiary rules" are not as likely to involve such substantial reliance. Justice Rehnquist noted in Payne, "Applying these general principles, the Court has during the past 20 Terms overruled in whole or in part 33 of its previous constitutional decisions."

80 See, e.g., Restatement 2d, Contracts § 90 (promissory estoppel); Strong v. County of Santa Cruz, 542 P.2d 264, 266 (Cal. 1975) (equitable estoppel).

83 Id. at 828 & n.1 (listing of cases).
Because of a functional understanding of doctrine as a means to individuals' and society's ends, Holmesian judges tend to weigh this variable very heavily in their consideration of precedent. Since reliance is linked to certainty and predictability in the law, as well as to traditional notions of equity and the background moral principle of protecting individuals' reasonable reliance, the concern with reliance upon a precedent is also given significant weight by formalist and natural law judges. However, as between the considerations of settled law versus reliance, the analytic predisposition of the formalist approach has meant that formalist judges tend to place greater weight on whether the precedent is settled law, rather than a concern with substantial reliance. For the Holmesian approach, the functional concern with substantial reliance tends to be equally, if not more, important.

Because instrumentalist jurists embrace the notion of an evolving constitution to cope with current problems and current needs, they do not want to be straight-jacked by a reasoned elaboration of precedents if those precedents are against the instrumentalist's view of text, context, history, practice, and prudential considerations. Thus, instrumentalist judges have been quite willing to overrule precedents, and create new doctrine.

Of course, where the proper social policies would be advanced by maintaining adherence to precedent, an instrumentalist judge may emphasize the importance of precedents, as in Justice Marshall's dissent in Payne v. Tennessee. There, he stated, “Because I believe this Court owes more to its constitutional precedents in general and to Booth and Gathers in particular, I dissent.” However, given the willingness of instrumentalist judges to overrule of precedents between 1954 and 1986, one must take with a grain of salt Justice Marshall's statements in Payne on the importance of stare decisis. Justice Scalia’s concurrence in the case, joined by Justices O'Connor and Kennedy, responded, “The response to Justice Marshall’s strenuous defense of the virtues of stare decisis can be found in the writings of Justice Marshall himself. . . . It seems difficult for those who were in the majority in Booth to hold themselves forth as ardent apostles of stare decisis.”

For natural law judges, a sequence of court decisions, that is, a reasoned elaboration of precedent, can provide a gloss on meaning that changes what the Constitution means. Thus, the question is not just what the other sources of interpretation suggest about a constitutional provision's meaning. Instead, just as the common law changes over time in response to court decisions, the proper meaning of a constitutional provision can change over time in response to court decisions elaborating its meaning in a particular way. Judges who believe very strongly in this traditional common-law commitment to reasoned elaboration of the law may choose to follow precedents they believe are wrongly decided even if those precedents do not represent settled law and there has been no substantial reliance upon them. Instead, under this approach to precedent, one or more additional special reasons are needed before the court should depart from a prior judicial opinion.

Based upon recent cases, the additional special reasons which suggest that a precedent should be overruled can be grouped under five headings: (1) the precedent is unworkable in practice; (2) the precedent creates an inconsistency or incoherence in the law; (3) a changed understanding of facts has undermined the factual basis of the precedent; (4) the precedent represents a substantially wrong or substantially unjust interpretation of the law, or is based on substantially flawed reasoning; or (5) the precedent raises concerns about a commitment to the "rule of law," such as being a precedent decided without full briefing and argument.86

Courts sometimes adopt a narrow, or strict, use of precedent, particularly when trying to distinguish a prior case from the present case. Under this use of precedent, courts limit the preceding case to its "core holding." This is more often done by judges wishing to limit the impact of precedents, like instrumentalist Justices or formalist Justices who wish to restrict the binding force of precedent to those decisions which are "settled law." Natural law Justices, more focused on reasoned elaboration of law, may refer not only to the core holding of the precedent, but also to its "general reasoning."

A summary of these four judicial decisionmaking approaches to precedent follows in Table 8:

As a final note, it may be useful to mention the process by which cases get decided. Prior to 1988, the Supreme Court was required to hear appeals from a state Supreme Court where a United States statute was declared invalid or a state statute was upheld. All dispositions were said to be binding precedents.87 Since 1988, under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1253-59, almost all of the Court's jurisdiction is important question of federal law that has not been, but should be, settled by this Court”; or (4) “has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with relevant decisions of this Court.”

See generally Ira P. Robbins, Justice By the Numbers: The Supreme Court and the Rule of Four – Or Is It Five, 36 Suffolk L. Rev. 1 (2002); Edward A. Hartnett, Ties in the Supreme Court of the United States, 44 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 643 (2002). For lower federal courts, if a judge has completed work on a case, the judge’s vote may count even if the judge dies before the opinion is announced, and even if the judge’s vote is critical for the majority. See Rizo v. Yovino, 887 F.3d 453, 455 n.* (9th Cir. 2018); Montiero v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 399 n.* (3rd Cir. 2006).

The process of deciding a case is described in “Visitor’s Guide to Oral Argument,” available at that following a grant of certiorari each party files its legal brief so that the Justices are familiar with the positions each party is advocating. Amicus curiae briefs may also be allowed. In most cases, each party presents an oral argument. The Guide continues by noting the schedule for the usual one-hour-long argument per case, and that, between arguments, the Justices are busy writing opinions, deciding which cases to hear in the future, and reading briefs for the next argument sessions. While for the first couple of decades after the court’s jurisdiction was made substantially discretionary in 1988 the Court decided 100-120 cases each Term, recent practice, as the Guide indicates, is that the Court grants review in approximately 80 of the 7,000-8,000 petitions filed each Term.

There is no fixed schedule for reaching decisions, but all cases argued during a Term of Court, which by statute since 1873 has begun in October, and since 1916, as codified at 28 U.S.C. § 2, the “first Monday in October,” are decided before the summer recess begins, usually the end of June, except in the rare circumstance of a case held over for the next Term. The Guide continues: “During an argument week, the Justices meet in a private conference, closed even to staff, to discuss the cases and to take a preliminary vote on each case. If the Chief Justice is in the majority on a case decision, he decides who will write the opinion. He may decide to write it himself or he may assign that duty to any other Justice in the majority. If the Chief Justice is in the minority, the Justice in the majority who has the most seniority assumes the assignment duty.” Although it was different in the time of Chief Justice Marshall, who wrote a majority of the Court’s opinions himself, current practice is that each Justice is assigned roughly the same number of cases to write each Term.92

The conference, although private, has been described by several Justices. See Justice Clark, The Supreme Court Conference, 19 F.R.D. 303 (1956). The Chief Justice handles the order of business, which can involve: (1) determining which written opinions are ready for announcement, (2) discussing and voting on cases argued during the week, (3) considering miscellaneous motions, (4) dealing with certiorari petitions and appeals, and (5) other items, such as Federal Rules or building items or budget. When dealing with matters requiring a vote, the Chief Justice states his view, and makes his recommendation. Other Justices comment in order of seniority and a vote is taken.

With respect to the mechanism by which drafts of opinions are circulated, draft opinions are privately circulated among the Justices until a final draft is agreed upon. When a final decision has been reached, the Justice who wrote the opinion announces the decision in a public Court session and may deliver a summary of the Court’s reasoning. Meanwhile, the Public Information Office releases the full text of the opinion to the public, including posting online. Of course, before the decision is announced, time is allowed for concurring and dissenting opinions to be drafted.

§ 3.1 Introduction to Standing Doctrine ............................................................... 113

§ 3.2 Article III Standing Doctrine: Injury, Causation, and Redressability .......... 116

§ 3.3 Historical Eras of Article III Standing Doctrine ...................................... 139

§ 3.4 Prudential Standing Doctrine ................................................................. 151

§ 3.1 Introduction to Standing Doctrine

1. Standing as a Justiciability Limit on Federal Court Jurisdiction

As discussed at § 1.2 n.21, Article III, § 1 grants federal judicial power over certain "Cases" and "Controversies." Thus, a threshold question in every federal case is whether plaintiff has made out a “case or controversy” so the court has power to hear the suit. Four judicial doctrines are concerned with this issue, and they are known as justiciability limits. These four are the doctrines of standing, ripeness, mootness, and political questions. Chapter 3 addresses standing doctrine. The other justiciability doctrines are addressed in Chapter 4.

Based upon a predisposition to resolve cases on the merits in order to advance sound social policies, the instrumentalist approach tends to favor finding that the party has standing, the case is ripe, not moot, and does not involve a political question. In contrast, the formalist preference for literal interpretation tends to adopt a more strict interpretation of these doctrines. Based upon a predisposition to defer to government, and thus not challenge the constitutionality of government action, the Holmesian approach is perhaps the most likely to find no standing, the case is not ripe, is moot, or involves a political question. The natural law approach represents a middle between instrumentalism and formalism, without a strong predisposition in either direction, based upon natural law respect for reasoned elaboration of precedents.

2. Standing to Sue: Introduction to Constitutional and Prudential Limits on Federal Jurisdiction

The text of Article III of the Constitution, which provides for federal judicial power over certain "cases" and "controversies," has been held to raise a question for every lawsuit brought in a federal court as to whether plaintiff has made out a case or controversy, so the plaintiff can be said to have "standing" to bring the case in court. Although the case or controversy requirement has existed from the beginning of the Nation, the first case to use the precise term "standing" to describe the issue was Stark v. Wickard in 1944.1

The Court has stated, “[O]ur standing jurisprudence contains two strands: Article III standing, which enforces the Constitution’s case or controversy requirement, and prudential standing, which embodies judicially self-imposed limits on the exercise of federal jurisdiction.” To establish Article III standing, current doctrine requires that plaintiffs must allege (1) a past or prospective injury in fact to themselves, (2) caused by the challenged action, and (3) likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. By "injury in fact," the Court means an invasion of a legally protected interest that is "(a) concrete and particularized, and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical." By "causal" relationship, the Court means that the injury "fairly can be traced to the challenged action of the defendant," and has not resulted from "the independent action of some third party not before the court." By redressability, the Court means that the "prospect of obtaining relief from the injury as a result of a favorable ruling" is not "too speculative."

To be granted standing, the plaintiff must clearly and specifically set forth facts sufficient to satisfy each of the above requirements. In addition, when assessing a claim of injury, the Court will presume a lack of jurisdiction unless the contrary appears affirmatively from the record. However, for the purpose of ruling on a motion to dismiss for want of standing, both trial and reviewing courts must accept as true all material allegations of the complaint, and must construe it in favor of the complaining party. When a case has proceeded to final judgment, the facts relating to standing, if controverted, must be supported by the evidence adduced at trial to avoid dismissal.

Article III standing requirements, and the justiciability requirements of ripeness, mootness, and political questions, only bind the jurisdiction of federal courts. Each state is free to develop its own justiciability doctrine for cases heard in state courts. However, Article III does bind the Supreme Court not only for cases initially brought in the federal courts, but also when reviewing on appeal the decision of a state court, as held in Doremus v. Board of Education. This can cause a problem

3 See, e.g., United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 742-43 (1995); Northeastern Florida Chapter
S. Ct. 1540 (2016) (seemingly rephrasing “injury-in-fact” as (a) “particularized” and (b) “concrete,” defined as “real” and “not abstract” – which seemingly means not “conjectural or hypothetical.”).
8 Hays, 515 U.S. at 743; Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 316 (1991); Warth, 422 U.S. at 501.
if the case were heard in a state court under state standing principles, but the case could not have been brought in federal court under federal standing principles. In theory, such an appeal should not be heard in a federal court since the federal court lacks standing. Nevertheless, where the state court judgment on the claim is adverse to one of the defendants in the state court action, the Court held in Asarco, Inc. v. Kadish\(^\text{10}\) that such adverse judgment is itself a form of injury creating Article III standing for defendant-petitioner when none existed before. The Court was concerned that if Doremus applied literally, the state court judgment would stand without any federal court review of its accuracy. The problem is not as acute if the state court decision is adverse to plaintiffs, who, because they do not have Article III standing for purposes of having their case heard in federal court, have no real cognizable complaint in federal court about losing the state case anyway. Chief Justice Rehnquist, reflecting a conservative deference-to-state-government predisposition, discussed at § 8.1.1(E) n.30, and formalist Justice Scalia dissented in Asarco and would have applied Doremus literally to let the state court decision stand without federal review. They noted such unreviewable state court decisions already occur in those states, about 10 in 2014, whose courts have the power to render advisory opinions, unlike the federal courts, as discussed at § 3.3.1 nn.20-23.

Usually it is not difficult to satisfy the three Article III standing requirements if the federal lawsuit is traditional in form, with the plaintiff complaining that the defendant's action, alleged to be unconstitutional on its face or as applied, has caused plaintiff a physical or economic injury redressable by damages or an injunction. Difficulties arise once plaintiffs are outside the classic case of individuals suing for their own physical or economic injuries. Standing may be difficult to establish if the plaintiff complains about non-traditional kinds of injuries; or not as an injured individual but as a member of some large group, such as taxpayers or citizens; or as an individual or organization distressed by actual or threatened law enforcement directed at a third person; or more remote from personal injury, as an individual simply experiencing distress at observing an alleged constitutional violation.\(^\text{11}\) Problems are also raised by the federal Qui Tam statute, 31 U.S.C. § 3730, which allows private persons to bring actions on behalf of the United States.\(^\text{12}\)

\(^{10}\) 490 U.S. 605, 612-24 (1989); id. at 634-37 (Rehnquist, C.J., joined by Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\(^{12}\) See Evan Caminker, The Constitutionality of Qui Tam Actions, 99 Yale L.J. 341 (1989). The Qui Tam statute raises questions of constitutionality because the plaintiff ordinarily will have no way of showing a personal injury in fact. However, plaintiffs in a qui tam action are usually held to have standing, as in Vermont Agency of Natural Resources v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765, 771-78 (2000). The Court said that the law can be interpreted as a partial assignment of the government’s damages claim to the plaintiff, giving rise to “representational standing.”
These difficulties frame the two central questions of modern standing doctrine: (1) how difficult should it be to establish standing in the non-traditional kinds of cases, and (2) whether the difficulties which arise in these cases are constitutional difficulties mandated by Article III, which Congress could not alter by statute under the doctrines of Marbury and Klein, or merely prudential difficulties that can be overcome by acts of Congress that grant standing under Congress’ Ex parte McCardle power to make regulations regarding federal court jurisdiction. In the 1970s, in cases like Warth v. Seldin, the Court said that in these situations it might invoke a nonconstitutional "prudential" limitation on standing to sue because a harm shared equally by a large class of citizens was regarded by the Court as a "generalized grievance" which for prudential reasons usually did not warrant exercise of federal jurisdiction. Since the 1980s, however, in cases like Allen v. Wright, excerpted at § 3.2, and Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, excerpted at § 3.2, the Court has stated that plaintiffs who raise only generalized grievances about government do not state an Article III case or controversy. On the other hand, even under an Article III analysis, the Court noted in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), excerpted at § 3.2, that the Court will pay attention to Congress’ views on injury and causation, stating, “Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before. . . . In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit.”

Allen v. Wright

Justice O’CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

Parents of black public school children allege in this nation-wide class action that the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has not adopted sufficient standards and procedures to fulfill its obligation to deny tax-exempt status to racially discriminatory private schools. They assert that the IRS thereby harms them directly and interferes with the ability of their children to receive an education in desegregated public schools. The issue before us is whether plaintiffs have standing to bring this suit. We hold that they do not.

“In essence the question of standing is whether the litigant is entitled to have the court decide the merits of the dispute or of particular issues.” Warth v. Seldin, supra, 422 U.S. [490, 498 (1975)].

Standing doctrine embraces several judicially self-imposed limits on the exercise of federal jurisdiction, such as the general prohibition on a litigant's raising another person's legal rights, the rule barring adjudication of generalized grievances more appropriately addressed in the representative branches, and the requirement that a plaintiff's complaint fall within the zone of interests protected by the law invoked. See Valley Forge [Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 474-75 (1982)]. The requirement of standing, however, has a core component derived directly from the Constitution. A plaintiff must allege personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief. 454 U.S., at 472.

Like the prudential component, the constitutional component of standing doctrine incorporates concepts concededly not susceptible of precise definition. The injury alleged must be, for example, “'distinct and palpable,'” Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 100 (1979) (quoting Warth v. Seldin, supra, 422 U.S., at 501), and not “abstract” or “conjectural” or “hypothetical,” Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 101-102 (1983); O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 494 (1974). The injury must be “fairly” traceable to the challenged action, and relief from the injury must be “likely” to follow from a favorable decision. See Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. [26, 38, 41 (1976)].

Respondents allege two injuries in their complaint to support their standing to bring this lawsuit. First, they say that they are harmed directly by the mere fact of Government financial aid to discriminatory private schools. Second, they say that the federal tax exemptions to racially discriminatory private schools in their communities impair their ability to have their public schools desegregated.

We conclude that neither suffices to support respondents' standing. The first fails under clear precedents of this Court because it does not constitute judicially cognizable injury. The second fails because the alleged injury is not fairly traceable to the assertedly unlawful conduct of the IRS.

Respondents' first claim of injury can be interpreted in two ways. It might be a claim simply to have the Government avoid the violation of law alleged in respondents' complaint. Alternatively, it might be a claim of stigmatic injury, or denigration, suffered by all members of a racial group when the Government discriminates on the basis of race. Under neither interpretation is this claim of injury judicially cognizable.

This Court has repeatedly held that an asserted right to have the Government act in accordance with law is not sufficient, standing alone, to confer jurisdiction on a federal court. In Schlesinger v. Reservists Committee to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974), for example, the Court rejected a claim of citizen standing to challenge Armed Forces Reserve commissions held by Members of Congress as violating the Incompatibility Clause of Art. I, § 6, of the Constitution. As citizens, the Court held, plaintiffs alleged nothing but “the abstract injury in nonobservance of the Constitution. . . .” Id., at 223, n.13. More recently, in Valley Forge, supra, we rejected a claim of standing to challenge a Government conveyance of property to a religious institution. Insofar as the plaintiffs relied simply on “‘their shared individuated right’” to a Government that made no law respecting an establishment of religion, id., 454 U.S., at 482 (quoting Americans United v. U.S. Dept. of HEW, 619 F.2d 252, 261 (CA3 1980)), we held that plaintiffs had not alleged a judicially cognizable injury. “[A]ssertion of a right to a particular kind of Government conduct, which the Government has violated by acting differently, cannot alone satisfy the requirements of Art. III without draining those requirements of meaning.” 454 U.S., at 483. See also United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166 (1974); Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1 (1972); Ex parte Lévitt, 302 U.S. 633 (1937). Respondents here have no standing to complain simply that their Government is violating the law.

The consequences of recognizing respondents' standing on the basis of their first claim of injury illustrate why our cases plainly hold that such injury is not judicially cognizable. If the abstract stigmatic injury were cognizable, standing would extend nationwide to all members of the particular racial groups against which the Government was alleged to be discriminating by its grant of a tax exemption to a racially discriminatory school, regardless of the location of that school. All such persons could claim the same sort of abstract stigmatic injury respondents assert in their first claim of injury. A black person in Hawaii could challenge the grant of a tax exemption to a racially discriminatory school in Maine. Recognition of standing in such circumstances would transform the federal courts into “no more than a vehicle for the vindication of the value interests of concerned bystanders.” United States v. SCRAP, 412 U.S. 669, 687 (1973).

It is in their complaint's second claim of injury that respondents allege harm to a concrete, personal interest that can support standing in some circumstances. The injury they identify – their children's diminished ability to receive an education in a racially integrated school – is, beyond any doubt, not only judicially cognizable but, as shown by cases from Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), to Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983) [Ed.: which held that the IRS can deny tax-exempt status to a racially discriminatory school, even a religiously-affiliated school, without offending the Establishment Clause], one of the most serious injuries recognized in our legal system. Despite the constitutional importance of curing the injury alleged by respondents, however, the federal judiciary may not redress it unless standing requirements are met. In this case, respondents' second claim of injury cannot support standing because the injury alleged is not fairly traceable to the Government conduct respondents challenge as unlawful.

The illegal conduct challenged by respondents is the IRS's grant of tax exemptions to some racially discriminatory schools. The line of causation between that conduct and desegregation of respondents' schools is attenuated at best. From the perspective of the IRS, the injury to respondents is highly indirect and “results from the independent action of some third party not before the court,” Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S., at 42. As the Court pointed out in Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S., at 505 “the indirectness of the injury . . . may make it substantially more difficult to meet the minimum requirement of Art. III. . . .”

The diminished ability of respondents' children to receive a desegregated education would be fairly traceable to unlawful IRS grants of tax exemptions only if there were enough racially discriminatory private schools receiving tax exemptions in respondents' communities for withdrawal of those exemptions to make an appreciable difference in public school integration. Respondents have made no such allegation. It is, first, uncertain how many racially discriminatory private schools are in fact receiving tax exemptions. Moreover, it is entirely speculative, as respondents themselves conceded in the Court of Appeals, whether withdrawal of a tax exemption from any particular school would lead the school to change its policies. See 480 F.Supp., at 796. It is just as speculative whether any given parent of a child attending such a private school would decide to transfer the child to public school as a result of any changes in educational or financial policy made by the private school once it was threatened with loss of tax-exempt status. It is also pure speculation whether, in a particular community, a large enough number of the numerous relevant school officials and parents would reach decisions that collectively would have a significant impact on the racial composition of the public schools.

The links in the chain of causation between the challenged Government conduct and the asserted injury are far too weak for the chain as a whole to sustain respondents' standing. In Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Org., supra, the Court held that standing to challenge a Government grant of a tax exemption to hospitals could not be founded on the asserted connection between the grant of tax-exempt status and the hospitals' policy concerning the provision of medical services to indigents. The causal connection depended on the decisions hospitals would make in response to withdrawal of tax-exempt status, and those decisions were sufficiently uncertain to break the chain of causation between the plaintiffs' injury and the challenged Government action. 426 U.S., at 40-46. The chain of causation is even weaker in this case. It involves numerous third parties (officials of racially discriminatory schools receiving tax exemptions and the parents of children attending such schools) who may not even exist in respondents' communities and whose independent decisions may not collectively have a significant effect on the ability of public school students to receive a desegregated education.

Justice MARSHALL took no part in the decision of these cases.

Justice BRENNAN, dissenting.

The Court acknowledges that this alleged injury is sufficient to satisfy constitutional standards. It does so only grudgingly, however, without emphasizing the significance of the harm alleged. Nonetheless, we have consistently recognized throughout the last 30 years that the deprivation of a child's right to receive an education in a desegregated school is a harm of special significance; surely, it satisfies any constitutional requirement of injury in fact. Just last Term in Bob Jones University v. United States, for example, we acknowledged that “[a]n unbroken line of cases following Brown v. Board of Education establishes beyond doubt this Court's view that racial discrimination in education violates a most fundamental national public policy, as well as rights of individuals.” 461 U.S., at 593 (1983) (emphasis added). See Gilmore v. City of Montgomery, 417 U.S. 556, 568 (1974) (“[T]he constitutional rights of children not to be discriminated against . . . can neither be nullified openly and directly . . . , nor nullified indirectly . . . through evasive schemes for segregation whether attempted ‘ingeniously or ingenuously.’”) (quoting Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 17 (1958)); Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 468–469 (1973).

Viewed in light of the injuries they claim, the respondents have alleged a direct causal relationship between the Government action they challenge and the injury they suffer: their inability to receive an education in a racially integrated school is directly and adversely affected by the tax-exempt status granted by the IRS to racially discriminatory schools in their respective school districts. Common sense alone would recognize that the elimination of tax-exempt status for racially discriminatory private schools would serve to lessen the impact that those institutions have in defeating efforts to desegregate the public schools.

The Court admits that “[t]he diminished ability of respondents' children to receive a desegregated education would be fairly traceable to unlawful IRS grants of tax exemptions . . . if there were enough racially discriminatory private schools receiving tax exemptions in respondents' communities for withdrawal of those exemptions to make an appreciable difference in public school integration,” but concludes that “[r]espondents have made no such allegation.” With all due respect, the Court has either misread the complaint or is improperly requiring the respondents to prove their case on the merits in order to defeat a motion to dismiss. For example, the respondents specifically refer by name to at least 32 private schools that discriminate on the basis of race and yet continue to benefit illegally from tax-exempt status. Eighteen of those schools – including at least 14 elementary schools, 2 junior high schools, and 1 high school – are located in the city of Memphis, Tenn., which has been the subject of several court orders to desegregate. See Complaint ¶¶ 24-27, 45, App. 26-27, 35-36. Similarly, the respondents cite two private schools in Orangeburg, S.C. that continue to benefit from federal tax exemptions even though they practice race discrimination in school districts that are desegregating pursuant to judicial and administrative orders. See Complaint ¶¶ 29, 46, App. 28, 36. At least with respect to these school districts, as well as the others specifically mentioned in the complaint, there can be little doubt that the respondents have identified communities containing “enough racially discriminatory private schools receiving tax exemptions . . . to make an appreciable difference in public school integration.”

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice BLACKMUN joins, dissenting.

“Both tax exemptions and tax deductibility are a form of subsidy that is administered through the tax system. A tax exemption has much the same effect as a cash grant to the organization of the amount of tax it would have to pay on its income. Deductible contributions are similar to cash grants of the amount of a portion of the individual's contributions.” Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 544 (1983) (footnote omitted).

The purpose of this scheme, like the purpose of any subsidy, is to promote the activity subsidized; the statutes “seek to achieve the same basic goal of encouraging the development of certain organizations through the grant of tax benefits.” Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 587, n.10 (1983). If the granting of preferential tax treatment would “encourage” private segregated schools to conduct their “charitable” activities, it must follow that the withdrawal of the treatment would “discourage” them, and hence promote the process of desegregation.

This causation analysis is nothing more than a restatement of elementary economics: when something becomes more expensive, less of it will be purchased. Sections 170 and 501(c)(3) [the federal statutes the IRS is alleged not to have sufficiently followed here] are premised on that recognition. If racially discriminatory private schools lose the “cash grants” that flow from the operation of the statutes, the education they provide will become more expensive and hence less of their services will be purchased. Conversely, maintenance of these tax benefits makes an education in segregated private schools relatively more attractive, by decreasing its cost. Accordingly, without tax-exempt status, private schools will either not be competitive in terms of cost, or have to change their admissions policies, hence reducing their competitiveness for parents seeking “a racially segregated alternative” to public schools, which is what respondents have alleged many white parents in desegregating school districts seek.

Although the parties were denied standing in Allen v. Wright, the visibility of the IRS practices highlighted in the case, and the public and political pressure which ensued, caused the Reagan-era IRS to change their internal decisionmaking, which previously had granted tax-exempt status as long as the school had adopted and certified a policy of racial nondiscrimination, without testing whether or not that policy was fully implemented in practice.

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III-A, and IV, and an opinion with respect to Part III-B, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice WHITE, and Justice THOMAS join.

This case involves a challenge to a rule promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior interpreting § 7 of the Endangered Species Act of 1973 (ESA), 87 Stat. 884, 892, as amended, 16 U.S.C. § 1536, in such fashion as to render it applicable only to actions within the United States or on the high seas. The preliminary issue, and the only one we reach, is whether respondents here, plaintiffs below, have standing to seek judicial review of the rule.

Over the years, our cases have established that the irreducible constitutional minimum of standing contains three elements. First, the plaintiff must have suffered an “injury in fact” – an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, see Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 508 (1975); and (b) “actual or imminent, not ‘conjectural’ or ‘hypothetical,’” Whitmore, supra, 495 U.S., at 155 (quoting Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 102 (1983)). Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of – the injury has to be “fairly trace[able] to the challenged action of the defendant, and not . . . th[e] result [of] the independent action of some third party not before the court.”Simon v. Eastern Ky. Welfare Rights Organization, 426 U.S. 26, 41-42 (1976). Third, it must be “likely,” as opposed to merely “speculative,” that the injury will be “redressed by a favorable decision.” Id., at 38, 43.

The party invoking federal jurisdiction bears the burden of establishing these elements. See FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231 (1990); Warth, supra, 422 U.S., at 508. Since they are not mere pleading requirements but rather an indispensable part of the plaintiff’s case, each element must be supported in the same way as any other matter on which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof, \textit{i.e.}, with the manner and degree of evidence required at the successive stages of the litigation. See Lujan v. National Wildlife Federation, 497 U.S. 871, 883-889 (1990); Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 114-115, and n.31 (1979); Simon, supra, 426 U.S., at 45, n. 25; Warth, supra, 422 U.S., at 527, and n.6 (Brennan, J., dissenting). At the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we “presum[e] that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim.” National Wildlife Federation, supra, 497 U.S., at 889. In response to a summary judgment motion, however, the plaintiff can no longer rest on such “mere allegations,” but must “set forth” by affidavit or other evidence “specific facts,” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 56(e), which for purposes of the summary judgment motion will be taken to be true. And at the final stage, those facts (if controverted) must be “supported adequately by the evidence adduced at trial.” \textit{Gladstone, supra, 441 U.S.}, at 115, n.31.

When the suit is one challenging the legality of government action or inaction, the nature and extent of facts that must be averred (at the summary judgment stage) or proved (at the trial stage) in order to establish standing depends considerably upon whether the plaintiff is himself an object of the action (or forgone action) at issue. If he is, there is ordinarily little question that the action or inaction has caused him injury, and that a judgment preventing or requiring the action will redress it. When, however, as in this case, a plaintiff's asserted injury arises from the government's allegedly unlawful regulation (or lack of regulation) of someone else, much more is needed. In that circumstance, causation and redressability ordinarily hinge on the response of the regulated (or regulable) third party to the government action or inaction – and perhaps on the response of others as well. The existence of one or more of the essential elements of standing “depends on the unfettered choices made by independent actors not before the courts and whose exercise of broad and legitimate discretion the courts cannot presume either to control or to predict,” ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 615 (1989) (opinion of Kennedy, J.); see also Simon, supra, 426 U.S., at 41-42; and it becomes the burden of the plaintiff to adduce facts showing that those choices have been or will be made in such manner as to produce causation and permit redressability of injury. E.g., Warth, supra, 422 U.S., at 505. Thus, when the plaintiff is not himself the object of the government action or inaction he challenges, standing is not precluded, but it is ordinarily “substantially more difficult” to establish. Allen, supra, 468 U.S., at 758; Simon, supra, 426 U.S., at 44-45; Warth, supra, 422 U.S., at 505.

We think the Court of Appeals failed to apply the foregoing principles in denying the Secretary's motion for summary judgment. Respondents had not made the requisite demonstration of (at least) injury and redressability.

Respondents' claim to injury is that the lack of consultation with respect to certain funded activities abroad “increas[es] the rate of extinction of endangered and threatened species.” \textit{Complaint ¶ 5, App. 13}. Of course, the desire to use or observe an animal species, even for purely esthetic purposes, is undeniably a cognizable interest for purpose of standing. See, e.g., Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S., at 734. “But the ‘injury in fact’ test requires more than an injury to a cognizable interest. It requires that the party seeking review be himself among the injured.” Id., at 734-735. To survive the Secretary's summary judgment motion, respondents had to submit affidavits or other evidence showing, through specific facts, not only that listed species were in fact being threatened by funded activities abroad, but also that one or more of respondents' members would thereby be “directly” affected apart from their “‘special interest' in th[e] subject.” Id., at 735, 739.

With respect to this aspect of the case, the Court of Appeals focused on the affidavits of two Defenders' members – Joyce Kelly and Amy Skilbred. Ms. Kelly stated that she traveled to Egypt in 1986 and “observed the traditional habitat of the endangered nile crocodile there and intend[s] to do so again, and hope[s] to observe the crocodile directly,” and that she “will suffer harm in fact as the result of [the] American . . . role . . . in overseeing the rehabilitation of the Aswan High Dam on the Nile . . . and [in] develop [ing] . . . Egypt's . . . Master Water Plan.” App. 101. Ms. Skilbred averred that she traveled to Sri Lanka in 1981 and “observed the habitat” of “endangered species such as the Asian elephant and the leopard” at what is now the site of the Mahaweli project funded by the Agency for International Development (AID), although she “was unable to see any of the endangered species”; “this development project,” she continued, “will seriously reduce endangered, threatened, and endemic species habitat including areas that I visited . . . [which] may severely shorten the future of these species”; that threat, she concluded, harmed her because she “intend[s] to return to Sri Lanka in the future and hope[s] to be more fortunate in spotting at least the endangered elephant and leopard.” Id., at 145-146. When Ms. Skilbred was asked at a subsequent deposition if and when she had any plans to return to Sri Lanka, she reiterated that “I intend to go back to Sri Lanka,” but confessed that she had no current plans: “I don't know [when]. There is a civil war going on right now. I don't know. Not next year, I will say. In the future.” Id., at 318.

We shall assume for the sake of argument that these affidavits contain facts showing that certain agency-funded projects threaten listed species – though that is questionable. They plainly contain no facts, however, showing how damage to the species will produce “imminent” injury to Mses. Kelly and Skilbred. That the women “had visited” the areas of the projects before the projects commenced proves nothing. As we have said in a related context, “‘Past exposure to illegal conduct does not in itself show a present case or controversy regarding injunctive relief . . . if unaccompanied by any continuing, present adverse effects.’ ” Lyons, 461 U.S., at 102 (quoting O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 495-496 (1974)). And the affiants' profession of an “inten[t]” to return to the places they had visited before – where they will presumably, this time, be deprived of the opportunity to observe animals of the endangered species – is simply not enough. Such “some day” intentions – without any description of concrete plans, or indeed even any specification of when the some day will be – do not support a finding of the “actual or imminent” injury that our cases require.

Besides relying upon the Kelly and Skilbred affidavits, respondents propose a series of novel standing theories. The first, inelegantly styled “ecosystem nexus,” proposes that any person who uses any part of a “contiguous ecosystem” adversely affected by a funded activity has standing even if the activity is located a great distance away. This approach, as the Court of Appeals correctly observed, is inconsistent with our opinion in National Wildlife Federation, which held that a plaintiff claiming injury from environmental damage must use the area affected by the challenged activity and not an area roughly “in the vicinity” of it. 497 U.S., at 887-889; see also Sierra Club, 405 U.S., at 735. It makes no difference that the general-purpose section of the ESA states that the Act was intended in part “to provide a means whereby the ecosystems upon which endangered species and threatened species depend may be conserved,” 16 U.S.C. § 1531(b). To say that the Act protects ecosystems is not to say that the Act creates (if it were possible) rights of action in persons who have not been injured in fact, that is, persons who use portions of an ecosystem not perceptibly affected by the unlawful action in question.

Respondents' other theories are called, alas, the “animal nexus” approach, whereby anyone who has an interest in studying or seeing the endangered animals anywhere on the globe has standing; and the “vocational nexus” approach, under which anyone with a professional interest in such animals can sue. Under these theories, anyone who goes to see Asian elephants in the Bronx Zoo, and anyone who is a keeper of Asian elephants in the Bronx Zoo, has standing to sue because the Director of the Agency for International Development (AID) did not consult with the Secretary regarding the AID-funded project in Sri Lanka. This is beyond all reason. Standing is not “an ingenious academic exercise in the conceivable,” United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP), 412 U.S. 669, 688 (1973), but as we have said requires, at the summary judgment stage, a factual showing of perceptible harm. It is clear that the person who observes or works with a particular animal threatened by a federal decision is facing perceptible harm, since the very subject of his interest will no longer exist. It is even plausible – though it goes to the outermost limit of plausibility – to think that a person who observes or works with animals of a particular species in the very area of the world where that species is threatened by a federal decision is facing such harm, since some animals that might have been the subject of his interest will no longer exist, see Japan Whaling Assn. v. American Cetacean Society, 478 U.S. 221, 231, n.4 (1986). It goes beyond the limit, however, and into pure speculation and fantasy, to say that anyone who observes or works with an endangered species, anywhere in the world, is appreciably harmed by a single project affecting some portion of that species with which he has no more specific connection.

Besides failing to show injury, respondents failed to demonstrate redressability. Instead of attacking the separate decisions to fund particular projects allegedly causing them harm, respondents chose to challenge a more generalized level of Government action (rules regarding consultation), the invalidation of which would affect all overseas projects. This programmatic approach has obvious practical advantages, but also obvious difficulties insofar as proof of causation or redressability is concerned. As we have said in another context, “suits challenging, not specifically identifiable Government violations of law, but the particular programs agencies establish to carry out their legal obligations . . . [are], even when premised on allegations of several instances of violations of law, . . . rarely if ever appropriate for federal-court adjudication.” Allen, 468 U.S., at 759-760.

The most obvious problem in the present case is redressability. Since the agencies funding the projects were not parties to the case, the District Court could accord relief only against the Secretary: He could be ordered to revise his regulation to require consultation for foreign projects. But this would not remedy respondents' alleged injury unless the funding agencies were bound by the Secretary's regulation, which is very much an open question.
A further impediment to redressability is the fact that the agencies generally supply only a fraction of the funding for a foreign project. AID, for example, has provided less than 10% of the funding for the Mahaweli project. Respondents have produced nothing to indicate that the projects they have named will either be suspended, or do less harm to listed species, if that fraction is eliminated. As in Simon, 426 U.S., at 43-44, it is entirely conjectural whether the nonagency activity that affects respondents will be altered or affected by the agency activity they seek to achieve.

The question presented here is whether the public interest in proper administration of the laws (specifically, in agencies' observance of a particular, statutorily prescribed procedure) can be converted into an individual right by a statute that denominates it as such, and that permits all citizens (or, for that matter, a subclass of citizens who suffer no distinctive concrete harm) to sue. If the concrete injury requirement has the separation-of-powers significance we have always said, the answer must be obvious: To permit Congress to convert the undifferentiated public interest in executive officers' compliance with the law into an "individual right" vindicable in the courts is to permit Congress to transfer from the President to the courts the Chief Executive's most important constitutional duty, to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed."

Nothing in this contradicts the principle that "[t]he . . . injury required by Art. III may exist solely by virtue of 'statutes creating legal rights, the invasion of which creates standing.'" Warth, 422 U.S., at 500 (quoting Linda R. S. v. Richard D., 410 U.S. 614, 617, n.3 (1973)). As we said in Sierra Club “[Statutory] broadening [of] the categories of injury that may be alleged in support of standing is a different matter from abandoning the requirement that the party seeking review must himself have suffered an injury." 405 U.S., at 738.

Although I agree with the essential parts of the Court's analysis, I write separately to make several observations. I agree with the Court's conclusion in Part III-A that, on the record before us, respondents have failed to demonstrate that they themselves are "among the injured." Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 735 (1972). This component of the standing inquiry is not satisfied unless “[p]laintiffs . . . demonstrate a 'personal stake in the outcome.' . . . Abstract injury is not enough. The plaintiff must show that he ‘has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury’ as the result of the challenged official conduct and the injury or threat of injury must be both ‘real and immediate,’ not ‘conjectural’ or ‘hypothetical.’ ” Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 101-102 (1983) (citations omitted).

While it may seem trivial to require that Mses. Kelly and Skilbred acquire airline tickets to the project sites or announce a date certain upon which they will return, this is not a case where it is reasonable to assume that the affiants will be using the sites on a regular basis, see Sierra Club v. Morton, supra, 405 U.S., at 735 n.8, nor do the affiants claim to have visited the sites since the projects commenced. With respect to the Court's discussion of respondents' "ecosystem nexus," “animal nexus,” and “vocational nexus” theories, I agree that on this record respondents' showing is insufficient to establish standing on any of these bases. I am not willing to foreclose the possibility, however, that in different circumstances a nexus theory similar to those proffered here might support a claim to standing. See Japan Whaling Assn. v. American Cetacean Society, 478 U.S. 221, 231 n.4 (1986) (“[R]espondents ... undoubtedly have alleged a sufficient ‘injury in fact’ in that the whale watching and studying of their members will be adversely affected by continued whale harvesting”).

In light of the conclusion that respondents have not demonstrated a concrete injury here sufficient to support standing under our precedents, I would not reach the issue of redressability that is discussed by the plurality in Part III-B.

I also join Part IV of the Court's opinion with the following observations. As Government programs and policies become more complex and farreaching, we must be sensitive to the articulation of new rights of action that do not have clear analogs in our common-law tradition. Modern litigation has progressed far from the paradigm of Marbury suing Madison to get his commission, Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), or Ogden seeking an injunction to halt Gibbons' steamboat operations, Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824). In my view, Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before, and I do not read the Court's opinion to suggest a contrary view. See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500 (1975). In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit. The citizen-suit provision of the Endangered Species Act does not meet these minimal requirements, because while the statute purports to confer a right on “any person . . . to enjoin . . . the United States and any other governmental instrumentality or agency . . . who is alleged to be in violation of any provision of this chapter,” it does not of its own force establish that there is an injury in “any person” by virtue of any “violation.” 16 U.S.C. § 1540(g)(1)(A).

The Court's holding that there is an outer limit to the power of Congress to confer rights of action is a direct and necessary consequence of the case and controversy limitations found in Article III. I agree that it would exceed those limitations if, at the behest of Congress and in the absence of any showing of concrete injury, we were to entertain citizen suits to vindicate the public's nonconcrete interest in the proper administration of the laws. While it does not matter how many persons have been injured by the challenged action, the party bringing suit must show that the action injures him in a concrete and personal way. This requirement is not just an empty formality. It preserves the vitality of the adversarial process by assuring both that the parties before the court have an actual, as opposed to professed, stake in the outcome, and that “the legal questions presented . . . will be resolved, not in the rarified atmosphere of a debating society, but in a concrete factual context conducive to a realistic appreciation of the consequences of judicial action.” Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 472 (1982). In addition, the requirement of concrete injury confines the Judicial Branch to its proper, limited role in the constitutional framework of Government.
An independent judiciary is held to account through its open proceedings and its reasoned judgments. In this process it is essential for the public to know what persons or groups are invoking the judicial power, the reasons that they have brought suit, and whether their claims are vindicated.

Justice STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

Because I am not persuaded that Congress intended the consultation requirement in § 7(a)(2) of the Endangered Species Act of 1973 (ESA), 16 U.S.C. § 1536(a)(2), to apply to activities in foreign countries, I concur in the judgment of reversal. I do not, however, agree with the Court's conclusion that respondents lack standing because the threatened injury to their interest in protecting the environment and studying endangered species is not “imminent.” Nor do I agree with the plurality's additional conclusion that respondents' injury is not “redressable” in this litigation.

In my opinion a person who has visited the critical habitat of an endangered species, has a professional interest in preserving the species and its habitat, and intends to revisit them in the future has standing to challenge agency action that threatens their destruction. Congress has found that a wide variety of endangered species of fish, wildlife, and plants are of “aesthetic, ecological, educational, historical, recreational, and scientific value to the Nation and its people.” 16 U.S.C. § 1531(a)(3). Given that finding, we have no license to demean the importance of the interest that particular individuals may have in observing any species or its habitat, whether those individuals are motivated by esthetic enjoyment, an interest in professional research, or an economic interest in preservation of the species.

To survive petitioner's motion for summary judgment on standing, respondents need not prove that they are actually or imminently harmed. They need show only a “genuine issue” of material fact as to standing. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 56(c). This is not a heavy burden. A “genuine issue” exists so long as “the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party [respondents].” Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986). This Court's “function is not [it]self to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial.” Id. at 249.

The Court never mentions the “genuine issue” standard. Rather, the Court refers to the type of evidence it feels respondents failed to produce, namely, “affidavits or other evidence showing, through specific facts” the existence of injury. The Court thereby confuses respondents' evidentiary burden (i.e., affidavits asserting “specific facts”) in withstanding a summary judgment motion under Rule 56(e) with the standard of proof (i.e., the existence of a “genuine issue” of “material fact”) under Rule 56(c).

Were the Court to apply the proper standard for summary judgment, I believe it would conclude that the sworn affidavits and deposition testimony of Joyce Kelly and Amy Skilbred advance sufficient facts to create a genuine issue for trial concerning whether one or both would be imminently harmed by the Aswan and Mahaweli projects.
I think a reasonable finder of fact could conclude from the information in the affidavits and deposition testimony that either Kelly or Skilbred will soon return to the project sites, thereby satisfying the “actual or imminent” injury standard. The Court dismisses Kelly's and Skilbred's general statements that they intended to revisit the project sites as “simply not enough. But those statements did not stand alone. A reasonable finder of fact could conclude, based not only upon their statements of intent to return, but upon their past visits to the project sites, as well as their professional backgrounds, that it was likely that Kelly and Skilbred would make a return trip to the project areas. Contrary to the Court's contention that Kelly's and Skilbred's past visits “prov[e] nothing,” the fact of their past visits could demonstrate to a reasonable factfinder that Kelly and Skilbred have the requisite resources and personal interest in the preservation of the species endangered by the Aswan and Mahaweli projects to make good on their intention to return again. Cf. Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 102 (1983) (“Past wrongs were evidence bearing on whether there is a real and immediate threat of repeated injury”) (internal quotation marks omitted). Similarly, Kelly's and Skilbred's professional backgrounds in wildlife preservation also make it likely – at least far more likely than for the average citizen – that they would choose to visit these areas of the world where species are vanishing.

The second redressability obstacle relied on by the plurality is that “the [action] agencies generally supply only a fraction of the funding for a foreign project. What this Court might “generally” take to be true does not eliminate the existence of a genuine issue of fact to withstand summary judgment. Even if the action agencies supply only a fraction of the funding for a particular foreign project, it remains at least a question for the finder of fact whether threatened withdrawal of that fraction would affect foreign government conduct sufficiently to avoid harm to listed species.

Today, there are virtually no nile crocodiles north of the Aswan Dam, although they continue to flourish throughout sub-Saharan Africa. The project in Sri Lanka was delayed in the context of a 25-year civil war, finally resolved brutally by the Sri Lankan military defeating the minority ethnic Tamil Tigers in 2009. Projects around the world, from Sri Lanka, to Malaysia and Indonesia, to the Amazon in Brazil, continue to diminish rain forests causing extinctions of thousands of species of plants and animals each year.

Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA)

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

A well-documented rise in global temperatures has coincided with a significant increase in the concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. Respected scientists believe the two trends are related. For when carbon dioxide is released into the atmosphere, it acts like the ceiling of a greenhouse, trapping solar energy and retarding the escape of reflected heat. It is therefore a species – the most important species – of a "greenhouse gas."
Calling global warming "the most pressing environmental challenge of our time," a group of States, local governments, and private organizations, alleged in a petition for certiorari that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has abdicated its responsibility under the Clean Air Act to regulate the emissions of four greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide. Specifically, petitioners asked us to answer two questions concerning the meaning of § 202(a)(1) of the Act: whether EPA has the statutory authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles; and if so, whether its stated reasons for refusing to do so are consistent with the statute.

In response, EPA, supported by 10 intervening States and six trade associations, correctly argued that we may not address those two questions unless at least one petitioner has standing to invoke our jurisdiction under Article III of the Constitution. Notwithstanding the serious character of that jurisdictional argument and the absence of any conflicting decisions construing § 202(a)(1), the unusual importance of the underlying issue persuaded us to grant the writ.

Article III of the Constitution limits federal-court jurisdiction to "Cases" and "Controversies." Those two words confine "the business of federal courts to questions presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of resolution through the judicial process." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968). It is therefore familiar learning that no justiciable "controversy" exists when parties seek adjudication of a political question, Luther v. Borden, 48 U.S. 1, 7 How. 1 (1849), when they ask for an advisory opinion, Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. 409, 2 Dall. 409 (1792), see also Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 700, n.33 (1997), or when the question sought to be adjudicated has been mooted by subsequent developments, California v. San Pablo & Tulare R. Co., 149 U.S. 308 (1893). This case suffers from none of these defects.

The parties' dispute turns on the proper construction of a congressional statute, a question eminently suitable to resolution in federal court. Congress has moreover authorized this type of challenge to EPA action. See 42 U.S.C. § 7607(b)(1). That authorization is of critical importance to the standing inquiry: "Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before." Lujan, 504 U.S., at 580 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). "In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit." Ibid. We will not, therefore, "entertain citizen suits to vindicate the public's nonconcrete interest in the proper administration of the laws." Id., at 581.

EPA maintains that because greenhouse gas emissions inflict widespread harm, the doctrine of standing presents an insuperable jurisdictional obstacle. We do not agree. At bottom, "the gist of the question of standing" is whether petitioners have "such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962). As Justice Kennedy explained in his Lujan concurrence: "While it does not matter how many persons have been injured by the challenged action, the party bringing suit must show that the action injures him in a concrete and personal way. This requirement is not just an empty formality. It preserves the vitality of the adversarial process by assuring both that the parties before the court have an actual, as opposed to professed, stake in the outcome, and that the legal questions presented . . . will be resolved, not in the rarified atmosphere of a debating society, but in a concrete factual context conducive to a realistic appreciation of the consequences of judicial action." 504 U.S., at 581 (internal quotation marks omitted).

To ensure the proper adversarial presentation, Lujan holds that a litigant must demonstrate that it has suffered a concrete and particularized injury that is either actual or imminent, that the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant, and that it is likely that a favorable decision will redress that injury. See id., at 560-561. However, a litigant to whom Congress has "accorded a procedural right to protect his concrete interests," id., at 572, n.7 – here, the right to challenge agency action unlawfully withheld, § 7607(b)(1) – "can assert that right without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy," ibid. When a litigant is vested with a procedural right, that litigant has standing if there is some possibility that the requested relief will prompt the injury-causing party to reconsider the decision that allegedly harmed the litigant. Ibid.; see also Sugar Cane Growers Cooperative of Fla. v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 94-95 (CADC 2002) ("A [litigant] who alleges a deprivation of a procedural protection to which he is entitled never has to prove that if he had received the procedure the substantive result would have been altered. All that is necessary is to show that the procedural step was connected to the substantive result.").

Only one of the petitioners needs to have standing to permit us to consider the petition for review. See Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, Inc., 547 U.S. 47, 52, n.2 [(2006)]. We stress here, as did Judge Tatel below, the special position and interest of Massachusetts. It is of considerable relevance that the party seeking review here is a sovereign State and not, as it was in Lujan, a private individual.

Well before the creation of the modern administrative state, we recognized that States are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction. As Justice Holmes explained in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 237 (1907), a case in which Georgia sought to protect its citizens from air pollution originating outside its borders: "The case has been argued largely as if it were one between two private parties; but it is not. The very elements that would be relied upon in a suit between fellow-citizens as a ground for equitable relief are wanting here. The State owns very little of the territory alleged to be affected, and the damage to it capable of estimate in money, possibly, at least, is small. This is a suit by a State for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the State has an interest independent of and behind the titles of its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. . . ."

Just as Georgia's independent interest "in all the earth and air within its domain" supported federal jurisdiction a century ago, so too does Massachusetts' well-founded desire to preserve its sovereign territory today. Cf. Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 715 (1999) (observing that in the federal system, the States "are not relegated to the role of mere provinces or political corporations, but retain the dignity, though not the full authority, of sovereignty"). That Massachusetts does in fact own a great deal of the "territory alleged to be affected" only reinforces the conclusion that its stake in the outcome of this case is sufficiently concrete to warrant the exercise of federal judicial power.
When a State enters the Union, it surrenders certain sovereign prerogatives. Massachusetts cannot invade Rhode Island to force reductions in greenhouse gas emissions, it cannot negotiate an emissions treaty with China or India, and in some circumstances the exercise of its police powers to reduce in-state motor-vehicle emissions might well be pre-empted. See Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico ex rel. Barez, 458 U.S. 592, 607 (1982) ("One helpful indication in determining whether an alleged injury to the health and welfare of its citizens suffices to give the State standing to sue parens patriae is whether the injury is one that the State, if it could, would likely attempt to address through its sovereign lawmaking powers").

These sovereign prerogatives are now lodged in the Federal Government, and Congress has ordered EPA to protect Massachusetts (among others) by prescribing standards applicable to the "emission of any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicle engines, which in [the Administrator's] judgment cause, or contribute to, air pollution which may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." 42 U.S.C. § 7521(a)(1). Congress has moreover recognized a concomitant procedural right to challenge the rejection of its rulemaking petition as arbitrary and capricious. § 7607(b)(1). Given that procedural right and Massachusetts' stake in protecting its quasi-sovereign interests, the Commonwealth is entitled to special solicitude in our standing analysis. [FN 17: The Chief Justice accuses the Court of misreading Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230 (1907), see post, at 3-4 (dissenting opinion), and "devising a new doctrine of state standing," id., at 15. But no less an authority than Hart & Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System understands Tennessee Copper as a standing decision. R. Fallon, D. Meltzer, & D. Shapiro, Hart & Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 290 (5th ed. 2003). Indeed, it devotes an entire section to chronicling the long development of cases permitting States "to litigate as parens patriae to protect quasi-sovereign interests – i.e., public or governmental interests that concern the state as a whole." Id., at 289; see, e.g., Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U.S. 208, 240-241 (1901) (finding federal jurisdiction appropriate not only "in cases involving boundaries and jurisdiction over lands and their inhabitants, and in cases directly affecting the property rights and interests of a state," but also when the "substantial impairment of the health and prosperity of the towns and cities of the state" are at stake).]

With that in mind, it is clear that petitioners' submissions as they pertain to Massachusetts have satisfied the most demanding standards of the adversarial process. EPA's steadfast refusal to regulate greenhouse gas emissions presents a risk of harm to Massachusetts that is both "actual" and "imminent." Lujan, 504 U.S., at 560 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The Injury

The harms associated with climate change are serious and well recognized. Indeed, the NRC Report itself – which EPA regards as an "objective and independent assessment of the relevant science," 68 Fed. Reg. 52930 – identifies a number of environmental changes that have already inflicted significant harms, including "the global retreat of mountain glaciers, reduction in snow-cover extent, the earlier spring melting of rivers and lakes, [and] the accelerated rate of rise of sea levels during the 20th century relative to the past few thousand years . . . ." NRC Report 16.
Causation

EPA does not dispute the existence of a causal connection between man-made greenhouse gas emissions and global warming. At a minimum, therefore, EPA's refusal to regulate such emissions "contributes" to Massachusetts' injuries.

EPA nevertheless maintains that its decision not to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles contributes so insignificantly to petitioners' injuries that the agency cannot be haled into federal court to answer for them. For the same reason, EPA does not believe that any realistic possibility exists that the relief petitioners seek would mitigate global climate change and remedy their injuries. That is especially so because predicted increases in greenhouse gas emissions from developing nations, particularly China and India, are likely to offset any marginal domestic decrease.

But EPA overstates its case. Its argument rests on the erroneous assumption that a small incremental step, because it is incremental, can never be attacked in a federal judicial forum. Yet accepting that premise would doom most challenges to regulatory action. Agencies, like legislatures, do not generally resolve massive problems in one fell regulatory swoop. See Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955) ("[A] reform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind"). They instead whittle away at them over time, refining their preferred approach as circumstances change and as they develop a more-nuanced understanding of how best to proceed. That a first step might be tentative does not by itself support the notion that federal courts lack jurisdiction to determine whether that step conforms to law.

And reducing domestic automobile emissions is hardly a tentative step. Even leaving aside the other greenhouse gases, the United States transportation sector emits an enormous quantity of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere – according to the MacCracken affidavit, more than 1.7 billion metric tons in 1999 alone. ¶ 30, Stdg. App. 219. That accounts for more than 6% of worldwide carbon dioxide emissions. Id., at 232 (Oppenheimer Decl. ¶ 3); see also MacCracken Decl. ¶ 31, at 220. To put this in perspective: Considering just emissions from the transportation sector, which represent less than one-third of this country's total carbon dioxide emissions, the United States would still rank as the third-largest emitter of carbon dioxide in the world, outpaced only by the European Union and China. Judged by any standard, U.S. motor-vehicle emissions make a meaningful contribution to greenhouse gas concentrations and hence, according to petitioners, to global warming.

The Remedy

While it may be true that regulating motor-vehicle emissions will not by itself reverse global warming, it by no means follows that we lack jurisdiction to decide whether EPA has a duty to take steps to slow or reduce it. See also Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 244, n.15 (1982) ("[A] plaintiff satisfies the redressability requirement when he shows that a favorable decision will relieve a discrete injury to himself. He need not show that a favorable decision will relieve his every injury"). Because of the enormity of the potential consequences associated with man-made climate change, the fact that the effectiveness of a remedy might be delayed during the (relatively short) time it takes for a new motor-vehicle fleet to replace an older one is essentially irrelevant. Nor is it dispositive that developing countries such as China and India are poised to increase greenhouse gas emissions substantially over the next century: A reduction in domestic emissions would slow the pace of global emissions increases, no matter what happens elsewhere.

We moreover attach considerable significance to EPA's "agreement with the President that 'we must address the issue of global climate change,'" 68 Fed. Reg. 52929 (quoting remarks announcing Clear Skies and Global Climate Initiatives, 2002 Public Papers of George W. Bush, Vol. 1, Feb. 14, p. 227 (2004)), and to EPA's ardent support for various voluntary emission-reduction programs, 68 Fed. Reg. 52932. As Judge Tatel observed in dissent below, "EPA would presumably not bother with such efforts if it thought emissions reductions would have no discernable impact on future global warming." 415 F.3d at 66.

In sum – at least according to petitioners' uncontested affidavits – the rise in sea levels associated with global warming has already harmed and will continue to harm Massachusetts. The risk of catastrophic harm, though remote, is nevertheless real. That risk would be reduced to some extent if petitioners received the relief they seek. We therefore hold that petitioners have standing to challenge the EPA's denial of their rulemaking petition.

Global warming may be a "crisis," even "the most pressing environmental problem of our time." Pet. for Cert. 26, 22. Indeed, it may ultimately affect nearly everyone on the planet in some potentially adverse way, and it may be that governments have done too little to address it. It is not a problem, however, that has escaped the attention of policymakers in the Executive and Legislative Branches of our Government, who continue to consider regulatory, legislative, and treaty-based means of addressing global climate change.

Apparently dissatisfied with the pace of progress on this issue in the elected branches, petitioners have come to the courts claiming broad-ranging injury, and attempting to tie that injury to the Government's alleged failure to comply with a rather narrow statutory provision. I would reject these challenges as nonjusticiable. Such a conclusion involves no judgment on whether global warming exists, what causes it, or the extent of the problem. Nor does it render petitioners without recourse. This Court's standing jurisprudence simply recognizes that redress of grievances of the sort at issue here "is the function of Congress and the Chief Executive," not the federal courts. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 576 (1992). I would vacate the judgment below and remand for dismissal of the petitions for review.

I

Our modern framework for addressing standing is familiar: "A plaintiff must allege personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief." DaimlerChrysler, supra, 126 S. Ct. 1854 (slip op., at 6) (quoting Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (internal quotation marks omitted)). Applying that standard here, petitioners bear the burden of alleging an injury that is fairly traceable to the Environmental Protection Agency's failure to promulgate new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards, and that is likely to be redressed by the prospective issuance of such standards.

Before determining whether petitioners can meet this familiar test, however, the Court changes the rules. It asserts that "States are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction," and that given "Massachusetts' stake in protecting its quasi-sovereign interests, the Commonwealth is entitled to special solici tude in our standing analysis."

Relaxing Article III standing requirements because asserted injuries are pressed by a State, however, has no basis in our jurisprudence, and support for any such "special solici tude" is conspicuously absent from the Court's opinion. The general judicial review provision cited by the Court, 42 U.S.C. § 7607(b)(1), affords States no special rights or status. The Court states that "Congress has ordered EPA to protect Massachusetts (among others)" through the statutory provision at issue, § 7521(a)(1), and that "Congress has . . . recognized a concomitant procedual right to challenge the rejection of its rulemaking petition as arbitrary and capricious." The reader might think from this unfortunate phrasing that Congress said something about the rights of States in this particular provision of the statute. Congress knows how to do that when it wants to, see, e.g.,§ 7426(b) (affording States the right to petition EPA to directly regulate certain sources of pollution), but it has done nothing of the sort here. [Here], Congress treated public and private litigants exactly the same.

Nor does the case law cited by the Court provide any support for the notion that Article III somehow implicitly treats public and private litigants differently. The Court has to go back a full century in an attempt to justify its novel standing rule, but even there it comes up short. The Court's analysis hinges on Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230 (1907) – a case that did indeed draw a distinction between a State and private litigants, but solely with respect to available remedies. The case had nothing to do with Article III standing.

In Tennessee Copper, the State of Georgia sought to enjoin copper companies in neighboring Tennessee from discharging pollutants that were inflicting "a wholesale destruction of forests, orchards and crops" in bordering Georgia counties. Id., at 236. Although the State owned very little of the territory allegedly affected, the Court reasoned that Georgia – in its capacity as a "quasi-sovereign" -- "has an interest independent of and behind the titles of its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain." Id., at 237. The Court explained that while "the very elements that would be relied upon in a suit between fellow-citizens as a ground for equitable relief [were] wanting," a State "is not lightly to be required to give up quasi-sovereign rights for pay." Ibid. Thus while a complaining private litigant would have to make do with a legal remedy – one "for pay" – the State was entitled to equitable relief. See id., at 237-238.

In contrast to the present case, there was no question in Tennessee Copper about Article III injury. See id., at 238-239. There was certainly no suggestion that the State could show standing where the private parties could not; there was no dispute, after all, that the private landowners had "an action at law." Id., at 238. Tennessee Copper has since stood for nothing more than a State's right, in an original jurisdiction action, to sue in a representative capacity as parens patriae. See, e.g., Maryland
v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 737 (1981). Nothing about a State's ability to sue in that capacity dilutes the bedrock requirement of showing injury, causation, and redressability to satisfy Article III.

A claim of parens patriae standing is distinct from an allegation of direct injury. See Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 448-449 (1992). Far from being a substitute for Article III injury, parens patriae actions raise an additional hurdle for a state litigant: the articulation of a "quasi-sovereign interest" "apart from the interests of particular private parties." Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico ex rel. Barez, 458 U.S. 592, 607 (1982) (emphasis added). Just as an association suing on behalf of its members must show not only that it represents the members but that at least one satisfies Article III requirements, so too a State asserting quasi-sovereign interests as parens patriae must still show that its citizens satisfy Article III. Focusing on Massachusetts's interests as quasi-sovereign makes the required showing here harder, not easier. The Court, in effect, takes what has always been regarded as a necessary condition for parens patriae standing – a quasi-sovereign interest – and converts it into a sufficient showing for purposes of Article III.

What is more, the Court's reasoning falters on its own terms. The Court asserts that Massachusetts is entitled to "special solicitude" due to its "quasi-sovereign interests," but then applies our Article III standing test to the asserted injury of the State's loss of coastal property. In the context of parens patriae standing, however, we have characterized state ownership of land as a "nonsovereign interest" because a State "is likely to have the same interests as other similarly situated proprietors." Alfred L. Snapp & Son, supra, at 601.

On top of everything else, the Court overlooks the fact that our cases cast significant doubt on a State's standing to assert a quasi-sovereign interest – as opposed to a direct injury – against the Federal Government. As a general rule, we have held that while a State might assert a quasi-sovereign right as parens patriae "for the protection of its citizens, it is no part of its duty or power to enforce their rights in respect of their relations with the Federal Government. In that field it is the United States, and no the State, which represents them." Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 485-486 (1923) (citation omitted); see also Alfred L. Snapp & Son, supra, at 610, n.16.

All of this presumably explains why petitioners never cited Tennessee Copper in their briefs before this Court or the D.C. Circuit. It presumably explains why not one of the legion of amici supporting petitioners ever cited the case. And it presumably explains why not one of the three judges writing below ever cited the case either. Given that one purpose of the standing requirement is "to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination," ante, at 13-14 (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962)), it is ironic that the Court today adopts a new theory of Article III standing for States without the benefit of briefing or argument on the point.

II

It is not at all clear how the Court's "special solicitude" for Massachusetts plays out in the standing analysis, except as an implicit concession that petitioners cannot establish standing on traditional terms. But the status of Massachusetts as a State cannot compensate for petitioners' failure to demonstrate injury in fact, causation, and redressability.
When the Court actually applies the three-part test, it focuses, as did the dissent below, see 367 U.S. App. D.C. 282, 415 F.3d 50, 64 (CADC 2005) (opinion of Tatel, J.), on the State's asserted loss of coastal land as the injury in fact. If petitioners rely on loss of land as the Article III injury, however, they must ground the rest of the standing analysis in that specific injury.

If petitioners' particularized injury is loss of coastal land, it is also that injury that must be "actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical," Defenders of Wildlife, supra, at 560 (internal quotation marks omitted), "real and immediate," Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 102 (1983) (internal quotation marks omitted), and "certainly impending," Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 158 (1990) (internal quotation marks omitted).

As to "actual" injury, the Court observes that "global sea levels rose somewhere between 10 and 20 centimeters over the 20th century as a result of global warming" and that "these rising seas have already begun to swallow Massachusetts' coastal land." But none of petitioners' declarations supports that connection. One declaration states that "a rise in sea level due to climate change is occurring on the coast of Massachusetts, in the metropolitan Boston area," but there is no elaboration. Petitioners' Standing Appendix in No. 03-1361, etc. (CADC), p. 196 (Stdg. App.). And the declarant goes on to identify a "significant" non-global-warming cause of Boston's rising sea level: land subsidence. Id., at 197; see also id., at 216. Thus, aside from a single conclusory statement, there is nothing in petitioners' 43 standing declarations and accompanying exhibits to support an inference of actual loss of Massachusetts coastal land from 20th century global sea level increases. It is pure conjecture.

The Court's attempts to identify "imminent" or "certainly impending" loss of Massachusetts coastal land fares no better. One of petitioners' declarants predicts global warming will cause sea level to rise by 20 to 70 centimeters by the year 2100. Stdg. App. 216. Another uses a computer modeling program to map the Commonwealth's coastal land and its current elevation, and calculates that the high-end estimate of sea level rise would result in the loss of significant state-owned coastal land. Id., at 179. But the computer modeling program has a conceded average error of about 30 centimeters and a maximum observed error of 70 centimeters. Id., at 177-178. As an initial matter, if it is possible that the model underrepresents the elevation of coastal land to an extent equal to or in excess of the projected sea level rise, it is difficult to put much stock in the predicted loss of land. But even placing that problem to the side, accepting a century-long time horizon and a series of compounded estimates renders requirements of imminence and immediacy utterly toothless. See Defenders of Wildlife, supra, at 565, n.2 (while the concept of "'imminence'" in standing doctrine is "somewhat elastic," it can be "stretched beyond the breaking point"). "Allegations of possible future injury do not satisfy the requirements of Art. III. A threatened injury must be certainly impending to constitute injury in fact." Whitmore, supra, at 158 (internal quotation marks omitted; emphasis added).

Petitioners' reliance on Massachusetts's loss of coastal land as their injury in fact for standing purposes creates insurmountable problems for them with respect to causation and redressability. To establish standing, petitioners must show a causal connection between that specific injury and the lack of new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards, and that the promulgation of such standards would likely redress that injury. As is often the case, the questions of causation and redressability overlap. See Allen, 468 U.S., at 753, n.19 (observing that the two requirements were "initially articulated by this Court as two facets of a single causation requirement" (internal quotation marks omitted)). And importantly, when a party is challenging the Government's allegedly unlawful regulation, or lack of regulation, of a third party, satisfying the causation and redressability requirements becomes "substantially more difficult." Defenders of Wildlife, supra, at 562 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Warth, supra, at 504-505.

Petitioners view the relationship between their injuries and EPA's failure to promulgate new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards as simple and direct: Domestic motor vehicles emit carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. Worldwide emissions of greenhouse gases contribute to global warming and therefore also to petitioners' alleged injuries. Without the new vehicle standards, greenhouse gas emissions – and therefore global warming and its attendant harms – have been higher than they otherwise would have been; once EPA changes course, the trend will be reversed.

The Court ignores the complexities of global warming, and does so by now disregarding the "particularized" injury it relied on in step one, and using the dire nature of global warming itself as a bootstrap for finding causation and redressability. First, it is important to recognize the extent of the emissions at issue here. Because local greenhouse gas emissions disperse throughout the atmosphere and remain there for anywhere from 50 to 200 years, it is global emissions data that are relevant. See App. to Pet. for Cert. A-73. According to one of petitioners' declarations, domestic motor vehicles contribute about 6 percent of global carbon dioxide emissions and 4 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions. Stdg. App. 232. The amount of global emissions at issue here is smaller still; § 202(a)(1) of the Clean Air Act covers only new motor vehicles and new motor vehicle engines, so petitioners' desired emission standards might reduce only a fraction of 4 percent of global emissions.

This gets us only to the relevant greenhouse gas emissions; linking them to global warming and ultimately to petitioners' alleged injuries next requires consideration of further complexities. As EPA explained in its denial of petitioners' request for rulemaking, "predicting future climate change necessarily involves a complex web of economic and physical factors including: our ability to predict future global anthropogenic emissions of [greenhouse gases] and aerosols; the fate of these emissions once they enter the atmosphere (e.g., what percentage are absorbed by vegetation or are taken up by the oceans); the impact of those emissions that remain in the atmosphere on the radiative properties of the atmosphere; changes in critically important climate feedbacks (e.g., changes in cloud cover and ocean circulation); changes in temperature characteristics (e.g., average temperatures, shifts in daytime and evening temperatures); changes in other climatic parameters (e.g., shifts in precipitation, storms); and ultimately the impact of such changes on human health and welfare (e.g., increases or decreases in agricultural productivity, human health impacts)." App. to Pet. for Cert. A-83 through A-84.
Petitioners are never able to trace their alleged injuries back through this complex web to the fractional amount of global emissions that might have been limited with EPA standards. In light of the bit-part domestic new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emissions have played in what petitioners describe as a 150-year global phenomenon, and the myriad additional factors bearing on petitioners' alleged injury – the loss of Massachusetts coastal land – the connection is far too speculative to establish causation.

Redressability is even more problematic. To the tenuous link between petitioners' alleged injury and the indeterminate fractional domestic emissions at issue here, add the fact that petitioners cannot meaningfully predict what will come of the 80 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions that originate outside the United States. As the Court acknowledges, "developing countries such as China and India are poised to increase greenhouse gas emissions substantially over the next century," ante, at 23, so the domestic emissions at issue here may become an increasingly marginal portion of global emissions, and any decreases produced by petitioners' desired standards are likely to be overwhelmed many times over by emissions increases elsewhere in the world.

Petitioners offer declarations attempting to address this uncertainty, contending that "if the U.S. takes steps to reduce motor vehicle emissions, other countries are very likely to take similar actions regarding their own motor vehicles using technology developed in response to the U.S. program." Stdg. App. 220; see also id., at 311-312. In other words, do not worry that other countries will contribute far more to global warming than will U.S. automobile emissions; someone is bound to invent something, and places like the People's Republic of China or India will surely require use of the new technology, regardless of cost. The Court previously has explained that when the existence of an element of standing "depends on the unfettered choices made by independent actors not before the courts and whose exercise of broad and legitimate discretion the courts cannot presume either to control or to predict," a party must present facts supporting an assertion that the actor will proceed in such a manner. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S., at 562 (quoting ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 615 (1989) (opinion of Kennedy, J.) (internal quotation marks omitted). The declarations' conclusory (not to say fanciful) statements do not even come close.

No matter, the Court reasons, because any decrease in domestic emissions will "slow the pace of global emissions increases, no matter what happens elsewhere." Every little bit helps, so Massachusetts can sue over any little bit.

The Court's sleight-of-hand is in failing to link up the different elements of the three-part standing test. What must be likely to be redressed is the particular injury in fact. The injury the Court looks to is the asserted loss of land. The Court contends that regulating domestic motor vehicle emissions will reduce carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, and therefore redress Massachusetts's injury. But even if regulation does reduce emissions – to some indeterminate degree, given events elsewhere in the world – the Court never explains why that makes it likely that the injury in fact – the loss of land – will be redressed. Schoolchildren know that a kingdom might be lost "all for the want of a horseshoe nail," but "likely" redressability is a different matter. The realities make it pure conjecture to suppose that EPA regulation of new automobile emissions will likely prevent the loss of Massachusetts coastal land.

Today's decision recalls the previous high-water mark of diluted standing requirements, United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP), 412 U.S. 669 (1973). SCRAP involved "probably the most attenuated injury conferring Art. III standing" and "surely went to the very outer limit of the law" – until today. Whitmore, 495 U.S., at 158-159; see also Lujan v. Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n, 497 U.S. 871, 889 (1990) (SCRAP "has never since been emulated by this Court"). In SCRAP, the Court based an environmental group's standing to challenge a railroad freight rate surcharge on the group's allegation that increases in railroad rates would cause an increase in the use of nonrecyclable goods, resulting in the increased need for natural resources to produce such goods. According to the group, some of these resources might be taken from the Washington area, resulting in increased refuse that might find its way into area parks, harming the group's members. 412 U.S., at 688.

Over time, SCRAP became emblematic not of the looseness of Article III standing requirements, but of how utterly manipulable they are if not taken seriously as a matter of judicial self-restraint. SCRAP made standing seem a lawyer's game, rather than a fundamental limitation ensuring that courts function as courts and not intrude on the politically accountable branches. Today's decision is SCRAP for a new generation.

Perhaps the Court recognizes as much. How else to explain its need to devise a new doctrine of state standing to support its result? The good news is that the Court's "special solicitude" for Massachusetts limits the future applicability of the diluted standing requirements applied in this case. The bad news is that the Court's self-professed relaxation of those Article III requirements has caused us to transgress "the proper – and properly limited – role of the courts in a democratic society." Allen, 468 U.S., at 750 (internal quotation marks omitted).

New EPA regulations regarding greenhouse gases, developed in response to this case, were substantially upheld in Utility Air Regulatory Group v. EPA, 134 S. Ct. 2427 (2014) (Regulations regarding greenhouse gases for sources already regulated for conventional pollutants, which covers over 95% of regulated sources, are valid, but unreasonable to assert statutory authority to apply regulations to new sources solely on basis of greenhouse gas emissions).

1. The Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

The traditional natural law approach toward justiciability issues began with the natural law premise that where there is a wrong, there must be a remedy. As stated by Chief Justice John Marshall in

Curbing the impact of these observations is the doctrine of separation of powers. Referring to the possibility of courts meddling with executive prerogatives, Marshall said in Marbury, "The province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals, not to enquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties in which they have a discretion." These principles sustain a standing doctrine that seeks to accommodate the duty of courts to provide a remedy for injuries with the need to avoid interference with other branches. Justice O'Connor wrote for the Court in 1984, "[T]he law of Art. III standing is built on a single basic idea – the idea of separation of powers."

On separation of powers grounds, early Supreme Court decisions rejected the practice of rendering advisory opinions. The first such case to so hold was Hayburn’s Case, decided in 1792. One year later, Chief Justice Jay, and the Associate Justices, sent a letter to President Washington's Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, confirming the view that federal courts may not give advisory opinions:

> [T]he lines of separation [are] drawn by the Constitution between the three departments of the government. These being in certain respects checks upon each other, and our being judges in a court of the last resort, are considerations which afford strong arguments against the propriety of our extra-judicially deciding the questions [previously asked], especially as the power given by the Constitution to the President, of calling on the heads of departments for opinions, seems to have been purposely as well as expressly united to the executive departments.

In addition to this separation of powers argument, a concern with shielding judges from the charge of bias was also noted by a number of framers and ratifiers of the Constitution as supporting a ban on federal judges rendering advisory opinions. The charge of bias might result if judges were to decide on the constitutionality of legislation after having rendered an advisory opinion on that matter. Thus, in this instance, concerns regarding separation of powers and the appropriate role of the Court in our constitutional design triumphed over a broader view of standing reflected in customary English common law practice. As the Supreme Court has noted, the English practice at the time of the Constitution permitted English courts to render advisory opinions.

2. The Formalist Era: 1873-1937

During the formalist era, between 1873 and 1937, the Court continued to articulate the concept of standing in terms of the customary meaning of "cases and controversies" found in judicial precedents, including those of England, while acknowledging a separation of powers base to standing doctrine. While the language of the cases did not foreclose a broad view of standing, the specific case results did not evince much support for an expansive view of standing. For example, in 1921, the Court denied standing in Fairchild v. Hughes, which involved a claim by a citizen that the 19th Amendment should be declared void as not ratified according to proper procedures. The Court noted that the common law does not entitle one to sue "to secure a determination whether a statute, if passed, or a constitutional amendment about to be adopted, will be valid."

The most notable case on standing from the formalist era was the 1923 case of Frothingham v. Mellon. The State of Massachusetts and Mrs. Frothingham challenged the federal Maternity Act. It granted money to states if they consented to federal conditions attached to the grants. The Court said Massachusetts suffered no injury since the federal law "simply extends an option which the State is free to accept or reject." Thus, the claim involved only "abstract questions of political power, of sovereignty, of government." Regarding Mrs. Frothingham's standing as an injured taxpayer, the Court stated: "Looking through forms of words to the substance of their complaint, it is merely that officials of the executive department of the government are executing and will execute an act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional; and this we are asked to prevent. To do so would be not to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which plainly we do not possess."

See Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 96 (1968). This Article III ban only applies to the federal courts. Under a few state provisions, such as in Colorado, Florida, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and South Dakota in their state Constitutions, and in Alabama, Delaware, and Oklahoma (only for death penalty cases) by state statute, some state Supreme Courts have power to issue advisory opinions. See Helen Hershkoff, State Courts and the "Passive Virtues:" Rethinking the Judicial Function, 114 Harv. L. Rev. 1833, 1844-52 (2001). So do many constitutional courts in other countries and courts created pursuant to international treaties. See Jo M. Pasqualucci, Advisory Practice of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights: Contributing to the Evolution of International Human Rights Law, 38 Stan. J. Int’l L. 241, 245-49 (2002).

also noted, "Her interest in the moneys of the Treasury . . . is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of equity." 27

3. The Holmesian Era: 1937-1954

The limited view of standing suggested in Frothingham was developed further by the Supreme Court between 1937 and 1954. During this period, the Court for the first time began to articulate standing doctrine in terms of the requirement of a "distinct injury."

The requirement of a direct or distinct injury became the explicit reason for denying a taxpayer standing in the 1952 case of Doremus v. Board of Education. 28 The Court stated, "Without disparaging the availability of the remedy by taxpayer's action to restrain unconstitutional acts which result in direct pecuniary injury, we reiterate what the Court said of a federal statute as equally true when a state Act is assailed: 'The party who invokes the power must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid but that he has sustained or is imminently in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally.'"

Because of its posture of deference to government, the Holmesian way of phrasing the first central issue of standing, that is, how difficult should it be to establish standing in non-traditional kinds of cases, tends to put higher barriers in the way of a litigant suing the government than does a natural law or formalist approach. For example, rather than requiring that it be "likely" an injury will occur, Justice Rehnquist said in Whitmore v. Arkansas 29 that a "threatened injury must be 'certainly impending' to constitute injury in fact." Trying to create a longer pedigree for his newly-minted requirement that the injury be "certainly impending," Justice Rehnquist noted in Whitmore that the phrase "certainly impending" had been used in an old formalist-era case, Pennsylvania v. West Virginia. 30 In that 1923 case, however, the Court merely found that the plaintiffs could easily meet the standing requirement because their injury was, in fact, "certainly impending." The Court did not require in Pennsylvania that an injury had to be "certainly impending" for standing to be found. 31 The cite in Whitmore to Pennsylvania thus appears to be an attempt by Justice Rehnquist to support a higher standard of injury with a precedent that does not lend itself to such support. Nonetheless, it is not surprising that Chief Justice Roberts, another Holmesian Justice, picked up on the “certainly impending” language and used it in his dissent in Massachusetts v. EPA,\(^{32}\) excerpted above at § 3.2.

With regard to the second central issue of standing, whether substantial congressional extensions of standing should be permitted, the Holmesian posture of deference to the other branches of government means that Holmesian judges will be relatively willing to allow suits by individual litigants representing the public interest, despite their lack of economic or personal interests, if Congress has clearly authorized such actions. Thus, although they are rather strict when interpreting the Article III injury-in-fact requirement in response to the first central issue of standing, with regard to the second central issue, Holmesian judges can be expected to give Congress substantial leeway in authorizing private actions. Justice Harlan noted in dissent in Flast v. Cohen,\(^{33}\) “This Court has previously held that individual litigants have standing to represent the public interest, despite their lack of economic or other personal interests, if Congress has appropriately authorized such suits.”

4. The Instrumentalist Era: 1954-1986

Because of instrumentalist concern with individuals being able to vindicate their rights in court, an instrumentalist approach is more willing than any other decisionmaking style to find that a party has standing, that the case is ripe, is not moot, and that the case does not present a political question.\(^{34}\) For example, Justice Brennan, a classic instrumentalist, wrote, “[C]onstitutional interpretation for a federal judge is, for the most part, obligatory. When litigants approach the bar of the court to adjudicate a constitutional dispute, they may justifiably demand an answer. Judges cannot avoid a definitive interpretation because they feel unable to, or would prefer not to, penetrate to the full meaning of the Constitution's provisions.”\(^{35}\)

\(^{33}\) 392 U.S. 83, 131 (1968) (Harlan, J., dissenting). Justice Harlan added in a footnote, however, "I do not, of course, suggest that Congress' power to authorize suits by specified classes of litigants is without constitutional limitation." Id. at 131 n.21. As for what these limitations might be, Justice Harlan said: "This Court has recognized a panoply of restrictions upon the actions that may properly be brought in federal courts, or reviewed by this Court after decision in state courts. It is enough now to emphasize that I would not abrogate these restrictions . . . ." Id.

\(^{34}\) See Archibald Cox, The Role of the Supreme Court: Judicial Activism or Self-Restraint, 47 Md. L. Rev. 118, 127-28 (1987) ("Measured in institutional terms, the constitutional decisions of the Warren and early Burger Courts . . . encouraged constitutional litigation by easing access to the federal courts in constitutional cases, and also by loosening the rules determining whether, when, and upon whose complaint a court will decide a constitutional question.").

Thus, during the 1960s, when instrumentalism held sway on the Court, the Court readily found standing for voters and taxpayers to challenge governmental action. A majority reasoned that standing barriers were based primarily on what was needed for effective judicial administration, rather than on separation of powers concerns about judicial invasion of the province of other branches, which underlies the concrete injury requirement. The critical turning point can be found in the 1962 case of Baker v. Carr, where Justice Brennan wrote: “Have the appellants alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions? This is the gist of the question of standing.”

Six years later, Chief Justice Warren cited this language with approval in Flast v. Cohen, where the Court found standing for federal taxpayers to raise an Establishment Clause challenge to government spending that reached some parochial schools. The Chief Justice noted in Flast that because the question whether "a particular person is a proper party to maintain the action does not, of its own force, raise separation of powers problems," most standing limitations are prudential, imposed as a matter of policy rather than constitutional requirement. The central constitutional core, said Warren, and the rule that "implements the separation of powers prescribed by the Constitution," is merely that the Court will not give advisory opinions. The Chief Justice concluded, “[I]n terms of Article III limitations on federal court jurisdiction, the question of standing is related only to whether the dispute sought to be adjudicated will be presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of judicial resolution.” Arguably this suit was on behalf of the public rather than the plaintiffs because the plaintiffs had not suffered any tangible personal injuries. Not surprisingly, there was a Holmesian dissent in the case. Justice Harlan's dissent said that there must be some effectual power in the government to restrain constitutional infractions, but, "as Mr. Justice Holmes wisely observed, the other branches of Government 'are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts.'"

By using language from Baker v. Carr, Flast v. Cohen appeared to make possible a wide expansion of the concept of standing in every case, not just cases of taxpayer challenges to government spending. All that was needed was some kind of personal stake in the outcome, relating to the status asserted by the plaintiff, which assured concrete adverseness in the litigation. And, unless the case involved an advisory opinion, Justice Warren's opinion in Flast seemed to assume that Congress was not constitutionally limited in its ability to create standing.

This possible result of Flast began to become clearer in several cases decided shortly thereafter where the Court extended the loose, prudential approach of Flast to actions based upon a congressional statute. For example, the Court was quite willing to follow an attenuated line of reasoning to find an injury in fact caused by the challenged conduct in United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP). This case involved § 702 of the Administrative Procedure Act. It authorized judicial review by persons "adversely affected or aggrieved" or "suffering legal wrong." Five law students were permitted to challenge a surcharge imposed on freight rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission without the ICC first filing a detailed environmental impact statement. The students claimed that the ICC had thereby caused them economic harm and affected their use of the environment because the higher rates proposed by the IOC on freight rates for recyclable goods would lead to greater use of non-recyclable goods, which would harm the environment they enjoyed both in terms of greater amounts of non-recyclable trash and in terms of greater depletion of the forests they enjoyed to produce non-recyclable goods. The Court said that standing is not to be denied simply because many people suffer the same injury, and the Court could not say that plaintiffs could not prove their allegations which, if proved, "would place them squarely among those persons injured in fact by the Commission's action," and entitled to seek review. The same year as SCRAP, the Court explicitly noted the recent expansion of standing doctrine in Linda R.S. v. Richard D., stating, "Recent decisions by this Court have greatly expanded the type of 'personal stake[s]' which are capable of conferring standing on a potential plaintiff."

Regarding the second central issue of standing, the Court assumed congressional power to create standing in Trafficante v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. There the Court concluded that in § 804 of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 Congress had given residents of housing facilities covered by the statute an actionable right to be free from the adverse consequences to them of racially discriminatory practices directed at and immediately harmful to others. The Court similarly noted in Linda R.S. v. Richard D., that "Congress may enact statutes creating legal rights, the invasion of which creates standing, even though no injury would exist without the statute."

However, shortly after the high-water mark of a prudential and more relaxed approach to standing was reached in cases like Flast, SCRAP, Trafficante, and Linda R.S., another process was getting under way that resulted in the Court's return to a largely pre-instrumentalist perspective. Between 1969 and 1972, four new Justices were appointed to the Court. The retirement of Justices Warren and Fortas resulted in a loss of the 5-Justice instrumentalist majority on the Court (Chief Justice Warren and Justices Douglas, Brennan, Marshall, and Fortas). Although Justice Blackmun, who replaced Fortas, eventually adopted a moderate instrumentalist perspective, after 1973 there were at most only four instrumentalist Justices on the Court at any one time (Justices Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, and Douglas, replaced by Stevens in 1975). To get the critical fifth vote to follow up vigorously on the path opened by Flast, one natural law, formalist, or Holmesian Justice would have to join what the instrumentalist perspective suggested. Based on the historically more limited approach to standing represented by these approaches, this rarely happened.

5. The Modern Natural Law Approach: 1986-Today

A. Modern Doctrine on Injury-in-Fact

Justices using the modern natural law approach have tried to develop a reasoned elaboration of standing doctrine while responding to the tension between the old English common-law basis for standing and the American separation of powers base. In addition, modern standing doctrine has been developed against a backdrop of later judicial precedents regarding standing, many of which suggest for standing a separation of powers base, along with an "injury-in-fact" requirement.

Naturally, standing will be found where a direct, present injury is apparent. Thus, standing was found in McCleskey v. Kemp,\(^{45}\) which involved a black criminal defendant, sentenced to death, who had standing to claim race discrimination in sentencing based on certain sentencing statistics because actual harm to him, his death sentence, was his alleged injury. Standing was also found in Quinn v. Millsap,\(^{46}\) which involved a plaintiff who did not own real property, who challenged a state law requirement that one had to own real property in order to serve on a government board.

Even where the alleged injury is not so direct or apparent, the Court has been willing to find standing. For example, in Meese v. Keene,\(^{47}\) standing was granted where a state representative alleged that his professional reputation would suffer if he were required to exhibit a film using the authorities' label of "political propaganda," since his personal, political, and professional reputation would suffer if the film had to be distributed under that label. This allegation was supported by a public opinion poll and the views of an experienced political analyst. The Court also found standing in Northeastern Florida Contractors v. Jacksonville,\(^{48}\) where contractors were allowed to challenge a city's allegedly discriminatory bidding policy without alleging that they would have received contracts had the discrimination not existed. To show injury from a 10% city contract racial set-aside program, non-minority contractors need allege only that they were denied an equal opportunity to compete, not that "but for" the law the plaintiffs would have landed city contracts.

Perhaps most revealingly, as excerpted at § 3.2, in Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, natural law Justices joined with instrumentalists to indicate that had the plaintiffs bought plane tickets to view the site where the alleged harm to species was occurring, standing would have been granted. Although from a functional, instrumentalist perspective, as in the Justice Stevens and Blackmun dissents in Lujan, it may seem nit-picking to have standing turn on whether plaintiffs buy a couple of tickets to visit a site, from the more analytic perspective of a natural law approach, Justices Kennedy and Souter are right that the concreteness of the injury is enhanced if tickets are bought.

Only in cases where the injury was very remote, less personal, or further removed from the challenged conduct, has the Court, with its current majority, refused to find that an injury in fact had occurred. For example, in Whitmore v. Arkansas, the petitioner, a death row inmate, challenged the validity of a death sentence imposed on another inmate, a mass murderer who had elected to forgo his right of appeal. The petitioner claiming that he was injured because of the possibility that if he was retried and resentenced he might be disadvantaged by having the other inmate's heinous crime included in a data base. The Court said that petitioner had provided no factual basis to conclude that the sentence imposed on the mass murderer would even be relevant to a future comparative review of his sentence, and thus the complaint represented only a generalized concern about procedures surrounding imposition of the death penalty.

Similarly, in Lujan v. National Wildlife Foundation, members of an environmental group lacked standing to question a decision of the Bureau of Land Management concerning mining on public lands. The plaintiffs focused only on the use of some lands "in the vicinity" of the federal tracts on which mining might occur, rather than use of lands that would be more clearly affected by the proposed mining. The plaintiff's complaint thus represented nothing more than a generalized grievance about the Bureau's decisionmaking.

50 495 U.S. 149, 154-61 (1990). An instrumentalist dissent concluded that because the other inmate had standing, the Court could allow plaintiff to sue as next friend because of the important public interests involved and concrete adverseness could be established, even though it had not been shown that the other inmate was unable to litigate his own cause due to mental incapacity, lack of access to court, or other disability. Id. at 176-81 (Marshall, J., joined by Brennan, J., dissenting).

In United States v. Hays, resident voters in one district were held to lack standing to challenge the lines drawn for another district as unconstitutionally based on race, since plaintiffs offered no evidence that they personally suffered injury. Justice O'Connor stated for the majority that unless there is evidence that the plaintiff has personally been subjected to a racial classification, plaintiff "would be asserting only a generalized grievance against governmental conduct." On the other hand, Justice O'Connor noted, "Where a plaintiff resides in a racially gerrymandered district, however, the plaintiff has been denied equal treatment because of the legislature's reliance on racial criteria, and therefore has standing to challenge the legislature's action."

The fact that plaintiff may have standing to claim damages for past violations does not in itself establish a real and immediate threat of future injury. In City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, a 5-4 Court held that plaintiff lacked standing to seek an injunction against future chokeholds by the Los Angeles police force. Plaintiff had pled past injury, but the majority said it was only speculation that plaintiff might again be stopped and choked. In dissent, instrumentalist Justices Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens objected that since no one can show that he or she will be choked in the future, the Court's theory meant that no one would have standing to question a possibly invalid police policy. Justice Marshall said that the plaintiff had standing from the past injury, and since plaintiff was choked pursuant to city policy, there was a basis for the District Court's equitable relief – a preliminary injunction not to use the hold except when threatened by deadly force.

In Massachusetts v. EPA, excerpted at § 3.2, a 5-4 Court held that Massachusetts had standing to challenge the failure of the EPA to make a judgment on whether it should regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles. In contrast, in Summers v. Earth Island Institute, a 5-4 Court held that certain environmental organizations lacked standing to challenge the United States Forest Service concerning its allegedly illegal decision to conduct a salvage sale of timber without providing notice, comment, and appeal. Justice Scalia wrote that the plaintiff organizations had not identified any application of the challenged regulation that threatened imminent and concrete harm. Consistent with his concurrence in Lujan, Justice Kennedy said Summers would be different, and more like Massachusetts v. EPA, if Congress had sought to provide redress for a concrete injury. Here, however, Congress had provided for a procedural right to bring an action against the Forest Service, but had not identified an interest separate from that right, and a procedural right not related to a separate concrete interest does not confer standing.\textsuperscript{57} In dissent, Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, said that the test should be whether there is a realistic likelihood that the challenged conduct will, in fact, recur and harm the plaintiff.\textsuperscript{58}

In \textit{Hollingsworth v. Perry},\textsuperscript{59} a 5-4 Court held that proponents of California Proposition 8, a voter-enacted ballot initiative that amended the California Constitution to provide that only marriage between a man and a woman was valid, did not have standing to appeal a district court’s order declaring the Proposition unconstitutional. While the individual plaintiffs, same-sex couples, did have standing in the trial court to challenge Proposition 8, as their ability to get married was injured, once the plaintiffs prevailed in the trial court, and the state of California refused to appeal that decision, general supporters of Proposition 8 were held only to have a “generalized grievance” shared by other citizen supporters of Proposition 8. The Court did note that if the proponents of Proposition 8 had been appointed as “agents” of the state they might have standing to represent the state’s interest in the case. But, here, none of the traditional indicia of agency existed. The practical result of this decision was that the district court’s striking down of Proposition 8 was upheld, and same-sex marriage became lawful in California, as discussed at § 23.4.3 n.53.

A four-Justice dissent acknowledged that because standing in federal court is a matter of federal law, it was not binding on federal courts that the California Supreme Court had concluded that under California law these proponents would have standing to have their appeal heard in state courts. Nevertheless, the dissent concluded that because under state law these proponents would have had a “state-defined status” and “authority to appear in court and assert the State’s interest in defending an enacted initiative when the public officials charged with that duty refuse to do so,” that should be sufficient to give them a concrete injury under federal law, despite not being official “agents” of the state, and that under the majority’s decision, a majority of state citizens voting for a referendum cannot ensure that referendum will be enforced, as long as a district court finds it unconstitutional, and then the requisite state official, Governor or Attorney General, refuses to appeal the decision.\textsuperscript{60}

Ct. 1138, 1143, 1147-50 & n.5 (2013) (using “certainly impending” language, plaintiff failed to show sufficiently “concrete” injury “fairly traceable” to challenged conduct, based on the alleged likelihood that their communications with foreign individuals, whom they believe to be likely targets of FISA wiretapping, will be wiretapped); \textit{id.} at 1155, 1160-65 (Breyer, J., joined by Ginsburg, Sotomayor & Kagan, JJ., dissenting) (likelihood of government surveillance “sufficiently certain” to occur and not “speculative,” discussing, \textit{inter alia}, many Court decisions not requiring the injury to be “certainly impending”); Drake v. Obama, 664 F.3d 774 (9\textsuperscript{th} Cir. 2012) (a range of “birthers” – voters, taxpayers, state representatives, and active military personnel – all lack “concrete” injury to sue President Obama).
B. Modern Causation Analysis

Under the modern natural law approach, causation is easy to establish if the plaintiff's injuries are caused directly by the allegedly unconstitutional feature of a law. If the injury is indirect, however, it may be more difficult to show causation. For example, in Warth v. Seldin, plaintiffs charged a zoning board with discriminating against persons of low and moderate income by vigorous enforcement of a zoning ordinance against developers and builders who might otherwise build some low-income and moderate-income housing. In addition to their lack of injury in fact, the plaintiff home-buyers were also held to lack standing because the record suggested that their inability to live in Penfield was caused by "the economics of the area housing market, rather than of respondents' allegedly illegal acts." Plaintiff builders lacked standing because they did not allege that they had specific projects for which they would like to seek approval.

However, as with Lujan, where merely buying tickets would have been sufficient to satisfy the injury-in-fact and causation requirements, causation can be established in a Warth-like case as long as some attention is paid to make sure causation actually exists. For example, causation was proved in Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp. by a plaintiff who alleged he would have qualified for low-cost housing in a specific project blocked by allegedly unconstitutional zoning laws. Because there was a specific project and indications the plaintiff would qualify absent the zoning law, causation was established, and Warth was distinguished.

Indirect causation was also established in Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc. In Duke Power, the Court decided that the Price-Andersen Act limiting liability to $500 million for injuries caused by an accident at a nuclear power plant was causally related to the ability to obtain financing to build nuclear power plants which, in turn, caused injury to plaintiffs. Indirect causation was also found in Meese v. Keene, the case involving a state representative wishing to exhibit a film without labeling it "political propaganda." The causal connection between exhibiting the films identified as political propaganda, and the state senator's reputation, was supported in the case by a public opinion poll and the views of an experienced political analyst.

C. Modern Doctrine on Redressability

The third element of standing – the requirement of redressability – concerns whether the court action sought would be likely to correct or prevent the problem from occurring. If causation is established, redressability is usually a foregone conclusion, since, in addition to any damage award that might be appropriate, the Court can grant an injunction preventing the challenged conduct which is causing the harm.66 On the other hand, in some cases redressability is viewed by the Court as adding something to the causation analysis.

Redressability was an issue in Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment.67 This was a private enforcement action under the citizen-suit provision of the Emergency Planning and Community Right-To-Know Act (EPCRA). An environmental association sued a small manufacturing company for past violations of EPCRA in failing to file an annual hazardous-chemical inventory and toxic-chemical release forms. The Act provided for "any person" to commence a civil action against an owner who failed to file such forms. After the action was filed the defendant submitted all of the overdue forms. The Court dismissed the case for lack of standing since redressability had not been shown. In discussing the issue of redressability, Justice Scalia explained that none of the items of relief sought would serve to reimburse plaintiffs for their loss of useful information.

Another case of redressability occurred in Wyoming Sawmills, Inc. v. United States Forest Service.68 In this case, the Tenth Circuit held that a timber company’s complaint – that the Forest Service’s plans to consult with Native American tribes to minimize any Forest Service action on sites sacred to the tribes violated the Establishment Clause – failed for lack of redressability. The court noted that while the timber company might have an injury-in-fact from lost timber sales depending on the Forest Service action, any future timber sales lie within the discretion of the Forest Service, and thus the court could do nothing to redress their concern.

§ 3.4 Prudential Standing Doctrine

1. Generalized Grievances and the “Zone of Interests” Test for Standing

A. Generalized Grievances

Even if a plaintiff alleges a constitutionally adequate injury under Article III that was caused by the challenged conduct and that can be redressed by the Court, the Court will not adjudicate generalized grievances pervasively shared and more appropriately addressed by the representative branches.

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III-A, and IV, and an opinion with respect to Part III-B, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice WHITE, and Justice THOMAS join.

We have consistently held that a plaintiff raising only a generally available grievance about government – claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large – does not state an Article III case or controversy. For example, in Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126, 129-130 (1922), we dismissed a suit challenging the propriety of the process by which the Nineteenth Amendment was ratified. Justice Brandeis wrote for the Court: “[This is] not a case within the meaning of . . . Article III. . . . Plaintiff has [asserted] only the right, possessed by every citizen, to require that the Government be administered according to law and that the public moneys be not wasted. Obviously this general right does not entitle a private citizen to institute in the federal courts a suit. . . .” Ibid.

In Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923), we dismissed for lack of Article III standing a taxpayer suit challenging the propriety of certain federal expenditures. We said:

> The party who invokes the power [of judicial review] must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally. . . . Here the parties plaintiff have no such case. . . . [T]heir complaint . . . is merely that officials of the executive department of the government are executing and will execute an act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional; and this we are asked to prevent. To do so would be not to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which plainly we do not possess. Id., at 488-489.

In Ex parte Lévitt, 302 U.S. 633 (1937), we dismissed a suit contending that Justice Black's appointment to this Court violated the Ineligibility Clause, Art. I, § 6, cl. 2. “It is an established principle,” we said, “that to entitle a private individual to invoke the judicial power to determine the validity of executive or legislative action he must show that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining a direct injury as the result of that action and it is not sufficient that he has merely a general interest common to all members of the public.” 302 U.S., at 634. See also Doremus v. Board of Ed. of Hawthorne, 342 U.S. 429, 433–434 (1952) (dismissing taxpayer action on the basis of Mellon).

More recent cases are to the same effect. In United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166 (1974), we dismissed for lack of standing a taxpayer suit challenging the Government's failure to disclose the expenditures of the Central Intelligence Agency, in alleged violation of the constitutional requirement, Art. I, § 9, cl. 7, that “a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.” We held that such a suit rested upon an impermissible “generalized grievance,” and was inconsistent with “the framework of Article III” because “the impact on [plaintiff] is plainly undifferentiated and ‘common to all members of the public.’” Richardson, supra, at 171, 176-177. And in Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974), we dismissed for the same reasons a citizen-taxpayer suit contending that it was a violation of the Incompatibility Clause, Art. I, § 6, cl. 2, for Members of Congress to hold commissions in the military Reserves. We said that the challenged action, “standing alone, would adversely affect only the generalized interest of all citizens in constitutional governance. . . . Since Schlesinger we have on two occasions held that an injury amounting only to the alleged violation of a right to have the Government act in accordance with law was not judicially cognizable because “‘assertion of a right to a particular kind of Government conduct, which the Government has violated by acting differently, cannot alone satisfy the requirements of Art. III without draining those requirements of meaning.’” Allen, 468 U.S., at 754; Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 483 (1982). And only two Terms ago, we rejected the notion that Article III permits a citizen suit to prevent a condemned criminal's execution on the basis of “‘the public interest protections of the Eighth Amendment’”; once again, “[t]his allegation raise[d] only the ‘generalized interest of all citizens in constitutional governance’ . . . and [was] an inadequate basis on which to grant . . . standing.” Whitmore, 495 U.S., at 160.

During the instrumentalist era, when the Article III standing doctrine was easier for plaintiffs to meet, the prudential principle regarding generalized grievances was used to deny plaintiffs standing in cases where plaintiffs had Article III standing. Thus, as indicated in the passage from Lujan above, the Court held that a taxpayer lacks standing in a suit against the CIA to learn details of its expenditures on the theory that published statements of account are required by Art I, § 9, cl. 7, and that, lacking such publications, plaintiff cannot be an informed voter. So, too, reservists and citizens had only an abstract interest in, and no nexus as taxpayers for, objecting to CIA secrecy.69

Near the end of the instrumentalist era, in 1984, a 5-Justice non-instrumentalist majority, in an opinion written by Justice O’Connor, held in Allen v. Wright,70 excerpted at § 3.2, that citizens with only generalized grievances against unlawful governmental actions, or members of minority groups with only generalized grievances against having their minority group stigmatized, did not have a sufficiently “distinct and palpable” injury to satisfy the injury-in-fact test of Article III standing.

69 Schlesinger v. Reservists Committee to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974); United States v. Richardson 418 U.S.166 (1974). See also Drake v. Obama, 664 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 2012) (a range of “birthers” – voters, taxpayers, state representatives, and active military personnel – all lack sufficiently “concrete” injury to sue President Obama)

Thus, the Court transferred the concern with generalized grievances from prudential principles doctrine to Article III “injury-in-fact” standing doctrine. For this reason, the prudential principle regarding generalized grievances has limited applicability today. The most importance consequence of this shift is that once the generalized grievance concern is an Article III concern, not a prudential principle, Congress cannot easily reinstate jurisdiction for plaintiffs with generalized grievances through a statutory citizen-suit provision. Instead, Congress has to use whatever power it has under Article III analysis “to define injuries and articulate chains of causation” where none existed before, as stated in Justice Stevens’ opinion in Massachusetts v. EPA, excerpted at § 3.2, citing Justice Kennedy’s concurrence in Lujan, excerpted at § 3.2, a more confined congressional power.

B. The "Zone of Interests" Test

During the instrumentalist era, when Article III standing was easier to achieve, the Court developed the constitutional “zone of interests” test in 1968 in Flast v. Cohen. In Flast, Chief Justice Warren concluded that while there was no absolute Article III bar to taxpayers suing as taxpayers, the plaintiff would have to meet a two-pronged “zone of interests” test. Under this test, there must be a logical link between the party's status and the type of legislative enactment attacked. Second, a taxpayer must establish a nexus between that status and the precise nature of the constitutional infringement alleged. Thus, a taxpayer must show that the challenged enactment exceeds specific constitutional limitations imposed on the exercise of the taxing and spending power. The taxpayers in Flast satisfied both parts of the nexus test because they were challenging the exercise of congressional spending under Article I, § 8, and the Establishment Clause specifically limits the taxing and spending power granted by Article I, § 8.

With the more stringent view of Article III standing which developed after the Warren Court, the Flast “zone of interests” test has been limited its precise facts, as in Bowen v. Kendrick. Despite the case being one involving taxpayer standing, the Court held in Bowen that taxpayers had standing to bring an Establishment Clause challenge to a federal grant program administered by HEW, since funding for service relating to adolescent sexuality and pregnancy could be provided to religious organizations. Although the general reasoning of Flast has been rejected by the post-instrumentalist Court, the Court relied upon the core holding of Flast as a precedent to support its holding in Bowen.

In no other case, including cases with similar facts, has the Court applied the Flast test to grant standing to taxpayers, or any other parties with generalized grievances. Following Allen v. Wright in 1984, the Court holds in these cases that taxpayers do not have a sufficiently distinct injury to satisfy the modern injury-in-fact requirement of Article III standing.

The Court’s opinion in Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for the Separation of Church and State[^74] is a good example of the current approach to Flast. In Valley Forge, a nonprofit organization composed of 90,000 taxpayer members, challenged as a violation of the Establishment Clause the sale of surplus federal property to an educational institution operating under supervision of a religious order. A majority of the Court concluded that the group had no standing to bring the complaint. The plaintiffs claimed that Flast acknowledged that the Establishment Clause gives each citizen a personal constitutional right to a government that does not establish religion. Justice Rehnquist distinguished Flast on narrow factual grounds, saying that Valley Forge was an exercise of Congress’ power under the Property Clause rather than the Spending Clause of Article I, § 8.

The recent trend of the Court limiting Flast to its precise facts continued in Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation, Inc.[^75] In Hein, the Court held that taxpayers did not have standing to challenge executive branch action allegedly violating the Establishment Clause, since Flast involved congressional appropriation, not executive action. Thus, Flast was held not to apply. Consistent with an instrumentalist view that the general reasoning of Flast supports standing, Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer dissented, as did Justice Souter, who, as noted at § 1.1.2 text following n.11 & Table 3, has an occasionally affinity for the reasoning of instrumentalist-era precedents.[^76]

[^75]: 551 U.S. 587, 592-93 (2007) (Alito, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., and Kennedy, J., announced the judgment of the Court). Concurring, Justice Kennedy indicated that where cases fall within the exact boundaries of Flast – challenges to legislative appropriations under the Spending Clause – he was willing to follow Flast. Id. at 615-16 (Kennedy, J., concurring). This is consistent with Justice Kennedy’s natural law approach to precedent, discussed at § 2.4.4 n.86, which tends to follow precedent unless there is a special reason to overrule. Formalist Justices Scalia and Thomas would have overruled Flast entirely, as Flast is inconsistent with modern standing doctrine requiring “distinct” injuries. Id. at 618-20 (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment).

2. Third Party Rights

The general rule is that plaintiffs must assert their own rights and do not have standing to raise the rights of third persons. But there are exceptions. If a plaintiff has suffered injury and is closely related to another whose rights might be diluted if plaintiff could not assert them, the plaintiff may contend that a law is unconstitutional because it impinges on the rights of those third parties.

The Court stated in Singleton v. Wulff\textsuperscript{77} that for third-party standing to be granted the plaintiff must show, in addition to that party’s own Article III standing, that: (a) the plaintiff is in a sufficiently special relationship with the third-party that the plaintiff can reasonably be expected properly to frame the issue and litigate vigorously on the third-party’s behalf; and (b) practical obstacles prevent the third-party from asserting the rights on his or her own. In applying this test, the Court takes practical considerations into account. For example, the Court acknowledged in Wulff the privacy concerns of women seeking abortions might limit their ability to bring lawsuit themselves, although the literal option of using a fictitious name, like Roe or Doe, is present.

The third-party standing test has been satisfied by doctors suing on behalf of their patients, or businesses suing on behalf of potential customers.\textsuperscript{78} On the other hand, an attorney whose only relationship to indigent criminal defendants was a prospective attorney-client relationship with as-yet unknown clients lacked third-party standing to challenge a state practice of refusing to appoint appellate counsel for indigent defendants who pleaded guilty or non contenderit, although Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Souter dissented from this conclusion.\textsuperscript{79}

Not surprisingly, instrumentalist Justices have been the most willing to find that third-party standing exists, while formalist and Holmesian Justices have been less willing to grant third-party standing. Of course, a statute may also grant the right to represent others, and where such a statute clearly indicates that intent even formalist and Holmesian judges will give the statute that interpretation, since Congress can always overrule a prudential principle by statute. An additional aspect of third-party standing involves the ability of parties in First Amendment free speech cases to challenge a statute as substantially overbroad, and thus unconstitutional as applied to other parties, even though the statute could be validly applied to their conduct, addressed at § 33.4.80

3. Standing for Organizations, States, and Elected Representatives

Three main types of representational standing cases exist: organizational standing, standing of states to sue on behalf of state citizens, and suits by legislators.

An association can sue as representative of its members if: (a) one or more members satisfy the Article III requirements for standing; (b) the interests to be protected are germane to the organization so that the organization can properly partake of its member’s Article III standing; and (c) neither the claim, nor the relief requested, require the participation of the individual members.81 The first two of these requirements are constitutional Article III requirements. The third is prudential, and is relatively easy to meet regarding injunctive relief, but more difficult to prove if the claim is for damages.82 As the Court has noted, there is a “hazard of litigating a case to the damages stage only to find the plaintiff lacking detailed records or the evidence necessary to show the harm with sufficient specificity,” as well as a “risk that the damages recovered by the association will fail to find their way into the [members’] pockets.”83

States may assert citizens' rights against other individuals or corporations as parens patriae when sovereign or quasi-sovereign interests are implicated, that is, the interests to be protected in the lawsuit are germane to the state’s functioning.84 However, the Court has consistently held that states cannot used the parens patriae power against other states, nor against the federal government, where the state would be entering a controversy as a nominal party in order to forward the claims of individual citizens.85

On the other hand, a state may act as “the representative of its citizens in original actions [in the Supreme Court] where the injury alleged affects the general population of a State in a substantial way.” Of course, suits by states are also permissible to protect the state’s sovereign power of government, or its own proprietary capacity in a state-run business, as long as the state meets the constitutional requirements of Article III. A classic case of this kind is a state versus state lawsuit over a boundary dispute between the states. Cities, or other municipalities, may also have standing to bring complaints against their state, despite being “creatures” of the state, to protect property interests deriving from action in a proprietary capacity, as opposed to substantive matters of the state's political organization, where no standing would exist. Whether foreign states may sue in federal courts as parens patriae to vindicate the rights of their citizens is a questionable.

Historically, legislators have been able to sue to vindicate the interests of their branch of government. Cases during the instrumentalist era permitted legislators to sue on behalf of their branch, House or Senate, even if only a minority of legislators in that branch joined the lawsuit. However, in 1997 in Raines v. Byrd, the Court decided that, at a minimum, to entertain such lawsuits brought on behalf of the House or Senate a majority of the House or Senate members must DeCoster, 229 F.3d 332, 337-43 (1st Cir. 2000) (absent a clear indication to the contrary from the Supreme Court, or the legislative or executive branches, parens patriae standing can only be granted to domestic states, not foreign countries); Kenneth Juan Figueroa, Immigrants and the Civil Rights Regime: Parens Patriae Standing, Foreign Governments, and Protection From Private Discrimination, 102 Colum. join in the lawsuit for standing prudentially to be granted. The majority’s opinion in Raines provoked dissents by Justices Stevens and Breyer, and a concurrence on narrower prudential grounds particular to the individual case by Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg.93

The Court’s decision in Raines was followed by a lower court in Walker v. Cheney.94 In Walker, the Comptroller General of Congress was denied power to sue Vice-President Cheney to release documents related to an Energy Task force on grounds that a majority of neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate had joined the lawsuit. Since 1993, the House of Representatives has had a 5-person Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group (BLAG) made up of the Speaker of the House, and the majority and minority leader and whip in the House, who are charged with the authority to sue in the name of the House. Whether BLAG satisfies the doctrine of Raines has yet to be directly litigated. Since BLAG is not based on congressional legislation, but internal House decisionmaking, the rule that Congress can override court-created prudential principles by statute would not apply.

4. Equitable Discretion

In Allen v. Wright95 the Court stated that standing considerations may “shade into . . . whether the complaint states a sound basis for equitable relief.” This is particularly true, the Court stated in Rizzo v. Goode, if the plaintiff seeks “to enjoin the activity of a government agency” because the Government has traditionally been granted wide latitude in “dispatch of its own internal affairs.”96

Without regard to “equitable relief,” sometimes the Court concludes based on general prudential considerations not to hear the case. For example, in Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow,97 a case challenging the constitutionality of reciting in public school the phrase “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance, the Court decided that Mr. Newdow lacked standing to challenge the Pledge, despite Mr. Newdow having Article III standing based on an injury to his right as a father to make decisions regarding raising his child. This case did not involve third-party standing, as Mr. Newdow did not have the legal right to sue on behalf of his daughter, and the ex-wife, who did have the legal right to represent the daughter, opposed the lawsuit. The Court stated, “This case concerns not merely Newdow’s interest in inculcating his child with his views on religion, but also the rights of the child’s mother as a parent generally and under the Superior Court orders specifically. And most important, it implicates the interests of a young child who finds herself at the center of a highly public debate.” Thus, Newdow “lacks prudential standing to bring this suit in federal court.”

On the other hand, sometimes equitable considerations counsel the Court to take the case. In United States v. Windsor, the Court found that the United States had standing to appeal a lower district court’s ruling that the Defense of Marriage Act of 1996 (DOMA) was unconstitutional because, although no longer opposing a finding that DOMA is unconstitutional, the United States still refused to pay plaintiffs the money to which they were entitled if their marriage were treated as valid under federal law. The district court’s order for the United States Treasury to pay the money was an injury to the United States giving them Article III standing. Regarding prudential concerns that there exist sufficient adversariness to ensure the issues before the Court are fully presented, the majority noted that attorneys for the BLAG presented “a substantial argument for the constitutionality” of DOMA. The Court also noted, “Were this Court to hold that prudential rules require it to dismiss the case, and, in consequence, that the Court of Appeals erred in failing to dismiss it as well, extensive litigation would ensue. The district courts in 94 districts throughout the Nation would be without precedential guidance not only in tax refund suits but also in cases involving the whole of DOMA's sweep involving over 1,000 federal statutes and a myriad of federal regulations.” The merits of the case are addressed at United States v. Windsor, excerpted at § 23.4.3.

Three Justices dissented on standing. They concluded that because plaintiffs had won in the lower federal courts, and the Obama Administration indicated it would no longer oppose such rulings, there was no Article III standing. The dissent said, “The final sentence of the Solicitor General's brief on the merits reads: ‘For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.’ Brief for United States (merits) 54 (emphasis added). That will not cure the Government's injury, but carve it into stone. . . . Since both parties agreed with the judgment of the District Court for the Southern District of New York, the suit should have ended there. The further proceedings have been a contrivance, having no object in mind except to elevate a District Court judgment that has no precedential effect in other courts, to one that has precedential effect throughout the Second Circuit, and then (in this Court) precedential effect throughout the United States.”

CHAPTER 4: JUSTICIABILITY DOCTRINES OTHER THAN STANDING

§ 4.1 Ripeness ................................................................. 161

§ 4.2 Mootness ................................................................. 169

§ 4.3 Political Questions .................................................... 177

§ 4.4 Abstention Doctrine ................................................... 203

§ 4.1 Ripeness Doctrine

The Court has said that a claim is not ripe for adjudication if it rests upon contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.\(^1\) A case is ripe for decision in a federal court only if plaintiff has suffered a specific present harm or plaintiff seeks to enjoin a specific proceeding that is threatened or underway so the case has an “imminence and reality.”\(^2\)

In making this determination, the Court considers both: (1) the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and (2) the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration.\(^3\) The ripeness problem often arises in actions for a declaratory judgment or an injunction. Because the conduct alleged to create a constitutional issue may never take place, the Court proceeds on a case-to-case basis.\(^4\) If plaintiff shows only a generalized fear of prosecution under a statute not being enforced, the case will likely be viewed as not ripe for a declaratory judgment on constitutionality.\(^5\) Where the threat of injury is immediate enough, however, the Court may conclude that the case is ripe for resolution, given the hardship to the plaintiff if the plaintiff were required to wait and be prosecuted under the statute before the case could be heard. The relevant provisions regarding declaratory judgments are 28 U.S.C. § 2201 and Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 57.

\(^5\) For example, the Court dismissed a challenge to Connecticut's ban on using birth control devices since it had not been enforced and there was no real fear of personal liability. Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961). However, in Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968), the Court reversed a state court decision upholding the validity of a law that prohibited the teaching of evolution in public schools even though, as Justice Black noted, id. at 109-11 (Black, J., concurring), there was no evidence that the statute ever been enforced during its 40 years on books.
If the lawsuit involves a “facial” attack on the law, rather than “as applied,” and thus the precise facts are not as critical for resolution, there are indications that the Court may be more willing to find a sufficient threat, since waiting will not help further “crystallize” the issue for judicial review.6 The Court seems particularly concerned with potential hardship when the prosecution would involve a criminal prosecution, particularly with the potential of jail time, as opposed to a civil prosecution. Where the potential is only for administrative fines, or a case involving only monetary damages, as in Takings Clause cases, the Court’s concern with the potential hardship to the individual of having to wait to see if the fine is imposed is much less.7 Of course, in addition to establishing standing and that the case is ripe, the plaintiff in an action for an injunction must also show the likelihood of substantial and immediate irreparable injury, and the inadequacy of remedies at law.8

In general, liberal instrumentalists have been more willing to find cases ripe for resolution, because of their preference to proceed to the merits and do justice in the case. Holmesian judges, because of their greater posture of deference to government, have been less willing to find cases ripe for resolution, as are formalist judges, because of their literalness in ensuring that an injury has in fact occurred. Based on their respect for precedent, combined with the background natural law principle of “where there is a right, there should be remedy,” natural law judges tend to be in the middle, without a strong predisposition in either direction.

Given these considerations, cases from the Holmesian and instrumentalist eras, in particular, have a tendency to reach different results on ripeness even when the underlying facts are similar. A case that sheds light on the meaning of "imminence" during the Holmesian era is United Public Workers v. Mitchell.9 There, the plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that the Hatch Act, which limits the Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 89-91 (1947) (“As applied” challenge by government workers who sought an injunction against the Hatch Act because it might unconstitutionally make illegal certain political activities in which they planned to engage did not have a ripe case); Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485, 486-87 (1952) (“Facial” attack on a state law that required the discharge of teachers who belonged to allegedly subversive groups was treated as ripe, over a dissent saying plaintiffs were merely complaining of a chill on teachers joining groups); id. at 503-05 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

9  330 U.S. 75 (1947). See also International Longshoreman’s & Warehousemen’s Union, Local 37 v. Boyd, 347 U.S. 222 (1954) (resident aliens planning to work in Alaska during the summer, prior to Alaska becoming a state, did not have a ripe case to sue to enjoin immigration officials from preventing their return to the United States; they had to go to Alaska, and if refused return, sue then); id. at 224-25 (Black, J., joined by Douglas, J., dissenting).
political activities of government employees, violated their First Amendment rights, and they provided detailed affidavits listing the activities in which they wished to engage. Nevertheless, the Court held that such a challenge was not ripe on behalf of employees who simply desired to engage in the prohibited activities. The Court said that the separation of powers doctrine calls for courts to avoid writing advisory opinions and the Court should not adjudicate unless there are prejudicial interferences with definite rights. During the instrumentalist era, however, in United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, AFL-CIO,10 the Court found a challenge to the Hatch Act to be ripe, concluding that the plaintiffs had shown that they desired to engage in specific political activities, and the threat of prosecution was “imminent” enough.

A good discussion of ripeness from the modern post-1986 Court perspective occurred in Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club.11 There a unanimous Court held not ripe for judicial review the Sierra Club’s request for an injunction barring the United States Forest Service from permitting timber harvest under its then-current plan. The Court stressed that before the plan could be implemented the Service would have to choose logging areas and methods, hold a hearing, conduct an environmental analysis, and make a final decision to permit logging, which could be challenged in an administrative appeals process and in court. Justice Breyer explained that: (1) to withhold court consideration would not cause the parties significant hardship since the club had an ample opportunity later to bring its legal challenge at a time when harm is more imminent and more certain; (2) immediate judicial review could hinder agency efforts to refine its policies; (3) immediate judicial review would have to take place without benefit of the focus that a particular logging proposal could provide; and (4) Congress had not provided for pre-implementation judicial review of forest plans, as it had done in some other federal agency laws.

The Court did find ripeness in Suitum v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency.12 There the plaintiff alleged that a state planning agency committed an unconstitutional regulatory taking when it determined that her residential lot was ineligible for development. The Court held that the agency had made a final decision that plaintiff’s land was within a no-development zone, and there was no question that nothing could be built there.

Regarding whether the doctrine is merely prudential or has some constitutional basis, it seems clear that the ripeness doctrine is grounded in both Article III and prudential concerns. As the Court stated in Reno v. Catholic Social Services, Inc.,13 “We have noted that the ripeness doctrine is drawn both from Article III limitations on judicial power and from prudential reasons for refusing to exercise jurisdiction.” In some cases, the Court will conclude, as it did in City of Los Angeles v.

Lyons, that Article III standing and ripeness requirements are not met. Other times, as in Justice Powell's opinion in Goldwater v. Carter, it is clear that the Court has found Article III satisfied, but that it would not be prudent to decide the case. The Court has indicated that both Article III and prudential ripeness concerns may be considered on the Court’s own motion.

Most often, the Court does not carefully explain whether the resolution of the ripeness issue involves Article III or only prudential concerns. However, formalists and Holmesians, reflecting the “positivist” aspect of their judicial decisionmaking style, tend to put ripeness on Article III grounds, as though the matter is out of their hands. To preserve their ability to reach out and decide important issues, instrumentalist judges tend to discuss ripeness in prudential terms and, thus, attempt to preserve flexibility in application of the doctrine. In terms of a natural law focus on reasoned elaboration of the law, it would be helpful if the Court would state what difference there is, if any, between the Article III requirement of a “case or controversy” sufficient to grant standing, with its injury-in-fact requirement, and an Article III requirement of a sufficiently ripe case. While there was perhaps a need for an Article III ripeness requirement during the instrumentalist era, where Article III standing was much easier to achieve, as discussed at § 3.3.4, in the modern era if a litigant has Article III standing that case would appear to be sufficiently ripe under any Article III ripeness analysis. Perhaps for this reason, most modern ripeness cases tend to focus on prudential consideration of whether, even though the party has Article III standing, the case should not be heard on prudential ripeness grounds. Under this approach, the “case” or “controversy” injury-in-fact requirement of standing doctrine would encompass both Article III standing and Article III ripeness concerns. This would be consistent with the Court’s recent precedents, which in speaking about the Article III ripeness test have typically resorted to general “case” or “controversy” language.

Of course, where the Justices wish to reach the merits of a case, ripeness may well be found in close cases even by formalist and Holmesian Justices. For example, in Bush v. Gore, Justice Scalia indirectly addressed a ripeness concern when, in his concurrence to the Emergency Stay Order, he stated that “irreparable injury” would result to “petitioner [Bush], and to the country, by casting a cloud upon what he claims to be the legitimacy of his election.” In this view, Bush’s challenge to 15 444 U.S. 996, 996 (1979) (Powell, J., concurring in the judgment) (as a prudential matter, a dispute between Congress and the President is not ready for judicial review unless and until each branch has taken action asserting its constitutional authority).

the Florida Supreme Court’s recount proceedings was ripe for resolution, even though it was speculative whether the recount would show that Bush won or lost, and thus it was unclear whether the recount would cast a cloud of legitimacy over his election as president, or help to confirm it.

In contrast, as four Justices noted in dissent in Bush v. Gore, “If this Court had allowed the State to follow the course indicated by the opinions of its own Supreme Court, it is entirely possible that there would ultimately have been no issue requiring our review, and political tension could have worked itself out in the Congress following the procedures provided in 3 U.S.C. § 15.”

Based on the results of a later recount of the ballots at issue in Bush v. Gore by a consortium of newspaper and news media outlets, which showed that Bush would still have had more votes than Gore after the Florida Supreme Court’s ordered recount, noted at § 24.4 n.32, the dissent may well have been right in their assertion that Bush v. Gore was not ripe for resolution under normal ripeness principles.

Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1962 Congress amended the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, (52 Stat. 1040, as amended by the Drug Amendments of 1962, 76 Stat. 780, 21 U.S.C. § 301 et seq.), to require manufacturers of prescription drugs to print the “established name” of the drug “prominently and in type at least half as large as that used thereon for any proprietary name or designation for such drug,” on labels and other printed material, s 502(e)(1)(B), 21 U.S.C. s 352(e)(1)(B). The “established name” is one designated by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare pursuant to § 502(e)(2) of the Act, 21 U.S.C. s 352(e)(2); the “proprietary name” is usually a trade name under which a particular drug is marketed. The underlying purpose of the 1962 amendment was to bring to the attention of doctors and patients the fact that many of the drugs sold under familiar trade names are actually identical to drugs sold under their “established” or less familiar trade names at significantly lower prices.

The present action was brought by a group of 37 individual drug manufacturers and by the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, of which all the petitioner companies are members, and which includes manufacturers of more than 90% of the Nation's supply of prescription drugs. They challenged the regulations on the ground that the Commissioner exceeded his authority under the statute by promulgating an order requiring labels, advertisements, and other printed matter relating to prescription drugs to designate the established name of the particular drug involved every time its trade name is used anywhere in such material.

The injunctive and declaratory judgment remedies are discretionary, and courts traditionally have been reluctant to apply them to administrative determinations unless these arise in the context of a controversy “ripe” for judicial resolution. Without undertaking to survey the intricacies of the ripeness doctrine, it is fair to say that its basic rationale is to prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies, and also to protect the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties. The problem is best seen in a twofold aspect, requiring us to evaluate both the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration.

As to the former factor, we believe the issues presented are appropriate for judicial resolution at this time. First, all parties agree that the issue tendered is a purely legal one: whether the statute was properly construed by the Commissioner to require the established name of the drug to be used every time the proprietary name is employed. Both sides moved for summary judgment in the District Court, and no claim is made here that further administrative proceedings are contemplated. It is suggested that the justification for this rule might vary with different circumstances, and that the expertise of the Commissioner is relevant to passing upon the validity of the regulation. This of course is true, but the suggestion overlooks the fact that both sides have approached this case as one purely of congressional intent, and that the Government made no effort to justify the regulation in factual terms.

This is also a case in which the impact of the regulations upon the petitioners is sufficiently direct and immediate as to render the issue appropriate for judicial review at this stage. These regulations purport to give an authoritative interpretation of a statutory provision that has a direct effect on the day-to-day business of all prescription drug companies; its promulgation puts petitioners in a dilemma that it was the very purpose of the Declaratory Judgment Act to ameliorate. As the District Court found on the basis of uncontested allegations, “Either they must comply with the every time requirement and incur the costs of changing over their promotional material and labeling or they must follow their present course and risk prosecution.” 228 F.Supp. 855, 861. The regulations are clear-cut, and were made effective immediately upon publication; as noted earlier the agency's counsel represented to the District Court that immediate compliance with their terms was expected. If petitioners wish to comply they must change all their labels, advertisements, and promotional materials; they must destroy stocks of printed matter; and they must invest heavily in new printing type and new supplies. The alternative to compliance – continued use of material which they believe in good faith meets the statutory requirements, but which clearly does not meet the regulation of the Commissioner – may be even more costly. That course would risk serious criminal and civil penalties for the unlawful distribution of “misbranded” drugs.

It is relevant at this juncture to recognize that petitioners deal in a sensitive industry, in which public confidence in their drug products is especially important. To require them to challenge these regulations only as a defense to an action brought by the Government might harm them severely and unnecessarily. Where the legal issue presented is fit for judicial resolution, and where a regulation requires an immediate and significant change in the plaintiffs' conduct of their affairs with serious penalties attached to noncompliance, access to the courts under the Administrative Procedure Act and the Declaratory Judgment Act must be permitted, absent a statutory bar or some other unusual circumstance, neither of which appears here.

The Government does not dispute the very real dilemma in which petitioners are placed by the regulation, but contends that “mere financial expense” is not a justification for pre-enforcement judicial review. It is of course true that cases in this Court dealing with the standing of particular parties to bring an action have held that a possible financial loss is not by itself a sufficient interest to sustain a judicial challenge to governmental action. Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447; Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., 310 U.S. 113. But there is no question in the present case that petitioners have sufficient standing as plaintiffs: the regulation is directed at them in particular; it requires them to make significant changes in their everyday business practices; if they fail to observe the Commissioner's rule they are quite clearly exposed to the imposition of strong sanctions. Compare Columbia Broadcasting System v. United States, 316 U.S. 407; 3 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, c. 21 (1958). This case is, therefore, remote from the Mellon and Perkins cases.

The Government further contends that the threat of criminal sanctions for noncompliance with a judicially untested regulation is unrealistic; the Solicitor General has represented that if court enforcement becomes necessary, “the Department of Justice will proceed only civilly for an injunction . . . or by condemnation.” We cannot accept this argument as a sufficient answer to petitioners' petition. This action at its inception was properly brought and this subsequent representation of the Department of Justice should not suffice to defeat it.

Texas v. United States

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant, the State of Texas, appeals from the judgment of a three-judge District Court for the District of Columbia. The State had sought a declaratory judgment that the preclearance provisions of § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 439, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, do not apply to implementation of certain sections of the Texas Education Code that permit the State to sanction local school districts for failure to meet state-mandated educational achievement levels. This appeal presents the question whether the controversy is ripe.

A claim is not ripe for adjudication if it rests upon “‘contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.’” Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Products Co., 473 U.S. 568, 580-581 (1985) (quoting 13A Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller, & Edward H. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3532, p. 112 (1984)). Whether Texas will appoint a master or management team under §§ 39.131(a)(7) and (8) [which would trigger the preclearance provisions] is contingent on a number of factors. First, a school district must fall below the state standards. Then, pursuant to state policy, the Commissioner must try first “the imposition of sanctions which do not include the appointment of a master or management team,” App. 10 (Original Complaint ¶ 12). He may, for example, “order the preparation of a student achievement improvement plan . . ., the submission of the plan to the [C]ommissioner for approval, and implementation of the plan,” § 39.131(a)(3), or “appoint an agency monitor to participate in and report to the agency on the activities of the board of trustees or the superintendent,” § 39.131(a)(6). It is only if these less intrusive options fail that a Commissioner may appoint a master or management team, Tr. of Oral Arg. 16, and even then, only “to the extent the [C]ommissioner determines necessary,” § 39.131(a). Texas has not pointed to any particular school district in which the application of § 39.131(a)(7) or (8) is currently foreseen or even likely. Indeed, Texas hopes that there will be no need to appoint a master or management team for any district. Tr. of Oral Arg. 16-17. Under these circumstances, where “we have no idea whether or when such [a sanction] will be ordered,” the issue is not fit for adjudication. Toilet Goods Assn., Inc. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158, 163 (1967); see also Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 321-322 (1991).

Even if there were greater certainty regarding ultimate implementation of paragraphs (a)(7) and (a)(8) of the statute, we do not think Texas's claim would be ripe. Ripeness “requir[es] us to evaluate both the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration.” Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 149 (1967). As to fitness of the issues: Texas asks us to hold that under no circumstances can the imposition of these sanctions constitute a change affecting voting. We do not have sufficient confidence in our powers of imagination to affirm such a negative. The operation of the statute is better grasped when viewed in light of a particular application. Here, as is often true, “[d]etermination of the scope . . . of legislation in advance of its immediate adverse effect in the context of a concrete case involves too remote and abstract an inquiry for the proper exercise of the judicial function.” Longshoremen v. Boyd, 347 U.S. 222, 224 (1954). In the present case, the remoteness and abstraction are increased by the fact that Chapter 39 has yet to be interpreted by the Texas courts.

And as for hardship to the parties: This is not a case like Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, at 152, where the regulation at issue had a “direct effect on the day-to-day business” of the plaintiffs, because they were compelled to affix required labeling to their products under threat of criminal sanction. Texas is not required to engage in, or to refrain from, any conduct, unless and until it chooses to implement one of the noncleared remedies. To be sure, if that contingency should arise compliance with the preclearance procedure could delay much needed action. (Prior to this litigation, Texas sought preclearance for the appointment of a master in a Dallas County school district, and despite a request for expedition the Attorney General took 90 days to give approval. See Brief for Petitioner 37, n. 28.) But even that inconvenience is avoidable. If Texas is confident that the imposition of a master or management team does not constitute a change affecting voting, it should simply go ahead with the appointment. Should the Attorney General or a private individual bring suit (and if the matter is as clear, even at this distance, as Texas thinks it is), we have no reason to doubt that a district court will deny a preliminary injunction. See Presley v. Etowah County Comm’n, 502 U.S. 491, 506 (1992); City of Lockhart v. United States, 460 U.S. 125, 129, n. 3 (1983). Texas claims that it suffers the immediate hardship of a “threat to federalism.” But that is an abstraction – and an abstraction no graver than the “threat to personal freedom” that exists whenever an agency regulation is promulgated, which we hold inadequate to support suit unless the person's primary conduct is affected. Cf. Toilet Goods Assn., supra, at 164.

§ 4.2 Mootness Doctrine

Because Article III speaks in terms of “Cases” and “Controversies,” the Court will not render an advisory opinion, as discussed at § 3.3.1 nn.20-23. Similarly, federal courts will not render an opinion if there is no on-going controversy. For example, a “collusive suit” involves a case where the parties on both sides want the same result, and are only nominally on opposite sides of the litigation. In such a case, there is the “absence of a genuine adversary issue between the parties.”

In contrast, a “test case” is different. In a “test case” there is an adversary issue between the parties, even though the particular act that gave rise to the controversy may have been planned to raise that issue in court. While there usually is jurisdiction to hear a “test case,” the Court is likely to be sensitive to the contrived nature of the case, and, particularly in cases involving constitutional challenges, exercise prudence in deciding whether to decide the case, especially if the facts suggest some conflict of interest, such as the attorney for one side having connections to the opposing side.

Just as federal courts do not give advisory opinions or decide collusive lawsuits, they also will not decide a case which, by the time for decision or review, is moot, that is, is no longer an actual dispute because it no longer touches legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. For example, in DeFunis v. Odegaard, the plaintiff brought suit on his own behalf claiming reverse discrimination and asking for an injunction commanding his admission to law school. By the time the case reached the Court, he had been admitted to the law school and was in the final term of his final year. Thus, his status would not be affected by any view the Court might express on the matter.

As a matter of procedural law, the mootness rule applies even when the Court is reviewing the decision of a state court. A moot federal case will be vacated and remanded for dismissal; a state case will be vacated and remanded for proceedings in the state court.

26 North Carolina v. Rice, 404 U.S. 244 , 246 (1971) (federal case); Doremus v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 429, 434 (1952) (state case). While normally the Court vacates any judgment rendered below, the Court noted in Alvarez v. Smith, 130 S. Ct. 576, 581 (2009), if the mootness arises from the party’s “settlement” of the case, rather than “happenstance,” the “losing party has voluntarily forfeited his legal remedy . . . [and] thereby surrender[ed] his claim . . . of vacatur.”
There are four main exceptions to the mootness doctrine. One exception is where the case is "capable of repetition, yet evading review." This occurs, for example, where there is a reasonable expectation that the same controversy will recur involving the same complaining party and yet the judicial order will always become moot by the time of appeal. One typical case of this kind involves challenges to election or ballot access laws. In most cases, by the time the case reaches the Supreme Court, the date of the election has passed, yet if the case were then dismissed as moot, the Court would never rule on election law issues. Another typical case involves challenges to abortion laws. In most of these cases, the women had already been forced to make some decision regarding an abortion prior to the case being decided by the Supreme Court.

Another exception involves “voluntary cessation of allegedly illegal conduct, which could reoccur.” A typical example of this kind of case involves civil rights challenges to government action, where the government has “voluntarily” ceased its behavior by the time the case reaches the courts. In these cases, the court must determine how likely it is that the voluntarily ceased conduct could reoccur. The cases can also arise in the context of environmental litigation, where the alleged polluter may have voluntarily ceased the conduct by the time of litigation.

A third exception to the mootness doctrine is where the plaintiff has brought a class action and there is a reasonable expectation that others similarly situated will face the same issue in the future. As the Court held in Sosna v. Iowa, a class action does not become moot because it has become moot as to the named plaintiffs in the class, as long as other parties in the class have an on-going dispute.

The fourth exception involves cases where collateral consequences still exist, even if the main complaint has been mooted. For example, in Sibron v. New York, the plaintiff was permitted to challenge the constitutionality of a criminal conviction even though the prison term had already been served. The individual’s case was not moot, even though the individual was out of prison, because of the collateral consequence of having a criminal record, which the individual wanted expunged. Similarly, in Powell v. McCormack,\textsuperscript{34} Congressman Powell’s main complaint that he should not have been excluded from the 90th Session of Congress was moot by the time the case got to the Supreme Court, because that session of Congress had already passed and Powell had been reelected to the 91st Session of Congress. Yet his case was not moot because the issue of whether he was constitutionally excluded from the prior session affected his seniority in Congress and the amount of his congressional pension, issues for which there was still a live controversy.

The Court has not been entirely of one mind with respect to whether the mootness doctrine and its exceptions are prudential principles or Article III requirements. The third and fourth exceptions listed above, ongoing class actions and cases where collateral consequences still exist, technically involve plaintiffs who have ongoing injuries. Since Article III is thereby met in those cases, the application of those exceptions clearly involve prudential considerations. There is a debate on the Court, however, concerning what part of the “capable of repetition, yet evading review” exception and “voluntarily ceased conduct but may reoccur” exception are matters of Article III requirement and what part are matters of prudential principle, as addressed in Honig v. Doe.

\textbf{Honig v. Doe}

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The present dispute grows out of the efforts of certain officials of the San Francisco Unified School District (SFUSD) to expel two emotionally disturbed children from school indefinitely for violent and disruptive conduct related to their disabilities. In November 1980, respondent John Doe assaulted another student at the Louise Lombard School, a developmental center for disabled children. Doe's April 1980 [Individualized Educational Program (IEP)] identified him as a socially and physically awkward 17-year-old who experienced considerable difficulty controlling his impulses and anger. Among the goals set out in his IEP was “[i]mprovement in [his] ability to relate to [his] peers [and to] cope with frustrating situations without resorting to aggressive acts.” App. 17. Frustrating situations, however, were an unfortunately prominent feature of Doe's school career: physical abnormalities, speech difficulties, and poor grooming habits had made him the target of teasing and ridicule as early as the first grade, id., at 23; his 1980 IEP reflected his continuing difficulties with peers, noting that his social skills had deteriorated and that he could tolerate only minor frustration before exploding. Id., at 15-16.

On November 6, 1980, Doe responded to the taunts of a fellow student in precisely the explosive manner anticipated by his IEP: he choked the student with sufficient force to leave abrasions on the child's neck, and kicked out a school window while being escorted to the principal's office afterwards. Id., at 208. Doe admitted his misconduct and the school subsequently suspended him for five days. Thereafter, his principal referred the matter to the SFUSD Student Placement Committee (SPC or Committee) with the recommendation that Doe be expelled. On the day the suspension was to end, the SPC notified Doe's mother that it was proposing to exclude her child permanently from SFUSD and was therefore extending his suspension until such time as the expulsion proceedings were completed. The Committee further advised her that she was entitled to attend the November 25 hearing at which it planned to discuss the proposed expulsion.

Respondent Jack Smith was identified as an emotionally disturbed child by the time he entered the second grade in 1976. School records prepared that year indicated that he was unable “to control verbal or physical outburst[s]” and exhibited a “[s]evere disturbance in relationships with peers and adults.” Id., at 123. Further evaluations subsequently revealed that he had been physically and emotionally abused as an infant and young child and that, despite above average intelligence, he experienced academic and social difficulties as a result of extreme hyperactivity and low self-esteem. Id., at 136, 139, 155, 176. Of particular concern was Smith's propensity for verbal hostility; one evaluator noted that the child reacted to stress by “attempt[ing] to cover his feelings of low self worth through aggressive behavior [...] primarily verbal provocations.” Id., at 136.

Based on these evaluations, SFUSD placed Smith in a learning center for emotionally disturbed children. His grandparents, however, believed that his needs would be better served in the public school setting and, in September 1979, the school district acceded to their requests and enrolled him at A.P. Giannini Middle School. His February 1980 IEP recommended placement in a Learning Disability Group, stressing the need for close supervision and a highly structured environment. Id., at 111. Like earlier evaluations, the February 1980 IEP noted that Smith was easily distracted, impulsive, and anxious; it therefore proposed a half-day schedule and suggested that the placement be undertaken on a trial basis. Id., at 112, 115.

At the beginning of the next school year, Smith was assigned to a full-day program; almost immediately thereafter he began misbehaving. School officials met twice with his grandparents in October 1980 to discuss returning him to a half-day program; although the grandparents agreed to the reduction, they apparently were never apprised of their right to challenge the decision through EHA procedures. The school officials also warned them that if the child continued his disruptive behavior – which included stealing, extorting money from fellow students, and making sexual comments to female classmates – they would seek to expel him. On November 14, they made good on this threat, suspending Smith for five days after he made further lewd comments. His principal referred the matter to the SPC, which recommended exclusion from SFUSD. As it did in John Doe's case, the Committee scheduled a hearing and extended the suspension indefinitely pending a final disposition in the matter. On November 28, Smith's counsel protested these actions on grounds essentially identical to those raised by Doe, and the SPC agreed to cancel the hearing and to return Smith to a half-day program at A.P. Giannini or to provide home tutoring. Smith's grandparents chose the latter option and the school began home instruction on December 10; on January 6, 1981, an IEP team convened to discuss alternative placements.
After learning of Doe's action, Smith sought and obtained leave to intervene in the suit. The District Court subsequently entered summary judgment in favor of respondents on their [Education of the Handicapped Act (EHA)] claims and issued a permanent injunction. In a series of decisions, the District Judge found that the proposed expulsions and indefinite suspensions of respondents for conduct attributable to their disabilities deprived them of their congressionally mandated right to a free appropriate public education, as well as their right to have that education provided in accordance with the procedures set out in the EHA. The District Judge therefore permanently enjoined the school district from taking any disciplinary action other than a 2- or 5-day suspension against any disabled child for disability-related misconduct, or from effecting any other change in the educational placement of any such child without parental consent pending completion of any EHA proceedings. In addition, the judge barred the State from authorizing unilateral placement changes and directed it to establish an EHA compliance-monitoring system or, alternatively, to enact guidelines governing local school responses to disability-related misconduct. Finally, the judge ordered the State to provide services directly to disabled children when, in any individual case, the State determined that the local educational agency was unable or unwilling to do so.

II

At the outset, we address the suggestion, raised for the first time during oral argument, that this case is moot. Under Article III of the Constitution this Court may only adjudicate actual, ongoing controversies. Nebraska Press Assn v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 546 (1976); Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975). That the dispute between the parties was very much alive when suit was filed, or at the time the Court of Appeals rendered its judgment, cannot substitute for the actual case or controversy that an exercise of this Court's jurisdiction requires. Steffel v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 459, n.10 (1974); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973). In the present case, we have jurisdiction if there is a reasonable likelihood that respondents will again suffer the deprivation of EHA-mandated rights that gave rise to this suit.

Respondent John Doe is now 24 years old and, accordingly, is no longer entitled to the protections and benefits of the EHA, which limits eligibility to disabled children between the ages of 3 and 21. See 20 U.S.C. § 1412(2)(B). It is clear, therefore, that whatever rights to state educational services he may yet have as a ward of the State, see Tr. of Oral Arg. 23, 26, the Act would not govern the State's provision of those services, and thus the case is moot as to him. Respondent Jack Smith, however, is currently 20 and has not yet completed high school. Although at present he is not faced with any proposed expulsion or suspension proceedings, and indeed no longer even resides within the SFUSD, he remains a resident of California and is entitled to a “free appropriate public education” within that State. His claims under the EHA, therefore, are not moot if the conduct he originally complained of is “capable of repetition, yet evading review.” Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S. 478, 482 (1982). Given Smith's continued eligibility for educational services under the EHA, the nature of his disability, and petitioner's insistence that all local school districts retain residual authority to exclude disabled children for dangerous conduct, we have little difficulty concluding that there is a “reasonable expectation,” ibid., that Smith would once again be subjected to a unilateral “change in placement” for conduct growing out of his disabilities were it not for the statewide injunctive relief issued below.
Notwithstanding respondent's undisputed right to a free appropriate public education in California, Justice Scalia argues in dissent that there is no “demonstrated probability” that Smith will actually avail himself of that right because his counsel was unable to state affirmatively during oral argument that her client would seek to reenter the state school system. We believe the dissent overstates the stringency of the “capable of repetition” test. Although Justice Scalia equates “reasonable expectation” with “demonstrated probability,” the very case he cites for this proposition described these standards in the disjunctive, see Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S., at 482 (“[T]here must be a ‘reasonable expectation’ or a ‘demonstrated probability’ that the same controversy will recur” (emphasis added)), and in numerous cases decided both before and since Hunt we have found controversies capable of repetition based on expectations that, while reasonable, were hardly demonstrably probable. See, e.g., Burlington Northern R. Co. v. Maintenance of Way Employes, 481 U.S. 429, 436, n.4 (1987) (parties “reasonably likely” to find themselves in future disputes over collective-bargaining agreement); California Coastal Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 578 (1987) (O'Connor, J.) (“likely” that respondent would again submit mining plans that would trigger contested state permit requirement); Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., Riverside County, 478 U.S. 1, 6 (1986) (“It can reasonably be assumed” that newspaper publisher will be subjected to similar closure order in the future); Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court of Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 603 (1982) (same); United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 398 (1980) (case not moot where litigant “faces some likelihood of becoming involved in same controversy in the future”) (dicta).

Chief Justice REHNQUIST, concurring.

I write separately on the mootness issue in this case to explain why I have joined Part II of the Court's opinion, and why I think reconsideration of our mootness jurisprudence may be in order when dealing with cases decided by this Court.

The present rule in federal cases is that an actual controversy must exist at all stages of appellate review, not merely at the time the complaint is filed. This doctrine was clearly articulated in United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36 (1950), in which Justice Douglas noted that “[t]he established practice of the Court in dealing with a civil case from a court in the federal system which has become moot while on its way here or pending our decision on the merits is to reverse or vacate the judgment below and remand with a direction to dismiss.” Id., at 39. The rule has been followed fairly consistently over the last 30 years. See, e.g., Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, (1975); SEC v. Medical Committee for Human Rights, 404 U.S. 403 (1972).

All agree that this case was “very much alive” when the action was filed in the District Court, and very probably when the Court of Appeals decided the case. It is supervening events since the decision of the Court of Appeals which have caused the dispute between the majority and the dissent over whether this case is moot. Therefore, all that the Court actually holds is that these supervening events do not deprive this Court of the authority to hear the case. I agree with that holding, and would go still further in the direction of relaxing the test of mootness where the events giving rise to the claim of mootness have occurred after our decision to grant certiorari or to note probable jurisdiction.
The Court implies in its opinion, and the dissent expressly states, that the mootness doctrine is based upon Art. III of the Constitution. There is no doubt that our recent cases have taken that position. See Nebraska Press Assn. v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 546 (1976); Preiser v. Newkirk, supra, 422 U.S., at 401; Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 57 (1968); Liner v. Jafco, Inc., 375 U.S. 301, 306, n.3 (1964). But it seems very doubtful that the earliest case I have found discussing mootness, Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651 (1895), was premised on constitutional constraints; Justice Gray's opinion in that case nowhere mentions Art. III.

If it were indeed Art. III which – by reason of its requirement of a case or controversy for the exercise of federal judicial power – underlies the mootness doctrine, the “capable of repetition, yet evading review” exception relied upon by the Court in this case would be incomprehensible. Article III extends the judicial power of the United States only to cases and controversies; it does not except from this requirement other lawsuits which are “capable of repetition, yet evading review.” If our mootness doctrine were forced upon us by the case or controversy requirement of Art. III itself, we would have no more power to decide lawsuits which are “moot” but which also raise questions which are capable of repetition but evading review than we would to decide cases which are “moot” but raise no such questions.

The exception to mootness for cases which are “capable of repetition, yet evading review,” was first stated by this Court in Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U.S. 498 (1911). There the Court enunciated the exception in the light of obvious pragmatic considerations, with no mention of Art. III as the principle underlying the mootness doctrine: “The questions involved in the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission are usually continuing (as are manifestly those in the case at bar) and their consideration ought not to be, as they might be, defeated, by short term orders, capable of repetition, yet evading review, and at one time the Government and at another time the carriers have their rights determined by the Commission without a chance of redress.” Id., at 515.

The exception was explained again in Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 816 (1969): “The problem is therefore ‘capable of repetition, yet evading review.’ The need for its resolution thus reflects a continuing controversy in the federal-state area where our ‘one man, one vote’ decisions have thrust.” (citation omitted).

The logical conclusion to be drawn from these cases, and from the historical development of the principle of mootness, is that while an unwillingness to decide moot cases may be connected to the case or controversy requirement of Art. III, it is an attenuated connection that may be overridden where there are strong reasons to override it. The “capable of repetition, yet evading review” exception is an example. So too is our refusal to dismiss as moot those cases in which the defendant voluntarily ceases, at some advanced stage of the appellate proceedings, whatever activity prompted the plaintiff to seek an injunction. See, e.g., City of Mesquite v. Aladdin's Castle, Inc., 455 U.S. 283, 289, n.10 (1982); United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 632 (1953). I believe that we should adopt an additional exception to our present mootness doctrine for those cases where the events which render the case moot have supervened since our grant of certiorari or noting of probable jurisdiction in the case. Dissents from denial of certiorari in this Court illustrate the proposition that the roughly 150 or 160 cases which we decide each year on the merits are less than the number of cases warranting review by us if we are to remain, as Chief Justice Taft said many years ago, “the last word on every important issue under the Constitution and the statutes of the United States.” But these unique resources – the time spent preparing to decide the case by reading briefs, hearing oral argument, and conferring – are squandered in every case in which it becomes apparent after the decisional process is underway that we may not reach the question presented. To me the unique and valuable ability of this Court to decide a case – we are, at present, the only Art. III court which can decide a federal question in such a way as to bind all other courts – is a sufficient reason either to abandon the doctrine of mootness altogether in cases which this Court has decided to review, or at least to relax the doctrine of mootness in such a manner as the dissent accuses the majority of doing here. I would leave the mootness doctrine as established by our cases in full force and effect when applied to the earlier stages of a lawsuit, but I believe that once this Court has undertaken a consideration of a case, an exception to that principle is just as much warranted as where a case is “capable of repetition, yet evading review.”

Justice SCALIA, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, dissenting.

Without expressing any views on the merits of this case, I respectfully dissent because in my opinion we have no authority to decide it. I think the controversy is moot.

The Court correctly acknowledges that we have no power under Art. III of the Constitution to adjudicate a case that no longer presents an actual, ongoing dispute between the named parties. Here, there is obviously no present controversy between the parties, since both respondents are no longer in school and therefore no longer subject to a unilateral “change in placement.” The Court concedes mootness with respect to respondent John Doe, who is now too old to receive the benefits of the Education of the Handicapped Act (EHA). It concludes, however, that the case is not moot as to respondent Jack Smith, who has two more years of eligibility but is no longer in the public schools, because the controversy is “capable of repetition, yet evading review.”

Jurisdiction on the basis that a dispute is “capable of repetition, yet evading review” is limited to the “exceptional situatio[n],” Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 109 (1983), where the following two circumstances simultaneously occur: “(1) the challenged action [is] in its duration too short to be fully litigated prior to its cessation or expiration, and (2) there [is] a reasonable expectation that the same complaining party would be subjected to the same action again.” Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S. 478, 482 (1982) (per curiam), quoting Weinstein v. Bradford, 423 U.S. 147, 149 (1975) (per curiam). The second of these requirements is not met in this case.

For there to be a “reasonable expectation” that Smith will be subjected to the same action again, that event must be a “demonstrated probability.” Murphy v. Hunt, supra, 455 U.S., at 482, 483; Weinstein v. Bradford, supra, 423 U.S., at 149. I am surprised by the Court's contention, fraught with potential for future mischief, that “reasonable expectation” is satisfied by something less than “demonstrated probability.” [See FN 6 of the Court’s opinion] No one expects that to happen which he does not think probable; and his expectation cannot be shown to be reasonable unless the probability is demonstrated.
The Chief Justice joins the majority opinion on the ground, not that this case is not moot, but that where the events giving rise to the mootness have occurred after we have granted certiorari we may disregard them, since mootness is only a prudential doctrine and not part of the “case or controversy” requirement of Art. III. I do not see how that can be. There is no more reason to intuit that mootness is merely a prudential doctrine than to intuit that initial standing is. Both doctrines have equivalently deep roots in the common-law understanding, and hence the constitutional understanding, of what makes a matter appropriate for judicial disposition. See Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968) (describing mootness and standing as various illustrations of the requirement of “justiciability” in Art. III).

In sum, I cannot believe that it is only our prudence, and nothing inherent in the understood nature of “The judicial Power,” U.S. Const., Art. III, § 1, that restrains us from pronouncing judgment in a case that the parties have settled, or a case involving a nonsurviving claim where the plaintiff has died, or a case where the law has been changed so that the basis of the dispute no longer exists, or a case where conduct sought to be enjoined has ceased and will not recur. Where the conduct has ceased for the time being but there is a demonstrated probability that it will recur, a real-life controversy between parties with a personal stake in the outcome continues to exist, and Art. III is no more violated than it is violated by entertaining a declaratory judgment action. But that is the limit of our power. I agree with the Chief Justice to this extent: the “yet evading review” portion of our “capable of repetition, yet evading review” test is prudential; whether or not that criterion is met, a justiciable controversy exists. But the probability of recurrence between the same parties is essential to our jurisdiction as a court, and it is that deficiency which this case presents.

It is assuredly frustrating to find that a jurisdictional impediment prevents us from reaching the important merits issues that were the reason for our agreeing to hear this case. But we cannot ignore such impediments for purposes of our appellate review without simultaneously affecting the principles that govern district courts in their assertion or retention of original jurisdiction. We thus do substantial harm to a governmental structure designed to restrict the courts to matters that actually affect the litigants before them.

§ 4.3 Political Questions Doctrine

1. The Political Questions Doctrine in Historical Perspective

A. The Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

The roots of the political question doctrine trace back to a 1794 speech by John Marshall. He said that for the judiciary to answer a question it must assume a legal form for litigation by parties.

Chief Justice Marshall also indicated in Marbury v. Madison that “the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience.”

The earliest case where the political questions doctrine was applied to find an issue a political question was Luther v. Borden. The question in Luther involved the Guarantee Clause of Article IV, § 4, which provides, “The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.” In Luther, the Court declined to find under the Guarantee Clause which of two groups was the legitimate government of Rhode Island, leaving it to Congress and the President to intervene, if necessary, to resolve the issue and disarm the factions.

B. The Formalist Era: 1873-1937

During the formalist era, a Guarantee Clause challenge to the state of Kentucky's procedure in a contested gubernatorial election was held nonjusticiable in Taylor v. Beckham. In a case involving Oregon's initiative and referendum process, the Court held in Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon that the question of whether a state has a republican form of government is political in character. The Court also held that a proclamation by the Secretary of State that the 19th Amendment was ratified by enough states was a political question conclusive upon the courts in Leser v. Garnett.

In these cases, the Court seemed to adopt a bright-line categorical approach that any case raising a Guarantee Clause or Ratification issue was a political question, although in 1874 the Court had noted in passing in Minor v. Happersatt that denying women the right to vote did not deprive any state of a republican form of government, a decision consistent with historical practice denying women the right to vote in 18th- and 19th-century America, as in other democracies at the time. Voting rights for women began in some democracies in the late 19th century and accelerated during the 20th century.

C. The Holmesian Era: 1937-1954

Holmesian deference led to an increased number of decisions in which the Court found that certain kinds of questions were political and thus for the other branches of government to resolve. The Holmesian-era Courts found that not only Ratification or Guarantee Clause issues were political questions, but also that aspects of the President’s foreign affairs power present a political question. For example, in United States v. Pink, the Court deferred to the President when holding that deciding which government represents a foreign state is a political question. Speaking more broadly, the Court said in Chicago & S. Air Lines v. Waterman S.S. Corp. that the Constitution gives the President the exclusive right to make foreign policy decisions. Regarding the Ratification Clause, the Court held in Coleman v. Miller that it was exclusively for Congress to resolve questions on the time within which an Amendment may be ratified, and the legal effects of a state first rejecting and later attempting to ratify an Amendment. In a challenge under the Guarantee Clause, the Court held in Colgrove v. Green that state malapportionment of congressional districts was a political question.

D. The Instrumentalist Era: 1954-1986

The modern era of political questions doctrine traces its roots to the Supreme Court’s decision in 1962 in Baker v. Carr, excerpted at § 4.3.2. Stressing that the challenge to a state reapportionment in Baker v. Carr was brought under the Equal Protection Clause, rather than the Guarantee Clause, and thus Colgrove could be distinguished, Justice Brennan’s opinion changed the way in which the Court decides whether a question is political.

First, Justice Brennan said that the nonjusticiability of political questions is primarily due to the separation of powers doctrine. Accordingly, there is need for a case-by-case inquiry into precise facts, without use of any semantic cataloguing. That gave him an opening to challenge statements in earlier cases as too sweeping. As Justice Brennan analyzed the prior cases, he did not conclude that they had held that every Guarantee Clause, or Ratification issue, or use of Presidential power in foreign affairs, raised only political questions. Instead, he concluded that the Court had looked carefully at the history of a question's management by political branches, whether it was susceptible to judicial handling, and the consequences of judicial action on separation of power concerns.48

Based upon this reasoning, Justice Brennan then abandoned any attempt to classify based on the clause or the question. Instead, he announced that "prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found one or more of six factors." These six factors stated in Baker v. Carr, (a) - (f), can be conveniently grouped into three categories:

1. a textual concern whether there exists (a) a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government;
2. a separation of powers concern with whether (b) there are judicially manageable standards or (c) the issue calls for an initial non-judicial policy decision; and
3. a prudential concern counseling against judicial intervention, such as a special concern with (d) expressing lack of respect for a coordinate branch of government, (e) a need for finality, or (f) potential embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements if the court second-guessed how the coordinate branch has acted.49

Justice Brennan said that unless one or more of these factors is "inextricable" from the case at bar there should not be a dismissal on grounds of a political question. Through this opinion, Justice Brennan provided the Court with concepts and techniques that would enable the Court to expand its power by reaching the merits in many more cases than if the Court had continued to use the broad categories of the formalist and Holmesian eras, such as simply noting that a Clause, such as the Guarantee Clause, or the general subject matter, such as foreign relations, was involved in the case.

Justice Brennan's case-by-case approach was applied by Chief Justice Warren, writing in Powell v. McCormack.50 Warren held that although Art. I, § 5 is a textually demonstrable commitment to the House of Representatives of power to judge qualifications expressly set forth in the Constitution, the Court is not deciding a political question when it interprets the Constitution to forbid the House to add additional qualifications to those listed in the Constitution, and thus to exclude from Congress a person duly elected by constituents who meets all three of the expressed requirements for membership – age, citizenship, and residence. Warren noted that if the Constitution is interpreted in light of the principle that the people may choose whom they please to govern, the Court's holding did not present an embarrassing confrontation between the Court and Congress. Nor were any other political question factors "inextricable from the case at bar" because the Court was merely engaged in traditional constitutional interpretation. Indeed, the decision that Congress may not add qualifications to those listed in the Constitution is similar to the Court’s conclusion in Marbury v. Madison that Congress cannot add cases to the Supreme Court’s original jurisdiction.

48 Id. at 209-17.

Another decision applying the Baker v. Carr factors is Davis v. Bandemer. In this case, the Court decided that a state’s political gerrymandering might violate the Equal Protection Clause, and was not a political question. In reaching this conclusion, the instrumentalists on the Court were joined by Justice White, as they often were concerning enforcement of federal remedies for alleged constitutional violations, and by moderate natural law Justice Powell. Three Justices dissented. In her dissent, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, Justice O’Connor said that the Court had not found any judicially manageable standards to determine when such a gerrymander was a violation, and the issue is a classic issue which calls for a non-judicial policy decision by political actors in each state. O’Connor noted that political gerrymandering cases are different than the “one person, one vote” standard for population malapportionment, involved in Baker v. Carr, or cases involving racial discrimination in redistricting, where the Court has been able to develop agreed-upon standards of review. Reflecting the difficulty in determining a test for the constitutionality of a political gerrymander, a 4-Justice plurality of Justices Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun adopted one approach, while Justices Powell and Stevens adopted a different approach.

During the instrumentalist era, however, some issues were found to be political questions under the Baker v. Carr doctrine. For example, in Gilligan v. Morgan, the plaintiff sought an injunction with respect to training the national guard so it would not deny due process by using fatal force in suppressing civilian disorders. The Court said that Art. I, § 8, cl. 16 vested training of the militia to Congress. Chief Justice Burger’s opinion also spoke of the lack of judicial competence and the separation of powers concern that control of the military should be in the hands of elected persons, although Burger’s opinion did note, consistent with Baker v. Carr’s case-by-case approach, that “we neither hold nor imply that the conduct of the National Guard is always beyond judicial review.”

The issue of the constitutionality of the United States military action in Vietnam was presented to lower courts during the 1960s and 1970s, since Congress never formally declared war against Vietnam, passing only the “Gulf of Tonkin Resolution.” A number of lower courts ruled that issues surrounding the legality of military action in Vietnam were political questions, applying the factors in Baker v. Carr, but the Supreme Court never took certiorari in any of those cases.

A final important instrumentalist-era case involving the political questions doctrine is Goldwater v. Carter. In Goldwater, members of Congress sought a declaration that President Carter's termination of a treaty with Taiwan, which was based on the President Carter's decision to recognize the People's Republic of China as the official government of China, not Taiwan, deprived Congress of their constitutional role in making law. The Court dismissed without a majority opinion. For four Justices, Justice Rehnquist reasoned broadly in a pre-Baker v. Carr style, relying on the Holmesian-era case of Coleman v. Miller, to conclude that whether the President alone may recognize or withdraw recognition from foreign governments was a political question. Coleman was directly analogous, said Justice Rehnquist, because the Constitution has express text on how the Senate participates in the ratification of a treaty, but is silent on its participation in the abrogation of a Treaty, and different termination procedures might be appropriate for different treaties. Since the Constitution is silent on the matter, there are no judicially manageable standards to govern court review, and thus the matter “must surely be controlled by political standards.”

Justice Powell, who usually wrote from the natural law perspective, applied the factor analysis of Baker v. Carr to find that the issue in the case was not a political question. He said no constitutional provision unquestionably commits the power to terminate treaties to the President alone, there was no lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving a case of presidential power, and no special considerations regarding mutual respect called for the Court to avoid deciding the case. Further, if the case were ripe, a decision would eliminate multiple interpretations. However, since Congress had remained silent and there was no impasse, the case was not ripe for resolution.

Justice Brennan agreed with Justice Powell that the political question doctrine did not always apply when the question was whether a particular branch has been constitutionally designated as the repository of political decision-making power. On the merits, he would hold that the President alone has power to recognize and withdraw recognition from foreign governments. Justices White and Blackmun voted to set the case for argument. Marshall concurred in the result to remand the case to the district court with instructions to dismiss the complaint.

Two relatively easy cases involving the political questions doctrine decided since 1986 are United States v. Munoz-Flores and New York v. United States. In Munoz-Flores,\(^{61}\) the Court held that whether a law was passed in violation of the Origination Clause, which requires bills for raising revenue to originate in the House of Representatives, was not a political question. The Court concluded that just as judicially manageable standards existed in Powell v. McCormack to determine congressional power under the Qualifications Clause, judicial manageable standards existed to determine congressional power under the Origination Clause. On the merits, the Court then held that a statute creating a particular program and raising revenue for that program was not a bill for raising revenue within the Origination Clause.

In New York v. United States,\(^{62}\) the Court raised, but did not have to decide, the question whether cases brought under the Guarantee Clause are always nonjusticiable, or whether a better rule would be that the nature of a claim, rather than the nature of the clause, should determine whether the claim was justiciable. The fact that the Court left the question open, however, suggests a predisposition to continue repudiation of the category approach of the pre-instrumentalist era, and follow the case-by-case approach adopted in Baker v. Carr. The Guarantee Clause issue could be avoided in New York because the case was decided under the 10th Amendment.

Given the natural law respect for precedent, for reasoned elaboration of the law, and a predisposition to decide cases on a fact-by-fact basis, it is likely that political questions doctrine will continue to be determined by the six-factor Baker v. Carr approach. However, without the instrumentalist predisposition to find cases are not political questions so the Court can rule on the merits of the lawsuit, the make-up of the Court today suggests that it will likely find more questions are political questions than did the instrumentalist Court, as suggested by the cases of Vieth v. Jubelirer, excerpted below, and Nixon v. United States, excerpted below. Lower federal courts have similarly adopted a willingness to find cases are political questions.\(^{63}\)

Ct. 1768 (2006) (claims against the United States and its former national security advisor for supporting 1970 Chilean coup and kidnapping and murder of Chilean general by plotters raised foreign policy questions committed to the executive branch, no judicially manageable standards exist to determine propriety of executive action, and adjudication requires policy determinations not within judicial competence); United States v. Mandel, 914 F.2d 1215, 1223 (9th Cir. 1990) (whether to place items on a “commodity control” list is “quintessentially matters of policy entrusted by the Constitution to the Congress and the President, for which there are not meaningful standards of judicial review.”).
On the other hand, sometimes it is clear to a majority of the Court that an issue is not a political question. For example, in Zivotofsky v. Clinton, an 8-1 Court held that the political questions doctrine does not bar a court from considering whether a congressional statute which provides that Americans born in Jerusalem may elect to have “Israel” listed as their place of birth on their passports is constitutional. A conflict exists because the State Department has declined to follow the law, citing its long-standing policy of not taking a position on the political status of Jerusalem. Justice Breyer dissented, viewing the issue as a political question based on Baker v. Carr.

Baker v. Carr

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This civil action was brought under 42 U. S. C. §§ 1983 and 1988 to redress the alleged deprivation of federal constitutional rights. The complaint, alleging that by means of a 1901 statute of Tennessee apportioning the members of the General Assembly among the State's 95 counties, "these plaintiffs and others similarly situated, are denied the equal protection of the laws accorded them by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States by virtue of the debasement of their votes," was dismissed by a three-judge court convened under 28 U. S. C. § 2281 in the Middle District of Tennessee. The court held that it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter and also that no claim was stated upon which relief could be granted. 179 F.Supp. 824. We noted probable jurisdiction of the appeal. 364 U.S. 898. We hold that the dismissal was error, and remand the cause to the District Court for trial and further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

In holding that the subject matter of this suit was not justiciable, the District Court relied on Colegrove v. Green, supra, [328 U.S. 549 (1946)] and subsequent per curiam cases. The court stated: "From a review of these decisions there can be no doubt that the federal rule . . . is that the federal courts . . . will not intervene in cases of this type to compel legislative reapportionment." 179 F.Supp., at 826.

We hold that the claim pleaded here neither rests upon nor implicates the Guaranty Clause and that its justiciability is therefore not foreclosed by our decisions of cases involving that clause. The District Court misinterpreted Colegrove v. Green and other decisions of this Court on which it relied. Appellants' claim that they are being denied equal protection is justiciable, and if "discrimination is sufficiently shown, the right to relief under the equal protection clause is not 65 Id. at 1437 (Breyer, J., dissenting). On remand, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals held the law unconstitutional as infringing on the President’s power to decide whether and on what terms to recognize foreign governments. Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Secretary of State, 725 F.3d 197 (D.C. Cir. 2013), aff'd, 135 S. Ct. 2076 (2015), discussed infra at § 11.2. diminished by the fact that the discrimination relates to political rights." Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U.S. 1, 11.

To show why we reject the argument based on the Guaranty Clause, we must examine the authorities under it. But because there appears to be some uncertainty as to why those cases did present political questions, and specifically as to whether this apportionment case is like those cases, we deem it necessary first to consider the contours of the "political question" doctrine.

Our discussion, even at the price of extending this opinion, requires review of a number of political question cases, in order to expose the attributes of the doctrine – attributes which, in various settings, diverge, combine, appear, and disappear in seeming disorderliness. Since that review is undertaken solely to demonstrate that neither singly nor collectively do these cases support a conclusion that this apportionment case is nonjusticiable, we of course do not explore their implications in other contexts. That review reveals that in the Guaranty Clause cases and in the other "political question" cases, it is the relationship between the judiciary and the coordinate branches of the Federal Government, and not the federal judiciary's relationship to the States, which gives rise to the "political question."

We have said that "In determining whether a question falls within [the political question] category, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination are dominant considerations." Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 454-455. The nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers. Much confusion results from the capacity of the "political question" label to obscure the need for case-by-case inquiry. Deciding whether a matter has in any measure been committed by the Constitution to another branch of government, or whether the action of that branch exceeds whatever authority has been committed, is itself a delicate exercise in constitutional interpretation, and is a responsibility of this Court as ultimate interpreter of the Constitution. To demonstrate this requires no less than to analyze representative cases and to infer from them the analytical threads that make up the political question doctrine. We shall then show that none of those threads catches this case.

Foreign relations: There are sweeping statements to the effect that all questions touching foreign relations are political questions. Not only does resolution of such issues frequently turn on standards that defy judicial application, or involve the exercise of a discretion demonstrably committed to the executive or legislature; but many such questions uniquely demand single-voiced statement of the Government's views. Yet it is error to suppose that every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance. Our cases in this field seem invariably to show a discriminating analysis of the particular question posed, in terms of the history of its management by the political branches, of its susceptibility to judicial handling in the light of its nature and posture in the specific case, and of the possible consequences of judicial action. For example, though a court will not ordinarily inquire whether a treaty has been terminated, since on that question "governmental action . . . must be regarded as of controlling importance," if there has been no conclusive "governmental action" then a court can construe a treaty and may find it provides the answer. Compare Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 285, with Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. 464, 492-495. Though a court will not undertake to construe a treaty in a manner inconsistent with a subsequent federal statute, no similar hesitancy

While recognition of foreign governments so strongly defies judicial treatment that without executive recognition a foreign state has been called "a republic of whose existence we know nothing," and the judiciary ordinarily follows the executive as to which nation has sovereignty over disputed territory, once sovereignty over an area is politically determined and declared, courts may examine the resulting status and decide independently whether a statute applies to that area. Similarly, recognition of belligerency abroad is an executive responsibility, but if the executive proclamations fall short of an explicit answer, a court may construe them seeking, for example, to determine whether the situation is such that statutes designed to assure American neutrality have become operative. The Three Friends, 166 U.S. 1, 63, 66. Still again, though it is the executive that determines a person's status as representative of a foreign government, Ex parte Hitz, 111 U.S. 766, the executive's statements will be construed where necessary to determine the court's jurisdiction, In re Baiz, 135 U.S. 403. Similar judicial action in the absence of a recognizably authoritative executive declaration occurs in cases involving the immunity from seizure of vessels owned by friendly foreign governments. Compare Ex parte Peru, 318 U.S. 578, with Mexico v. Hoffman, 324 U.S. 30, 34-35.

It is apparent that several formulations which vary slightly according to the settings in which the questions arise may describe a political question, although each has one or more elements which identify it as essentially a function of the separation of powers. Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

We come, finally, to the ultimate inquiry whether our precedents as to what constitutes a nonjusticiable "political question" bring the case before us under the umbrella of that doctrine. A natural beginning is to note whether any of the common characteristics which we have been able to identify and label descriptively are present. We find none: The question here is the consistency of state action with the Federal Constitution. We have no question decided, or to be decided, by a political branch of government coequal with this Court. Nor do we risk embarrassment of our government abroad, or grave disturbance at home if we take issue with Tennessee as to the constitutionality of her action here challenged. Nor need the appellants, in order to succeed in this action, ask the Court to enter upon policy determinations for which judicially manageable standards are lacking. Judicial standards under the Equal Protection Clause are well developed and familiar, and it has been open to courts since the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment to determine, if on the particular facts they must, that a discrimination reflects no policy, but simply arbitrary and capricious action.
We conclude that the complaint's allegations of a denial of equal protection present a justiciable constitutional cause of action upon which appellants are entitled to a trial and a decision.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Justice WHITTAKER did not participate in the decision of this case.

Justice FRANKFURTER, whom Justice HARLAN joins, dissenting.

The Court today reverses a uniform course of decision established by a dozen cases, including one by which the very claim now sustained was unanimously rejected only five years ago. The impressive body of rulings thus cast aside reflected the equally uniform course of our political history regarding the relationship between population and legislative representation – a wholly different matter from denial of the franchise to individuals because of race, color, religion or sex. Such a massive repudiation of the experience of our whole past in asserting destructively novel judicial power demands a detailed analysis of the role of this Court in our constitutional scheme. Disregard of inherent limits in the effective exercise of the Court's "judicial Power" not only presages the futility of judicial intervention in the essentially political conflict of forces by which the relation between population and representation has time out of mind been and now is determined. It may well impair the Court's position as the ultimate organ of "the supreme Law of the Land" in that vast range of legal problems, often strongly entangled in popular feeling, on which this Court must pronounce. The Court's authority – possessed of neither the purse nor the sword – ultimately rests on sustained public confidence in its moral sanction. Such feeling must be nourished by the Court's complete detachment, in fact and in appearance, from political entanglements and by abstention from injecting itself into the clash of political forces in political settlements.

What, then, is this question of legislative apportionment? Appellants invoke the right to vote and to have their votes counted. But they are permitted to vote and their votes are counted. They go to the polls, they cast their ballots, they send their representatives to the state councils. Their complaint is simply that the representatives are not sufficiently numerous or powerful – in short, that Tennessee has adopted a basis of representation with which they are dissatisfied. Talk of "debasement" or "dilution" is circular talk. One cannot speak of "debasement" or "dilution" of the value of a vote until there is first defined a standard of reference as to what a vote should be worth. What is actually asked of the Court in this case is to choose among competing bases of representation – ultimately, really, among competing theories of political philosophy – in order to establish an appropriate frame of government for the State of Tennessee and thereby for all the States of the Union.

Justice HARLAN, whom Justice FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting.

Once one cuts through the thicket of discussion devoted to "jurisdiction," "standing," "justiciability," and "political question," there emerges a straightforward issue which, in my view, is determinative.
of this case. Does the complaint disclose a violation of a federal constitutional right, in other words, a claim over which a United States District Court would have jurisdiction under 28 U. S. C. § 1343 (3) and 42 U. S. C. § 1983? The majority opinion does not actually discuss this basic question, but, as one concurring Justice observes, seems to decide it "sub silentio." However, in my opinion, appellants' allegations, accepting all of them as true, do not, parsed down or as a whole, show an infringement by Tennessee of any rights assured by the Fourteenth Amendment. Accordingly, I believe the complaint should have been dismissed for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." Fed. Rules Civ. Proc., Rule 12 (b)(6).

It is at once essential to recognize this case for what it is. The issue here relates not to a method of state electoral apportionment by which seats in the federal House of Representatives are allocated, but solely to the right of a State to fix the basis of representation in its own legislature. Until it is first decided to what extent that right is limited by the Federal Constitution, and whether what Tennessee has done or failed to do in this instance runs afoul of any such limitation, we need not reach the issues of "justiciability" or "political question" or any of the other considerations which in such cases as Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549, led the Court to decline to adjudicate a challenge to a state apportionment affecting seats in the federal House of Representatives, in the absence of a controlling Act of Congress. See also Wood v. Broom, 287 U. S. 1.

The appellants' claim in this case ultimately rests entirely on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It is asserted that Tennessee has violated the Equal Protection Clause by maintaining in effect a system of apportionment that grossly favors in legislative representation the rural sections of the State as against its urban communities. Stripped to its essentials the complaint purports to set forth three constitutional claims of varying breadth:

(1) The Equal Protection Clause requires that each vote cast in state legislative elections be given approximately equal weight.

(2) Short of this, the existing apportionment of state legislators is so unreasonable as to amount to an arbitrary and capricious act of classification on the part of the Tennessee Legislature, which is offensive to the Equal Protection Clause.

(3) In any event, the existing apportionment is rendered invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment because it flies in the face of the Tennessee Constitution.

I can find nothing in the Equal Protection Clause or elsewhere in the Federal Constitution which expressly or impliedly supports the view that state legislatures must be so structured as to reflect with approximate equality the voice of every voter. Not only is that proposition refuted by history, as shown by my Brother Frankfurter, but it strikes deep into the heart of our federal system. Its acceptance would require us to turn our backs on the regard which this Court has always shown for the judgment of state legislatures and courts on matters of basically local concern.

In Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), excerpted at § 24.1, the Court held that the Equal Protection Clause requires that both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis. This principle requires that a state must make an honest and good faith effort to construct districts, in both houses of its legislature, as nearly of equal population as is practicable. This doctrine of “one person/one vote” applies with even greater rigor to drawing congressional districts for the federal House of Representatives, as discussed at § 24.1 n.4.

Vieth v. Jubeliver

Justice SCALIA announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice O’CONNOR and Justice THOMAS, join.

Plaintiffs-appellants Richard Vieth, Norma Jean Vieth, and Susan Furey challenge a map drawn by the Pennsylvania General Assembly establishing districts for the election of congressional Representatives, on the ground that the districting constitutes an unconstitutional political gerrymander. In Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), this Court held that political gerrymandering claims are justiciable, but could not agree upon a standard to adjudicate them. The present appeal presents the questions whether our decision in Bandemer was in error, and, if not, what the standard should be.

The facts, as alleged by the plaintiffs, are as follows. The population figures derived from the 2000 census showed that Pennsylvania was entitled to only 19 Representatives in Congress, a decrease in 2 from the Commonwealth's previous delegation. Pennsylvania's General Assembly took up the task of drawing a new districting map. At the time, the Republican party controlled a majority of both state Houses and held the Governor's office. Prominent national figures in the Republican Party pressured the General Assembly to adopt a partisan redistricting plan as a punitive measure against Democrats for having enacted pro-Democrat redistricting plans elsewhere. The Republican members of Pennsylvania's House and Senate worked together on such a plan. On January 3, 2002, the General Assembly passed its plan, which was signed into law by Governor Schweiker as Act 1.

Plaintiffs, registered Democrats who vote in Pennsylvania, brought suit in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, seeking to enjoin implementation of Act 1 under Rev Stat § 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Defendants-appellees were the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and various executive and legislative officers responsible for enacting or implementing Act 1. The complaint alleged, among other things, that the legislation created malapportioned districts, in violation of the one-person, one-vote requirement of Article I, § 2, of the United States Constitution, and that it constituted a political gerrymander, in violation of Article I and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. With regard to the latter contention, the complaint alleged that the districts created by Act 1 were "meandering and irregular," and "ignor[ed] all traditional redistricting criteria, including the preservation of local government boundaries, solely for the sake of partisan advantage." Juris. Statement 136a, P 22, 135a, P 20.
As Chief Justice Marshall proclaimed two centuries ago, "[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803). Sometimes, however, the law is that the judicial department has no business entertaining the claim of unlawfulness – because the question is entrusted to one of the political branches or involves no judicially enforceable rights. See, e.g., Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (challenge to procedures used in Senate impeachment proceedings); Pac. States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118 (1912) (claims arising under the Guaranty Clause of Article IV, § 4). Such questions are said to be "nonjusticiable," or "political questions."

In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), we set forth six independent tests for the existence of a political question: "[1] a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or [2] a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or [3] the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or [4] the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of the government; or [5] an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or [6] the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question." Id. at 217.

These tests are probably listed in descending order of both importance and certainty. The second is at issue here, and there is no doubt of its validity. "The judicial Power" created by Article III, § 1, of the Constitution is not whatever judges choose to do, see Valley Forge Christian College v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 487 (1982); cf. Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S. A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 332-333 (1999), or even whatever Congress chooses to assign them, see Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 576-577 (1992); Chicago & S. Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S. S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 110-114 (1948). It is the power to act in the manner traditional for English and American courts. One of the most obvious limitations imposed by that requirement is that judicial action must be governed by standard, by rule. Laws promulgated by the Legislative Branch can be inconsistent, illogical, and ad hoc; law pronounced by the courts must be principled, rational, and based upon reasoned distinctions.

Over the dissent of three Justices, the Court held in Davis v. Bandemer that, since it was "not persuaded that there are no judicially discernible and manageable standards by which political gerrymander cases are to be decided," 478 U.S. 109, at 123, such cases were justiciable. The clumsy shifting of the burden of proof for the premise (the Court was "not persuaded" that standards do not exist, rather than "persuaded" that they do) was necessitated by the uncomfortable fact that the six-Justice majority could not discern what the judicially discernable standards might be. There was no majority on that point. Four of the Justices finding justiciability believed that the standard was one thing, see id., at 127 (plurality opinion of White, J., joined by Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun, JJ.); two believed it was something else, see id. 161 (Powell, J., joined by Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The lower courts have lived with that assurance of a standard (or more precisely, lack of assurance that there is no standard), coupled with that inability to specify a standard, for the past 18 years. In that time, they have considered numerous political gerrymandering claims; this Court has never revisited the unanswered question of what standard governs.
Nor can it be said that the lower courts have, over 18 years, succeeded in shaping the standard that this Court was initially unable to enunciate. They have simply applied the standard set forth in Bandemer’s four-Justice plurality opinion. This might be thought to prove that the four-Justice plurality standard has met the test of time – but for the fact that its application has almost invariably produced the same result (except for the incurring of attorney’s fees) as would have obtained if the question were nonjusticiable: judicial intervention has been refused. As one commentary has put it, "[t]hroughout its subsequent history, Bandemer has served almost exclusively as an invitation to litigation without much prospect of redress." S. Issacharoff, P. Karlan, & R. Pildes, The Law of Democracy 886 (rev. 2d ed. 2002). The one case in which relief was provided (and merely preliminary relief, at that) did not involve the drawing of district lines; in all of the cases we are aware of involving that most common form of political gerrymandering, relief was denied. Moreover, although the case in which relief was provided seemingly involved the ne plus ultra of partisan manipulation, we would be at a loss to explain why the Bandemer line should have been drawn just there, and should not have embraced several districting plans that were upheld despite allegations of extreme partisan discrimination, bizarrely shaped districts, and disproportionate results. See, e.g., Session v. Perry, 298 F. Supp. 2d 451 (ED Tex. 2004) (per curiam); O’Lear v. Miller, 222 F. Supp. 2d 850 (ED Mich. 2002), summarily aff’d, 537 U.S. 997 (2002); Badham v. Eu, 694 F. Supp. 664, 670 (ND Cal. 1988), summarily aff’d, 488 U.S. 1024 (1989). To think that this lower-court jurisprudence has brought forth "judicially discernible and manageable standards" would be fantasy.

Justice Stevens concurs in the judgment that we should not address plaintiffs’ statewide political gerrymandering challenges. Though he reaches that result via standing analysis, while we reach it through political-question analysis, our conclusions are the same: these statewide claims are nonjusticiable.

Justice Stevens would, however, require courts to consider political gerrymandering challenges at the individual-district level. Much of his dissent is addressed to the incompatibility of severe partisan gerrymanders with democratic principles. We do not disagree with that judgment, any more than we disagree with the judgment that it would be unconstitutional for the Senate to employ, in impeachment proceedings, procedures that are incompatible with its obligation to "try" impeachments. See Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (1993). The issue we have discussed is not whether severe partisan gerrymanders violate the Constitution, but whether it is for the courts to say when a violation has occurred, and to design a remedy. On that point, Justice Stevens's dissent is less helpful, saying, essentially, that if we can do it in the racial gerrymandering context we can do it here.

Justice Souter, like Justice Stevens, would restrict these plaintiffs, on the allegations before us, to district-specific political gerrymandering claims. Unlike Justice Stevens, however, Justice Souter recognizes that there is no existing workable standard for adjudicating such claims. He proposes a "fresh start," a newly constructed standard loosely based in form on our Title VII cases, see McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973), and complete with a five-step prima facie test sewn together from parts of, among other things, our Voting Rights Act jurisprudence, law review articles, and apportionment cases. Even if these self-styled "clues" to unconstitutionality could be manageably applied, which we doubt, there is no reason to think they would detect the constitutional crime which Justice Souter is investigating – an "extremity of unfairness" in partisan competition.

We agree with much of Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion, which convincingly demonstrates that "political considerations will likely play an important, and proper, role in the drawing of district boundaries." This places Justice Breyer, like the other dissenters, in the difficult position of drawing the line between good politics and bad politics. Unlike them, he would tackle this problem at the statewide level.

The criterion Justice Breyer proposes is nothing more precise than "the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power." While he invokes in passing the Equal Protection Clause, it should be clear to any reader that what constitutes unjustified entrenchment depends on his own theory of "effective government." While one must agree with Justice Breyer's incredibly abstract starting point that our Constitution sought to create a "basically democratic" form of government, ibid., that is a long and impassable distance away from the conclusion that the judiciary may assess whether a group (somehow defined) has achieved a level of political power (somehow defined) commensurate with that to which they would be entitled absent unjustified political machinations (whatever that means).

Justice Kennedy recognizes that we have "demonstrat[ed] the shortcomings of the other standards that have been considered to date." He acknowledges, moreover, that we "lack . . . comprehensive and neutral principles for drawing electoral boundaries," and that there is an "absence of rules to limit and confine judicial intervention," ibid. From these premises, one might think that Justice Kennedy would reach the conclusion that political gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable. Instead, however, he concludes that courts should continue to adjudicate such claims because a standard may one day be discovered.

The first thing to be said about Justice Kennedy's disposition is that it is not legally available. The District Court in this case considered the plaintiffs' claims justiciable but dismissed them because the standard for unconstitutionality had not been met. It is logically impossible to affirm that dismissal without either (1) finding that the unconstitutional-districting standard applied by the District Court, or some other standard that it should have applied, has not been met, or (2) finding (as we have) that the claim is nonjusticiable. Justice Kennedy seeks to affirm "[b]ecause, in the case before us, we have no standard." But it is our job, not the plaintiffs', to explicate the standard that makes the facts alleged by the plaintiffs adequate or inadequate to state a claim. We cannot nonsuit them for our failure to do so.

Justice Kennedy asserts that to declare nonjusticiability would be incautious. Our rush to such a holding after a mere 18 years of fruitless litigation "contrasts starkly" he says, "with the more patient approach" that this Court has taken in the past. We think not.
The only cases Justice Kennedy cites in defense of his never-say-never approach are Baker v. Carr and Bandemer. Bandemer provides no cover. There, all of the Justices who concluded that political gerrymandering claims are justiciable proceeded to describe what they regarded as the discernible and manageable standard that rendered it so. The lower courts were set wandering in the wilderness for 18 years not because the Bandemer majority thought it a good idea, but because five Justices could not agree upon a single standard, and because the standard the plurality proposed turned out not to work.

As for Baker v. Carr: It is true enough that, having had no experience whatever in apportionment matters of any sort, the Court there refrained from spelling out the equal-protection standard. (It did so a mere two years later in Reynolds v. Sims.) But the judgment under review in Baker, unlike the one under review here, did not demand the determination of a standard. The lower in Baker had held the apportionment claim of the plaintiffs nonjusticiable, and so it was logically possible to dispose of the appeal by simply disagreeing with the nonjusticiability determination. As we observed earlier, that is not possible here, where the lower court has held the claim justiciable but unsupported by the facts. We must either enunciate the standard that causes us to agree or disagree with that merits judgment, or else affirm that the claim is beyond our competence to adjudicate.

Justice Kennedy worries that "[a] determination by the Court to deny all hopes of intervention could erode confidence in the courts as much as would a premature decision to intervene." But it is the function of the courts to provide relief, not hope. What we think would erode confidence is the Court's refusal to do its job – announcing that there may well be a valid claim here, but we are not yet prepared to figure it out. Moreover, that course does more than erode confidence; by placing the district courts back in the business of pretending to afford help when they in fact can give none, it deters the political process from affording genuine relief.

Considerations of stare decisis do not compel us to allow Bandemer to stand. That case involved an interpretation of the Constitution, and the claims of stare decisis are at their weakest in that field, where our mistakes cannot be corrected by Congress. See Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828 (1991). They are doubly weak in Bandemer because the majority's inability to enunciate the judicially discernible and manageable standard that it thought existed (or did not think did not exist) presaged the need for reconsideration in light of subsequent experience. And they are triply weak because it is hard to imagine how any action taken in reliance upon Bandemer could conceivably be frustrated.

While we do not lightly overturn one of our own holdings, "when governing decisions are unworkable or are badly reasoned, 'this Court has never felt constrained to follow precedent.'" Id., at 827 (quoting Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 665 (1944)). Eighteen years of essentially pointless litigation have persuaded us that Bandemer is incapable of principled application. We would therefore overrule that case, and decline to adjudicate these political gerrymandering claims.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.
Justice KENNEDY, concurring in the judgment.

A decision ordering the correction of all election district lines drawn for partisan reasons would commit federal and state courts to unprecedented intervention in the American political process. The Court is correct to refrain from directing this substantial intrusion into the Nation’s political life. While agreeing with the plurality that the complaint the appellants filed in the District Court must be dismissed, and while understanding that great caution is necessary when approaching this subject, I would not foreclose all possibility of judicial relief if some limited and precise rationale were found to correct an established violation of the Constitution in some redistricting cases.

The plurality thinks I resolve this case with reference to no standard, but that is wrong. The Fourteenth Amendment standard governs; and there is no doubt of that. My analysis only notes that if a subsidiary standard could show how an otherwise permissible classification, as applied, burdens representational rights, we could conclude that appellants’ evidence states a provable claim under the Fourteenth Amendment standard.

Still, the Court's own responsibilities require that we refrain from intervention in this instance. The failings of the many proposed standards for measuring the burden a gerrymander imposes on representational rights make our intervention improper. If workable standards do emerge to measure these burdens, however, courts should be prepared to order relief. With these observations, I join the judgment of the plurality.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

The central question presented by this case is whether political gerrymandering claims are justiciable. Although our reasons for coming to this conclusion differ, five Members of the Court are convinced that the plurality’s answer to that question is erroneous. Moreover, as is apparent from our separate writings today, we share the view that, even if these appellants are not entitled to prevail, it would be contrary to precedent and profoundly unwise to foreclose all judicial review of similar claims that might be advanced in the future. That we presently have somewhat differing views – concerning both the precedential value of some of our recent cases and the standard that should be applied in future cases – should not obscure the fact that the areas of agreement set forth in the separate opinions are of far greater significance.

The concept of equal justice under the law requires the State to govern impartially. See Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 623 (1996); Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 265 (1983); New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer, 440 U.S. 568, 587 (1979). Today’s plurality opinion would exempt governing officials from that duty in the context of legislative redistricting and would give license, for the first time, to partisan gerrymanders that are devoid of any rational justification. In my view, when partisanship is the legislature’s sole motivation – when any pretense of neutrality is forsaken unabashedly and all traditional districting criteria are subverted for partisan advantage – the governing body cannot be said to have acted impartially.
The plurality reasons that the standards for evaluating racial gerrymanders are not workable in cases such as this because partisan considerations, unlike racial ones, are perfectly legitimate. Until today, however, there has not been the slightest intimation in any opinion written by any Member of this Court that a naked purpose to disadvantage a political minority would provide a rational basis for drawing a district line. "[T]he word 'rational' – for me at least – includes elements of legitimacy and neutrality that must always characterize the performance of the sovereign's duty to govern impartially." Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 452 (1985) (Stevens, J., concurring). A legislature controlled by one party could not, for instance, impose special taxes on members of the minority party, or use tax revenues to pay the majority party's campaign expenses. The rational basis for government decisions must satisfy a standard of legitimacy and neutrality; an acceptable rational basis can be neither purely personal nor purely partisan. See id., at 452-453.

The plurality says, in effect, that courts have been trying to devise practical criteria for political gerrymandering for nearly 20 years, without being any closer to something workable than we were when Davis was decided. While this is true enough, I do not accept it as sound counsel of despair. For I take it that the principal reason we have not gone from theoretical justiciability to practical administrability in political gerrymandering cases is the Davis plurality's specification that any criterion of forbidden gerrymandering must require a showing that members of the plaintiff's group had "essentially been shut out of the political process," 478 U.S. at 139. See, e.g., Badham v. Eu, 694 F. Supp. 664, 670-671 (ND Cal 1988) (three-judge court). That is, in order to avoid a threshold for relief so low that almost any electoral defeat (let alone failure to achieve proportionate results) would support a gerrymandering claim, the Davis plurality required a demonstration of such pervasive devaluation over such a period of time as to raise real doubt that a case could ever be made out. Davis suggested that plaintiffs might need to show even that their efforts to deliberate, register, and vote had been impeded. 478 U.S. at 133. This standard, which it is difficult to imagine a major party meeting, combined a very demanding burden with significant vagueness; and if appellants have not been able to propose a practical test for a Davis violation, the fault belongs less to them than to our predecessors. As Judge Higginbotham recently put it, "[i]t is now painfully clear that Justice Powell's concern that [Davis] offered a "constitutional green light" to would-be gerrymanderers has been realized." Session v. Perry, 298 F. Supp. 2d 451, 474 (ED Tex 2004) (quoting Davis, supra, at 173 (Powell, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)).

Since this Court has created the problem no one else has been able to solve, it is up to us to make a fresh start. There are a good many voices saying it is high time that we did, for in the years since Davis, the increasing efficiency of partisan redistricting has damaged the democratic process to a degree that our predecessors only began to imagine. E.g., Issacharoff, Gerrymandering and Political Cartels, 116 Harv. L. Rev. 593, 624 (2002) (The "pattern of incumbent entrenchment has gotten worse as the computer technology for more exquisite gerrymandering has improved"); Karlan, The Fire Next Time: Reapportionment After the 2000 Census, 50 Stan. L. Rev. 731, 736 (1998) ("Finer-grained census data, better predictive methods, and more powerful computers allow for increasingly sophisticated equipopulous gerrymanders"); Pildes, Principled Limitations on Racial and Partisan Restricting, 106 Yale L. J. 2505, 2553-2554 (1997) ("Recent cases now document in microscopic detail the astonishing precision with which redistricters can carve up individual precincts and distribute them between districts with confidence concerning the racial and partisan consequences"). See also Morrill, A Geographer's Perspective, in Political Gerrymandering and the Courts 213-214 (B. Grofman ed. 1990) (noting that gerrymandering can produce "high proportions of very safe seats"); Brief for Bernard Grofman et al. as Amici Curiae 5-8 (decline of competitive seats). Cf. Wells, supra, at 551 (Harlan, J., dissenting) ("A computer may grind out district lines which can totally frustrate the popular will on an overwhelming number of critical issues").

I would therefore preserve Davis's holding that political gerrymandering is a justiciable issue, but otherwise start anew. I would adopt a political gerrymandering test analogous to the summary judgment standard crafted in McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973), calling for a plaintiff to satisfy elements of a prima facie cause of action, at which point the State would have the opportunity not only to rebut the evidence supporting the plaintiff's case, but to offer an affirmative justification for the districting choices, even assuming the proof of the plaintiff's allegations. My own judgment is that we would have better luck at devising a workable prima facie case if we concentrated as much as possible on suspect characteristics of individual districts instead of state-wide patterns. It is not that a statewide view of districting is somehow less important; the usual point of gerrymandering, after all, is to control the greatest number of seats overall. But, as will be seen, we would be able to call more readily on some existing law when we defined what is suspect at the district level, and for now I would conceive of a statewide challenge as itself a function of claims that individual districts are illegitimately drawn. Finally, in the same interest of threshold simplicity, I would stick to problems of single-member districts; if we could not devise a workable scheme for dealing with claims about these, we would have to forget the complications posed by multimember districts.

JUSTICE BREYER, dissenting.

The use of purely political considerations in drawing district boundaries is not a "necessary evil" that, for lack of judicially manageable standards, the Constitution inevitably must tolerate. Rather, pure politics often helps to secure constitutionally important democratic objectives. But sometimes it does not. Sometimes purely political "gerrymandering" will fail to advance any plausible democratic objective while simultaneously threatening serious democratic harm. And sometimes when that is so, courts can identify an equal protection violation and provide a remedy. . . .

The plurality focuses directly on the most difficult issue before us. It says, "no test – yea, not even a five-part test – can possibly be successful unless one knows what he is testing for." Ante, at 28 (emphasis in original). That is true. Thus, I shall describe a set of circumstances in which the use of purely political districting criteria could conflict with constitutionally mandated democratic requirements – circumstances that the courts should "test for."

[T]he use of purely political boundary-drawing factors can amount to a serious, and remediable, abuse, namely the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power. By entrenchment I mean a situation in which a party that enjoys only minority support among the populace has nonetheless contrived to take, and hold, legislative power. By unjustified entrenchment
I mean that the minority's hold on power is purely the result of partisan manipulation and not other factors. These "other" factors that could lead to "justified" (albeit temporary) minority entrenchment include sheer happenstance, the existence of more than two major parties, the unique constitutional requirements of certain representational bodies such as the Senate, or reliance on traditional (geographic, communities of interest, etc.) districting criteria.

Where unjustified entrenchment takes place, voters find it far more difficult to remove those responsible for a government they do not want; and these democratic values are dishonored.

[The plurality makes one criticism that warrants a more elaborate response. It observes "that the mere fact that these four dissenters come up with three different standards – all of them different from the two proposed in Bandemer and the one proposed here by appellants – goes a long way to establishing that there is no constitutionally discernible standard." Ante, at 22-23.

Does it? The dissenting opinions recommend sets of standards that differ in certain respects. Members of a majority might well seek to reconcile such differences. But dissenters might instead believe that the more thorough, specific reasoning that accompanies separate statements will stimulate further discussion. And that discussion could lead to change in the law, where, as here, one member of the majority, disagreeing with the plurality as to justiciability, remains in search of appropriate standards. [See Kennedy, J., concurring in judgment].

In League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, discussed at § 20.4 n.62, Justice Kennedy joined with Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer to hold that one district in a Texas redistricting plan adopted in 2003 did have an impermissible effect of discriminating against Hispanic voters, and thus violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Dissenting from this conclusion, Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito, would have held that all the districts in the Texas redistricting plan were based upon political gerrymandering, and, as such, did not violate § 2’s concern with diluting minority voting strength. Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito indicated they took no position on whether political gerrymandering cases should always be viewed as political questions, as the 4-Justice plurality opinion had concluded in Vieth. Justices Scalia and Thomas held to their view in Vieth that such cases always are political questions. The Court had a chance to revisit this issue in Whitford v. Gill, 218 F. Supp. 3d 837 (2016) (2-1 decision by 3-judge district court) (Republican political gerrymandering in Wisconsin unconstitutional under test focusing on extent of “cracking,” dividing one party’s supporters so they fall short of being the majority in multiple districts, and “packing,” concentrating one party’s backers in a few districts they win by overwhelming majorities), cert. granted, 137 S. Ct. 2268 (2017) (judgment stayed pending review), but the case was remanded on standing grounds, as noted at § 3.3.5(E) n.52.

66 126 S. Ct. 2594, 2612-23 (2006); id. at 2652-53 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Alito, J., concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part, and dissenting in part); id. at 2663-69 (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., and joined in Part III by Roberts, C.J., and Alito, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part).
Nixon v. United States

Chief Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner Walter L. Nixon, Jr., asks this Court to decide whether Senate Rule XI, which allows a committee of Senators to hear evidence against an individual who has been impeached and to report that evidence to the full Senate, violates the Impeachment Trial Clause, Art. I, § 3, cl. 6. That Clause provides that the “Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments.” But before we reach the merits of such a claim, we must decide whether it is “justiciable,” that is, whether it is a claim that may be resolved by the courts. We conclude that it is not.

In this case, we must examine Art. I, § 3, cl. 6, to determine the scope of authority conferred upon the Senate by the Framers regarding impeachment. It provides: “The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.”

The language and structure of this Clause are revealing. The first sentence is a grant of authority to the Senate, and the word “sole” indicates that this authority is reposed in the Senate and nowhere else. The next two sentences specify requirements to which the Senate proceedings shall conform: The Senate shall be on oath or affirmation, a two-thirds vote is required to convict, and when the President is tried the Chief Justice shall preside.

Petitioner argues that the word “try” in the first sentence imposes by implication an additional requirement on the Senate in that the proceedings must be in the nature of a judicial trial. From there petitioner goes on to argue that this limitation precludes the Senate from delegating to a select committee the task of hearing the testimony of witnesses, as was done pursuant to Senate Rule XI. “‘Try’ means more than simply ‘vote on’ or ‘review’ or ‘judge.’ In 1787 and today, trying a case means hearing the evidence, not scanning a cold record.” Brief for Petitioner 25. Petitioner concludes . . . that courts may review whether or not the Senate “tried” him before convicting him.

There are several difficulties with this position which lead us ultimately to reject it. The word “try,” both in 1787 and later, has considerably broader meanings than those to which petitioner would limit it. Older dictionaries define try as “[t]o examine” or “[t]o examine as a judge.” See 2 S. Johnson, A Dictionary of the English Language (1785). In more modern usage the term has various meanings. For example, try can mean “to examine or investigate judicially,” “to conduct the trial of,” or “to put to the test by experiment, investigation, or trial.” Webster's Third New International Dictionary 2457 (1971). Petitioner submits that “try,” as contained in T. Sheridan, Dictionary of the English Language (1796), means “to examine as a judge; to bring before a judicial tribunal.” Based on the variety of definitions, however, we cannot say that the Framers used the word “try” as an implied limitation on the method by which the Senate might proceed . . . “As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require. . . .” Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 376 (1921).
The conclusion that the use of the word “try” in the first sentence of the Impeachment Trial Clause lacks sufficient precision to afford any judicially manageable standard of review of the Senate's actions is fortified by the existence of the three very specific requirements that the Constitution does impose on the Senate when trying impeachments: The Members must be under oath, a two-thirds vote is required to convict, and the Chief Justice presides when the President is tried. These limitations are quite precise, and their nature suggests that the Framers did not intend to impose additional limitations on the form of the Senate proceedings by the use of the word “try” in the first sentence.

Petitioner devotes only two pages in his brief to negating the significance of the word “sole” in the first sentence of Clause 6. As noted above, that sentence provides that “[t]he Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments.” We think that the word “sole” is of considerable significance. Indeed, the word “sole” appears only one other time in the Constitution—with respect to the House of Representatives’ “sole Power of Impeachment.” Art. I, § 2, cl. 5 (emphasis added). The commonsense meaning of the word “sole” is that the Senate alone shall have authority to determine whether an individual should be acquitted or convicted. The dictionary definition bears this out. “Sole” is defined as “having no companion,” “solitary,” “being the only one,” and “functioning . . . independently and without assistance or interference.” Webster's Third New International Dictionary 2168 (1971). If the courts may review the actions of the Senate in order to determine whether that body “tried” an impeached official, it is difficult to see how the Senate would be “functioning . . . independently and without assistance or interference.”

Nixon asserts that the word “sole” has no substantive meaning. To support this contention, he argues that the word is nothing more than a mere “cosmetic edit” added by the Committee of Style after the delegates had approved the substance of the Impeachment Trial Clause. There are two difficulties with this argument. First, accepting as we must the proposition that the Committee of Style had no authority from the Convention to alter the meaning of the Clause, see 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, p. 553 (M. Farrand ed. 1966) (hereinafter Farrand), we must presume that the Committee's reorganization or rephrasing accurately captured what the Framers meant in their unadorned language. See Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S., at 538-539. That is, we must presume that the Committee did its job. This presumption is buttressed by the fact that the Constitutional Convention voted on, and accepted, the Committee of Style's linguistic version. See 2 Farrand 663-667. We agree with the Government that “the word ‘sole’ is entitled to no less weight than any other word of the text, because the Committee revision perfected what ‘had been agreed to.’” Brief for Respondents 25. Second, carrying Nixon's argument to its logical conclusion would constrain us to say that the second to last draft would govern in every instance where the Committee of Style added an arguably substantive word. Such a result is at odds with the fact that the Convention passed the Committee's version, and with the well-established rule that the plain language of the enacted text is the best indicator of intent.

Petitioner also contends that the word “sole” should not bear on the question of justiciability because Art. II, § 2, cl. 1, of the Constitution grants the President pardon authority “except in Cases of Impeachment.” He argues that such a limitation on the President's pardon power would not have been necessary if the Framers thought that the Senate alone had authority to deal with such questions. But the granting of a pardon is in no sense an overturning of a judgment of conviction by some other tribunal; it is “[a]n executive action that mitigates or sets aside punishment for a crime.” Black's Law Dictionary 1113 (6th ed. 1990) (emphasis added). Authority in the Senate to determine procedures for trying an impeached official, unreviewable by the courts, is therefore not at all inconsistent with authority in the President to grant a pardon to the convicted official. The exception from the President's pardon authority of cases of impeachment was a separate determination by the Framers that executive clemency should not be available in such cases.

Petitioner finally argues that even if significance be attributed to the word “sole” in the first sentence of the Clause, the authority granted is to the Senate, and this means that “the Senate – not the courts, not a lay jury, not a Senate Committee – shall try impeachments.” Brief for Petitioner 42. It would be possible to read the first sentence of the Clause this way, but it is not a natural reading. Petitioner's interpretation would bring into judicial purview not merely the sort of claim made by petitioner, but other similar claims based on the conclusion that the word “Senate” has imposed by implication limitations on procedures which the Senate might adopt. Such limitations would be inconsistent with the construction of the Clause as a whole, which, as we have noted, sets out three express limitations in separate sentences.

The history and contemporary understanding of the impeachment provisions support our reading of the constitutional language. The parties do not offer evidence of a single word in the history of the Constitutional Convention or in contemporary commentary that even alludes to the possibility of judicial review in the context of the impeachment powers. See 290 U.S. App. D.C., at 424, 938 F.2d at 243; R. Berger, Impeachment: The Constitutional Problems 116 (1973). This silence is quite meaningful in light of the several explicit references to the availability of judicial review as a check on the Legislature's power with respect to bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and statutes. See The Federalist No. 78, p. 524 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (“Limitations ... can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of the courts of justice”).

Judicial involvement in impeachment proceedings, even if only for purposes of judicial review, is counterintuitive because it would eviscerate the “important constitutional check” placed on the Judiciary by the Framers. See id., No. 81, at 545. Nixon's argument would place final reviewing authority with respect to impeachments in the hands of the same body that the impeachment process is meant to regulate.

Nevertheless, Nixon argues that judicial review is necessary in order to place a check on the Legislature. Nixon fears that if the Senate is given unreviewable authority to interpret the Impeachment Trial Clause, there is a grave risk that the Senate will usurp judicial power. The Framers anticipated this objection and created two constitutional safeguards to keep the Senate in check. The first safeguard is that the whole of the impeachment power is divided between the two legislative bodies, with the House given the right to accuse and the Senate given the right to judge. Id., No. 66, at 446. This split of authority “avoids the inconvenience of making the same persons both accusers and judges; and guards against the danger of persecution from the prevalency of a factious spirit in either of those branches.” The second safeguard is the two-thirds supermajority vote requirement. Hamilton explained that “[a]s the concurrence of two-thirds of the senate will be requisite to a condemnation, the security to innocence, from this additional circumstance, will be as complete as itself can desire.” Ibid.

In addition to the textual commitment argument, we are persuaded that the lack of finality and the difficulty of fashioning relief counsel against justiciability. See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S., at 210. We agree with the Court of Appeals that opening the door of judicial review to the procedures used by the Senate in trying impeachments would “expose the political life of the country to months, or perhaps years, of chaos.” 290 U.S. App. D.C., at 427, 938 F.2d, at 246. This lack of finality would manifest itself most dramatically if the President were impeached. The legitimacy of any successor, and hence his effectiveness, would be impaired severely, not merely while the judicial process was running its course, but during any retrial that a differently constituted Senate might conduct if its first judgment of conviction were invalidated. Equally uncertain is the question of what relief a court may give other than simply setting aside the judgment of conviction. Could it order the reinstatement of a convicted federal judge, or order Congress to create an additional judgeship if the seat had been filled in the interim?

Justice STEVENS, concurring.

For me, the debate about the strength of the inferences to be drawn from the use of the words “sole” and “try” is far less significant than the central fact that the Framers decided to assign the impeachment power to the Legislative Branch. The disposition of the impeachment of Samuel Chase in 1805 demonstrated that the Senate is fully conscious of the profound importance of that assignment, and nothing in the subsequent history of the Senate's exercise of this extraordinary power suggests otherwise. See generally 3 A. Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall 169-222 (1919); W. Rehnquist, Grand Inquests 275-278 (1992). Respect for a coordinate branch of the Government forecloses any assumption that improbable hypotheticals like those mentioned by Justice White and Justice Souter will ever occur. Accordingly, the wise policy of judicial restraint, coupled with the potential anomalies associated with a contrary view, provide a sufficient justification for my agreement with the views of the Chief Justice.

Justice WHITE, with whom Justice BLACKMUN joins, concurring in the judgment.

Petitioner contends that the method by which the Senate convicted him on two articles of impeachment violates Art. I, § 3, cl. 6, of the Constitution, which mandates that the Senate “try” impeachments. The Court is of the view that the Constitution forbids us even to consider his contention. I find no such prohibition and would therefore reach the merits of the claim. I concur in the judgment because the Senate fulfilled its constitutional obligation to “try” petitioner.

It should be said at the outset that, as a practical matter, it will likely make little difference whether the Court's or my view controls this case. This is so because the Senate has very wide discretion in specifying impeachment trial procedures and because it is extremely unlikely that the Senate would abuse its discretion and insist on a procedure that could not be deemed a trial by reasonable judges. Even taking a wholly practical approach, I would prefer not to announce an unreviewable discretion in the Senate to ignore completely the constitutional direction to “try” impeachment cases. When asked at oral argument whether that direction would be satisfied if, after a House vote to impeach, the Senate, without any procedure whatsoever, unanimously found the accused guilty of being “a bad guy,” counsel for the United States answered that the Government's theory “leads me to answer that question yes.” Tr. of Oral Arg. 51. Especially in light of this advice from the Solicitor General, I would not issue an invitation to the Senate to find an excuse, in the name of other pressing business, to be dismissive of its critical role in the impeachment process.

The fact that Art. III, § 2, cl. 3, specifically exempts impeachment trials from the jury requirement provides some evidence that the Framers were anxious not to have additional specific procedural requirements read into the term “try.” Contemporaneous commentary further supports this view. Hamilton, for example, stressed that a trial by so large a body as the Senate (which at the time promised to boast 26 members) necessitated that the proceedings not “be tied down to . . . strict rules, either in the delineation of the offence by the prosecutors, or in the construction of it by the Judges. . . .” The Federalist No. 65, p. 441 (J. Cooke ed. 1961).

It is also noteworthy that the delegation of factfinding by judicial and quasi-judicial bodies was hardly unknown to the Framers. Jefferson, at least, was aware that the House of Lords sometimes delegated factfinding in impeachment trials to committees and recommended use of the same to the Senate. T. Jefferson, A Manual of Parliamentary Practice for the Use of the Senate of the United States § LIII (2d ed. 1812) (“The practice is to swear the witnesses in open House, and then examine them there: or a committee may be named, who shall examine them in committee . . .”), reprinted in Jefferson's Parliamentary Writings, The Papers of Thomas Jefferson, Second Series 424 (W. Howell ed. 1988).

In short, textual and historical evidence reveals that the Impeachment Trial Clause was not meant to bind the hands of the Senate beyond establishing a set of minimal procedures. Without identifying the exact contours of these procedures, it is sufficient to say that the Senate's use of a factfinding committee under Rule XI is entirely compatible with the Constitution's command that the Senate “try all impeachments.” Petitioner's challenge to his conviction must therefore fail.

Whatever considerations feature most prominently in a particular case, the political question doctrine is “essentially a function of the separation of powers,” existing to restrain courts “from inappropriate interference in the business of the other branches of Government,” United States v. Munoz-Flores, 495 U.S. 385, 394 (1990), and deriving in large part from prudential concerns about the respect we owe the political departments, see Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996, 1000 (1979) (Powell, J., concurring in judgment); A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 125-126 (2d ed. 1986); Finkelstein, Judicial Self-Limitation, 37 Harv.L.Rev. 338, 344-345 (1924). Not all interference is inappropriate or disrespectful, however, and application of the doctrine ultimately turns, as Learned Hand put it, on “how importunately the occasion demands an answer.” L. Hand, The Bill of Rights 15 (1958).
This occasion does not demand an answer. The Impeachment Trial Clause commits to the Senate “the sole Power to try all Impeachments,” subject to three procedural requirements: the Senate shall be on oath or affirmation; the Chief Justice shall preside when the President is tried; and conviction shall be upon the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 3, cl. 6. It seems fair to conclude that the Clause contemplates that the Senate may determine, within broad boundaries, such subsidiary issues as the procedures for receipt and consideration of evidence necessary to satisfy its duty to “try” impeachments. Other significant considerations confirm a conclusion that this case presents a nonjusticiable political question: the “unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made,” as well as “the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.” Baker, supra, 369 U.S., at 217. As the Court observes, judicial review of an impeachment trial would under the best of circumstances entail significant disruption of government.

One can, nevertheless, envision different and unusual circumstances that might justify a more searching review of impeachment proceedings. If the Senate were to act in a manner seriously threatening the integrity of its results, convicting, say, upon a coin toss, or upon a summary determination that an officer of the United States was simply “a bad guy,” (White, J., concurring in judgment), judicial interference might well be appropriate. In such circumstances, the Senate's action might be so far beyond the scope of its constitutional authority, and the consequent impact on the Republic so great, as to merit a judicial response despite the prudential concerns that would ordinarily counsel silence. “The political question doctrine, a tool for maintenance of governmental order, will not be so applied as to promote only disorder.” Baker, supra, at 215.

For reasons of "comity" and respect for state courts reflected in the dual theory of sovereignty, often-termed “Our Federalism,” as well as a reluctance to grant an equitable remedy where there is an adequate legal remedy, the Court held in Younger v. Harris that federal courts should not enjoin pending state criminal prosecutions where the defendant seeks to invalidate on its face the law under which the action was brought. The Court said that at least where the state has not brought the action in bad faith, the burden of continued defense is not ordinarily "irreparable injury." In Hicks v. Miranda, this principle was extended to a criminal case where the state proceeding was brought after the federal case had been filed, but before the federal court had reached the merits of the case.

The Younger abstention doctrine was extended to civil cases in Trainor v. Hernandez. That case involved the important state interests of the constitutionality of a state attachment proceeding used by the state to recover welfare payments allegedly wrongfully paid. In Middlesex County Ethics Commission v. Garden State Bar Association, a case involving a state bar disciplinary hearing, the Court phrased the relevant questions for purposes of Younger abstention as whether: (1) there is an ongoing state judicial proceeding; (2) do the proceedings implicate important state interests; and (3) is there an adequate opportunity in the state proceedings to raise constitutional challenges.

In Pennzoil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., the Supreme Court went further to hold that even where the state is not a party a federal court should not enjoin a pending state civil proceeding if important state interests call for "comity." Reversing the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which had enjoined Pennzoil from executing on a $12 billion judgment of a Texas trial court for tortious interference with a contract, the Supreme Court said that Texas had an interest in enforcing its own orders and judgments, and plaintiffs were unable to show that state procedural law barred presentation of its federal claims. Justice Brennan, concurring, urged the Court not to abstain in civil cases, especially § 1983 actions, saying that Texas had only a small interest in such litigation.

A second kind of abstention is Pullman abstention. The Court held in Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co. that federal courts should abstain from granting an equitable injunction if unresolved federal issues depend on the meaning of unclear state law, considering the degree of uncertainty and the delay and expense that will result from an injunction, and to avoid an unnecessary decision of constitutional questions. Justice Blackmun indicated in Pennzoil that he thought that case was appropriate for Pullman abstention, as did Justice Marshall, who noted the federal action was essentially an appeal from a state court judgment with a constitutional claim intertwined with the merits. Of course, if the meaning of a state statute is clear, or the state law is otherwise settled by state court precedents, or the injunction would be proper to grant under any possible interpretation of the state statute, then Pullman abstention does not apply.

Pullman abstention was extended in Louisiana Power & Light Co. v. City of Thibodaux to involve abstention in a state eminent domain proceeding, which though not formally an equitable 71 481 U.S. 1, 10-17 (1987); id. at 19 (Brennan, J., concurring). On Younger abstention in civil cases, see also Gilbertson v. Albright, 381 F.3d 965, 968 (9th Cir. 2004) (en banc opinion) (Younger principles apply in civil cases to actions at law for damages, because a determination that the party’s rights have been violated would have the same effect as a declaration or injunction on pending state proceedings. However, federal courts should not dismiss actions where damages are at issue; rather, damages actions should be stayed until the state proceedings are completed).

72 Pullman, 312 U.S. 496, 501-02 (1941); Pennzoil, 481 U.S. at 29 (Blackmun, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 23 (Marshall, J., concurring in the judgment).

proceeding, raised the same issue of respect for “comity” and “state sovereignty.” Professors Nowak and Rotunda have noted that it is “more precise to speak of Pullman deferral, to emphasize that Pullman recognizes that federal courts should not prematurely resolve the constitutionality of a state statute,” but that “the term ‘abstention’ is used too often that it is fruitless to insist on a change.”

A third kind of abstention, Burford abstention, applies when on-going state administrative action or state court litigation would help resolve difficult questions of state law and state needs for uniformity caution against federal resolution of the case. The Court noted that in Burford v. Sun Oil Co. that this kind of abstention should be rare, and only applies where the relief sought is equitable. Under Burford, a federal court has no right to stay or dismiss, or remand to state court, a damage action properly brought in federal court.

A fourth kind of abstention is the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. Based on Rooker v. Fidelity Trust Co. and District of Columbia Court of Appeals v. Feldman, the Rooker-Feldman doctrine bars a losing party in a state court from seeking what in substance would be appellate review of the state judgment in a United States district court, based on the losing party’s claim that the state judgment itself violated the loser’s federal rights. As phrased, the doctrine naturally does not apply to a federal suit brought by a non-party to the state suit. As applied by some lower federal courts to bar district court review even when the issue “had not been raised in state court, but could have been,” the doctrine has been criticized as limiting federal jurisdiction even for federal question cases merely because litigation on “inextricably intertwined” issues was begun first in a state court.

In Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Industries Corp., the Court limited the Rooker-Feldman doctrine to its core facts. The case involved a situation in which Saudi Basic Industries (SBI) had filed an action against Exxon in a state court and Exxon had then filed an action in federal court for damages against SBI, not in an attempt to overturn any judgment entered by state court, but to protect itself in the event it lost in the state court on grounds, such as the state statute of limitations, which would not preclude relief in the federal venue. The state court in fact entered a substantial judgment for Exxon. Before the state court trial, SBI moved the federal court to dismiss Exxon’s action. The Third Circuit dismissed on Rooker-Feldman grounds, but the Supreme Court held in a unanimous opinion that properly invoked federal jurisdiction does not vanish merely because a state court reaches judgment on the same or a related question while the case remains under consideration in a federal court. Exxon was not attempting to overturn any state court judgment.

Of course, as the Court noted in Saudi Basic Industries, disposition of the federal action, once the state-court adjudication is complete, would be governed by preclusion law. As the Court noted, “The Full Faith and Credit Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1738, originally enacted in 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122, requires the federal court to ‘give the same preclusive effect to a state-court judgment as another court of that State would give.’ . . . . In parallel litigation, a federal court may be bound to recognize the claim- and issue-preclusive effects of a state-court judgment, but federal jurisdiction over an action does not terminate automatically on the entry of judgment in the state court.”

Because of the Full Faith and Credit Act, parties may not relitigate in federal court an issue that has previously been resolved by state courts of competent jurisdiction. For example, in San Remo Hotel, L.P. v. City and County of San Francisco a party sought to litigate a federal claim under the Takings Clause that was not ripe until the entry of a final state judgment denied just compensation. The federal court applied Pullman abstention, saying the claim was not ripe until the government entity charged with implementing the state regulations had reached a final decision regarding the application of the regulations to the property at issue, as held in Williamson County Regional Planning Commission v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson County.

Back in the state court, the plaintiffs argued the takings issue in their mandamus suit, and lost. They then returned to federal court, saying their case was now ripe. Justice Stevens wrote for a majority that interests in finality trumped the interest in giving a losing litigant access to an additional tribunal, particularly since they were not required to litigate the takings issue fully in the state court. Chief Justice Rehnquist, with Justices O’Connor, Kennedy, and Thomas, concurred in the judgment but expressed the opinion that Williamson County should be reconsidered because the Court should rethink whether plaintiffs asserting a Fifth Amendment takings claim based on the final decision of a state or local government entity must first seek compensation in state courts. The Chief Justice noted the Williamson County rule had the practical effect that litigants who go to state court to seek compensation will likely be unable later to assert their takings claims in federal court.

PART II: THE LEGISLATIVE POWER

CHAPTER 5: OVERVIEW OF FEDERAL LEGISLATIVE POWER

§ 5.1 Introduction to Federal Legislative Power ..................................................... 207

§ 5.2 Political and Legal Background for McCulloch v. Maryland .................... 213

§ 5.3 The Leading Case on Legislative Power: McCulloch v. Maryland .......... 216

§ 5.4 The Federal Commerce Clause Power as Originally Understood .......... 230

§ 5.1 Introduction to Federal Legislative Power

The Preamble to the Constitution announced the broad purposes for which the Constitution was framed. It states: “We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.”

In his 1953 treatise, POLITICS AND THE CONSTITUTION, Professor Crosskey argued that since the Preamble covers virtually all the subjects for which a government might regulate, the Constitution must have been intended to create plenary power in the federal government, subject to limitations on power indicated by clear constitutional text. In his 1833 COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, Justice Story discussed more limited inferences to be drawn from the Preamble, stating that the Preamble’s “true office is to expound the nature and extent and application of the powers actually conferred by the Constitution, and not substantively to create them.” Justice Story then indicated, consistent with a natural law focus on interpreting provisions in light of their “purpose” and “mischiefs to be remedied,” how each of the various clauses of the Preamble were

2 JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES § 459 (1833).

3 The classic formulation of natural law interpretation in light of the “mischief to be remedied” occurred in Heydon's Case, 76 Eng. Rptr. 637, 638 (1584), where Lord Coke said that a judge should inquire into the "mischief and defect" that the drafter was seeking to remedy and "the true reason for the remedy," and the judge should "make such construction as shall suppress the mischief, advance the remedy, and to suppress subtle invention and evasions for continuance of the mischief . . . and to add force to the cure and remedy, according to the true intent of makers of the act."
related to various mischiefs which had arisen under the Articles of Confederation that needed to be remedied. 4

Perhaps the most important single section of the Constitution is Article I, § 8, the enumeration of congressional powers. It begins with the phrase, "The Congress shall have Power," and then continues in clauses 1-17 to list powers, concluding in clause 18 with the Necessary and Proper Clause. That clause provides Congress has the power “To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.”

The greatest constitutional struggles in the first 150 years of our Nation, apart from the related question of secession, were fought over the meaning of three of the provisions in Article I, § 8: clause 1, the General Welfare Clause; clause 3, the Commerce Clause; and clause 18, the Necessary and Proper Clause. As indicated at § 1.2 n.23, early American politics was driven by: (1) economic policy, particularly regarding tariffs and the protection of manufacturing from foreign competition; (2) slavery and the racial problems that developed in the aftermath of slavery; and (3) the role of the federal government, as opposed to state governments, in promoting economic activity generally.

Clause 1 of Article I, § 8, which includes the General Welfare Clause, provides: “The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States, but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.” There are at least three ways that one could read this Clause:

1. The narrowest view, espoused originally by Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, was that it granted a power to tax and spend only with respect to the specifically enumerated legislative powers listed in the remaining 17 clauses of § 8. 5

2. Alexander Hamilton wrote that it granted a power to levy taxes generally, and an independent power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare – in short, a general spending power. Justice Story agreed with this view in his 1833 work, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. 6

Rev. 117 (1990).

6 Id. at 401-03, discussing, inter alia, JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES §§ 984-88 (1833).
(3) The broadest interpretation of this Clause is that it grants plenary power to Congress to legislate on any matter, through regulation or by spending, as part of a plenary power to levy taxes, pay debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.8

In his treatise, POLITICS AND THE CONSTITUTION, Professor Crosskey concluded that the correct view was the third, or broadest, view. Responding to the argument that under this view the rest of the enumeration of powers in Article I, § 8 would be superfluous, he said that the primary purpose of the rest of § 8 was not to give the federal government power, but to allocate power and insure that a number of powers which historically, and according to Blackstone, belonged to the executive branch in England, the King, were transferred to the legislative branch.8

This broader view has never been adopted by the Supreme Court. Instead, in cases like United States v. Butler, Stewart Machine Co. v. Davis, and Helvering v. Davis,9 the Supreme Court has adopted the second view of Hamilton and Story that the General Welfare Clause is a general grant of power to tax and spend, but that congressional power to regulate must be found in one of the remaining clauses of Article I, § 8. Some commentators have argued based on text, context, and history for the first, narrower view of Jefferson and Madison.10

The Commerce Clause, Article I, § 8, cl. 3, provides that Congress has the power “to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.” The main points of contention in interpreting the Commerce Clause have been: (1) what constitutes “commerce”; and (2) how to interpret the phrase “among the several States.” Regarding the first

I, § 8 that would have raised a concern with the King’s prerogatives in England: those powers carried over from the Articles of Confederation, the power to coin money, cl.5; to punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, cl. 10; and to declare war and grant letters of marque and reprisal, cl. 11; and, among new powers for Congress, to provide copyright-patent protection, cl. 8; to create lower federal courts, cl. 9; to punish for violations of the Law of Nations, cl. 10; to raise and support the military, and provide for their regulation, training, and discipline, cls. 12-16; and to exercise exclusive legislation over the Nation’s capitol, cl. 17).
9 See United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 65-68 (1936) (the General Welfare Clause provides for general taxing and spending power, consistent with Hamilton’s and Story’s views, but the Clause does not given Congress the power to regulate); Charles C. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548, 581-83 (1937) (social security tax on employers and unemployment compensation scheme constitutional under the General Welfare Clause); Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619, 640-46 (1937) (social security pension scheme constitutional under the General Welfare Clause).
issue, the question involves whether “commerce” has a limited meaning, restricted mostly to buying and selling, and thus not covering activities such as manufacturing, mining, or agriculture, or does “commerce” have a broader meaning, encompassing all forms of economic commercial activity. Regarding the second issue, the question involves whether “among” means “between,” so that only interstate commerce can be regulated by Congress, or does “among” include commerce carried on within a state, interpreting "States" in a collective fashion, so that any commerce carried on within the United States is commerce “among” the States.

The Court has settled on the broader meaning of “commerce” to include all forms of economic activity, but on the more limited interpretation of “among” meaning "between." However, the Court has held consistently since 1937 that congressional power under the Commerce Clause extends to any subject which, in the aggregate, “substantially affects” interstate commerce between the states.11

Notes on the Constitutional Convention do not authoritatively resolve the scope of the General Welfare Clause or the Commerce Clause. However, they do suggest that the drafters intended for the federal government to have considerable power. The backdrop to the Constitutional Convention was the view that the Articles of Confederation, which had been adopted in 1781, did not give the federal government sufficient power. Although both the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution represented federal systems of government broadly consistent with a “confederate republic” model of government, under the Articles there was no federal power to tax, no federal executive branch, no federal judiciary, and no federal power to prevent protectionist legislation passed by various states after the end of the Revolutionary War in 1783, when a deep recession in 1784-85, caused in part by England closing markets and limiting importation of American goods into England in retaliation for losing the Revolutionary War, prompted state protectionism in response. Such protectionist legislation, passed by states to protect their own state’s commerce from competition, had the effect of retarding economic growth in the United States generally.12

Faced with this reality, a meeting in Annapolis, Maryland was called and held in the summer of 1786, particularly to focus on the need to amend the Articles to deal with this economic problem and provide for “uniform rules regarding trade.” Although only 5 States sent delegates – New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia – the problems raised at that meeting convinced the participants, including James Madison and Alexander Hamilton, to petition the states for a broader Constitutional Convention the following year. This led to the Constitutional Convention in 1787 in Philadelphia, which framed the current United States Constitution.13

On May 29, 1787, Mr. Randolph opened the Convention by noting a number of defects in the existing Articles of Confederation: there was no security against foreign invasion, there were quarrels between the states, a need for commercial regulations, and a need to make the federal government paramount over state constitutions.\textsuperscript{14}

An early proposal, on May 31, was that the national legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the Confederation; and moreover to legislate in all cases to which the separate states are incompetent or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation. The "incompetent" clause was objected to as too vague and taking too much from the states. Madison favored an enumeration, but wanted to insure a government that would provide for the safety, liberty, and happiness of the community. Despite this objection, the delegates approved the May 31 proposition 9-0-1.\textsuperscript{15}

On July 17, a substitute was introduced by Mr. Sherman to give Congress the power to legislate in all cases which may concern the common interests of the Union, but not to interfere with matters of the internal police of the states. Clearly this was an attempt to narrow the power of Congress. Gouvernor Morris, who was the floor leader for the Northern States, opposed the motion, saying that the internal police ought to be infringed in many cases. Sherman's motion lost by 8 to 2. The framers then approved a motion, seconded by Morris, to add a clause on legislating for the general interests of the union. As amended, the proposition gave Congress power to make laws binding on the people of the United States in all cases which may concern the common interests of the Union and, moreover, to legislate in all cases for the general interests of the Union and also in those to which the states are separately incompetent or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation. This passed 8 to 2.\textsuperscript{16}

A Committee of Detail was appointed on July 24 to report a Constitution conformable to Resolutions passed by the Convention. On August 6, the Committee on Detail reported its work as "conformable to the Resolutions passed by the Convention."\textsuperscript{17} Thus, there was no indication in its report that the enumeration was intended to limit the power of Congress in ways not authorized by the initial set of resolutions.

The report looks like the Constitution which ultimately passed, except there was no General Welfare Clause. A debate developed in which Northerners expressed their opposition to the slave trade and Southerners were concerned that the commerce power might be used to interfere with slavery. In order to avoid having the whole convention break down on this issue, a special committee of 11 was appointed on August 22. On August 24, the Committee, avoiding use of the word “slaves,” recommended that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1800. On August 25, that language was amended so the bar extended to 1808. Southerners appear to have thought that by then they would have a majority in the House and thus could protect slavery from federal action.

On September 4, the same committee of 11, to whom a number of policy resolutions had been referred, recommended that the clause empowering Congress to levy taxes be amended by adding the Common Defense and General Welfare Clause. This was approved, apparently without debate. Also, "and with the Indian tribes" was added to the Commerce Clause.19

On September 12, the Committee of Style reported a full draft of the proposed Constitution, according to the above decisions. Then, on September 14, the clause "but all such Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," was unanimously added after the General Welfare Clause.21 The fact that the Uniformity Clause limitation on the taxing power was added at the last minute, independent of the General Welfare Clause, lends some credence to Alexander Hamilton's theory, adopted by Supreme Court majorities, that the General Welfare Clause was intended by the framers to be an independent substantive grant of legislative power, rather than included as part of limiting the taxing power, as is the Uniformity Clause. In contrast, Jefferson and Madison had argued that the "general welfare" language was merely part of limiting the taxing power to being able to tax only “in order” to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, general welfare being defined by the enumerated legislative powers listed in the remaining 17 clauses of § 8.

The fact that the South did not have a majority in the House of Representatives by 1808 led to a long battle by Southern interests to limit the commerce power of Congress. This battle was resisted by Chief Justice Marshall and the Marshall Court in terms of constitutional doctrine, but Southerners were remarkably successful for a long time in terms of actual legislative action. While during the formalist era (1873-1937), the Supreme Court adopted doctrines significantly limiting the power of Congress or states to regulate commercial activity as part of a Republican pro-business majority on the Supreme Court, under modern Supreme Court doctrine Congress and states can legislate in economic matters in almost all cases for the general interests of the Nation.

In 1791, a debate arose involving the constitutionality of Congress creating a national bank. President Washington’s Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, counseled Washington that incorporating a bank was not authorized by any specific language in the Constitution. As a strong proponent of states’ rights, Jefferson also believed a national bank was not a good idea in practice. President Washington’s Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, counseled Washington on why the bank bill was constitutional and prudent. Among other members of Washington’s Cabinet, Washington’s Attorney General, Edmund Randolph, sided with Jefferson on the constitutional issue, although Randolph did not join Jefferson in criticizing the bank on policy grounds.22 Congress, in passing the bill, and Washington, in signing it, sided with Hamilton, creating the First National Bank of the United States, with a 20-year charter, from 1791-1811.

When that charter ran out, Congress did not re-authorize the bank. As a competitor to existing state banks of the time, the National Bank was not favored by states’ rights advocates. The difficulties generated by not having a national bank during the War of 1812, however, in terms of not having a central repository for tax receipts, nor a central location from which army and navy personnel could be paid, persuaded the Congress, and President Madison, to authorize a Second National Bank of the United States in 1816, pursuant to a new 20-year charter, from 1816-1836. Congress, in fact, had been persuaded of the need for a bank by 1814, but Madison vetoed the bank bill at that time, although not on constitutional grounds, but on grounds of public policy that the bill did not address reviving the public credit or aiding the treasury in collecting taxes.23

Following chartering of the Second National Bank in 1816, Maryland imposed a tax on notes issued by any branch of the bank located in Maryland. When the cashier of the Baltimore branch refused to pay the tax, Maryland brought suit to recover a forfeit for issuing notes on unstamped paper. The trial court awarded judgment for plaintiff and the Maryland Court of Appeals affirmed. Thus, there was a clash between state interests and those of the United States. Specifically, the issues were whether Congress had the power to create such a bank, and the right of the Maryland to tax it.24 Marshall's opinion in 1819 in McCulloch v. Maryland, sustaining federal power to incorporate a bank, and protecting it from state taxation, has had more long-lasting influence than any other decision in constitutional law except, perhaps, Marbury v. Madison. Regarding the bank itself, in 1836, President Jackson vetoed an attempt to reauthorize the Second National Bank. There was no centralized money or banking system until the National Banking Act of 1863 began the process of replacing state bank notes and gold and silver coinage in circulation with the federal dollar (gold, silver, or paper greenbacks) as the currency of the United States. The Federal Reserve Act of 1913 created the Federal Reserve System, which remains the banking system of the United States today.\textsuperscript{25}

The most fruitful way to consider \textit{McCulloch} is to focus on the process of reasoning that Chief Justice Marshall used to consider the problem. Among the possible sources of text, context, history, practice, and precedent, Chief Justice Marshall first discussed the arguments of practice and precedent, viewing them as the strongest arguments to uphold the constitutionality of the Bank. Regarding arguments of legislative and executive practice, Marshall noted, “It has been truly said, that this can scarcely be considered as an open question, entirely unprejudiced by the former proceedings of the Nation respecting it. The principle now contested was introduced at a very early period of our history, [and] has been recognized by many successive legislatures.” Indeed, Marshall noted, “The bill for incorporating the bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood, and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast [Ed.: that is, President Washington], it became a law.” Regarding arguments of precedent, Marshall noted that the principle that the Bank is a constitutionally valid institution “has been acted upon by the judicial department, in cases of peculiar delicacy, as a law of undoubted obligation.”\textsuperscript{26}

These arguments of practice and precedent had convinced at least one prominent figure, James Madison, that such a bank was constitutional. As President, Madison had signed the legislation creating the Second National Bank in 1816, despite the fact that Madison had opposed the First National Bank in 1791 as unconstitutional, agreeing then with Jefferson’s arguments on the lack of any specific textual support in Article I, § 8 for incorporating a bank. In his signing letter for the bill, which explained why he thought the bill was constitutional in 1816, Madison noted this was based upon "repeated recognitions under varied circumstances of the validity of such an institution, in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of a concurrence of the general will of the nation."\textsuperscript{27}

Alternatively, it could be argued that Madison’s change of heart regarding the bank’s constitutionality was based only on Madison changing his view on the “necessity” of the national bank, given his experience during the War of 1812, and thus Madison’s change was consistent with a fixed, \textit{static} view of constitutional interpretation merely interpreting in light of new knowledge what is “necessary” under the “Necessary and Proper Clause.” However, that is not the reason Madison gave in his letter signing the bank bill, which, as noted above, focused on later legislative, executive, judicial, and social practice. Nor is it consistent with Madison’s support throughout his life that such later action (“usus”) can fix the meaning of the Constitution. James Madison “consistently thought that ‘usus,’ the exposition of the Constitution provided by actual governmental practice and judicial precedents, could ‘settle the meaning and the intention of the authors.’”28 Indeed, Madison noted about constitutional interpretation, “[T]he early, deliberate, and continued practice under the Constitution, as preferable to constructions adapted on the spur of occasions, and subject to the vicissitudes of party or personal ascendencies” is relevant in determining constitutional meaning.29

Regarding arguments of text, context, and history, Chief Justice John Marshall began by looking to arguments of purpose, related provisions, and general history. He reasoned that the people had created a government of limited and enumerated powers, but supreme in its sphere of action. Marshall noted the Constitution was not drafted by the framers as a detailed Code. Marshall stated, “A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. . . . Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.”30

In addition, Marshall compared the related provision in the Articles of Confederation, which excluded implied powers by stating that the powers had to be “expressly delegated” to the Continental Congress, with the 10th Amendment, which states only that powers have to be “delegated” to the federal government, and does not require that they be “expressly delegated.” Indeed, the drafters of the 10th Amendment specifically rejected adding the words “express” to the 10th Amendment.31 Based on the comparison of the enacted text of the two documents, Marshall concluded that the Constitution does not exclude incidental or implied powers. In particular, Marshall noted that the means for executing the “great powers,” which he referred to as “ample powers on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends,” were not enumerated in the Constitution, but were intended to be ample for executing the federal government’s powers, including the powers to levy taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, declare and conduct war, and raise armies and navies.\textsuperscript{32}

Regarding what means could be implied to advance such governmental powers, Marshall stated that the Necessary and Proper Clause gives Congress the power to adopt means conducive to legitimate ends because "necessary" often imports "useful," not “absolute necessity,” as argued by Maryland, and the Constitution, meant to endure for ages and not to be a legal code, was intended to be adapted to various crises. Again, Marshall resorted to arguments of related provisions. The framers had used the phrase “absolutely necessary” in Article I, § 10, cl. 2 of the Constitution regarding preventing states from imposing duties on imports or exports, “except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws,” but did not use a similar phrase in Article I, § 8, cl. 18. Furthermore, as a structural matter, the Necessary and Proper Clause is placed among the grants of legislative power in Article I, § 8, and not among limitations upon those powers listed in Article I, § 9. Therefore, Marshall concluded, consistent with the natural law focus on both literal text (letter) and purpose (spirit), “Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional.”\textsuperscript{33}

Marshall continued his opinion in \textit{McCulloch} by saying that all questions about the degree of necessity for choosing a means are for the legislature. It is sufficient that the law be “appropriate,” or “plainly adapted to that end,” and Marshall concluded that “none can deny it [the bank] being an appropriate measure” to aid in the collection and expenditure of revenue to facilitate the execution of various great objects of government.\textsuperscript{34}

\section{The Leading Case on Legislative Power: \textit{McCulloch} v. Maryland}

\textit{McCulloch v. Maryland}

Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court.

In the case now to be determined, the defendant, a sovereign State, denies the obligation of a law enacted by the legislature of the Union, and the plaintiff, on his part, contests the validity of an act which has been passed by the legislature of that State. The constitution of our country, in its most interesting and vital parts, is to be considered; the conflicting powers of the government of the Union and of its members, as marked in that constitution, are to be discussed; and an opinion given, which may essentially influence the great operations of the government. No tribunal can approach such a question without a deep sense of its importance, and of the awful responsibility involved in its decision. But it must be decided peacefully, or remain a source of hostile legislation, perhaps of hostility of a still more serious nature; and if it is to be so decided, by this tribunal alone can the decision be made. On the Supreme Court of the United States has the constitution of our country devolved this important duty.

The first question made in the cause is, has Congress power to incorporate a bank?

It has been truly said, that this can scarcely be considered as an open question, entirely unprejudiced by the former proceedings of the nation respecting it. The principle now contested was introduced at a very early period of our history, has been recognised by many successive legislatures, and has been acted upon by the judicial department, in cases of peculiar delicacy, as a law of undoubted obligation.

It will not be denied, that a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after an acquiescence still longer and more complete than this. But it is conceived that a doubtful question, one on which human reason may pause, and the human judgment be suspended, in the decision of which the great principles of liberty are not concerned, but the respective powers of those who are equally the representatives of the people, are to be adjusted; if not put at rest by the practice of the government, ought to receive a considerable impression from that practice. An exposition of the constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded.

The power now contested was exercised by the first Congress elected under the present constitution. The bill for incorporating the bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood, and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast, it became a law. The original act was permitted to expire; but a short experience of the embarrassments to which the refusal to revive it exposed the government, convinced those who were most prejudiced against the measure of its necessity, and induced the passage of the present law. It would require no ordinary share of intrepidity to assert that a measure adopted under these circumstances was a bold and plain usurpation, to which the constitution gave no countenance.

These observations belong to the cause; but they are not made under the impression that, were the question entirely new, the law would be found irreconcilable with the constitution.

In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent States. The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the States, who alone are truly sovereign; and must be exercised in subordination to the States, who alone possess supreme dominion.
It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The Convention which framed the constitution was indeed elected by the State legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation, or pretensions to it. It was reported to the then existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might "be submitted to a Convention of Delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification." This mode of proceeding was adopted; and by the Convention, by Congress, and by the State Legislatures, the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in Convention. It is true, they assembled in their several States — and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their States. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people themselves, or become the measures of the State governments.

From these Conventions the constitution derives its whole authority. The government proceeds directly from the people; is "ordained and established" in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity." The assent of the States, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a Convention, and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negatived, by the State governments. The constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the State sovereignties.

It has been said, that the people had already surrendered all their powers to the State sovereignties, and had nothing more to give. But, surely, the question whether they may resume and modify the powers granted to government does not remain to be settled in this country. Much more might the legitimacy of the general government be doubted, had it been created by the States. The powers delegated to the State sovereignties were to be exercised by themselves, not by a distinct and independent sovereignty, created by themselves. To the formation of a league, such as was the confederation, the State sovereignties were certainly competent. But when, "in order to form a more perfect union," it was deemed necessary to change this alliance into an effective government, possessing great and sovereign powers, and acting directly on the people, the necessity of referring it to the people, and of deriving its powers directly from them, was felt and acknowledged by all.

The government of the Union, then, (whatever may be the influence of this fact on the case,) is, emphatically, and truly, a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit.

This government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted, is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist.

In discussing these questions, the conflicting powers of the general and State governments must be brought into view, and the supremacy of their respective laws, when they are in opposition, must be settled.

If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this – that the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one State may be willing to control its operations, no State is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason: the people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof," "shall be the supreme law of the land," and by requiring that the members of the State legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the States, shall take the oath of fidelity to it.

The government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the constitution, form the supreme law of the land, "any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Among the enumerated powers, we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the articles of confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that every thing granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word "expressly," and declares only that the powers "not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people;" thus leaving the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the articles of confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American constitution, is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language. Why else were some of the limitations, found in the ninth section of the 1st article, introduced? It is also, in some degree, warranted by their having omitted to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation. In considering this question, then, we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding.
Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word "bank" or "incorporation," we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are entrusted to its government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance, merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may with great reason be contended, that a government, entrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends, must also be entrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the nation to facilitate its execution. It can never be their interest, and cannot be presumed to have been their intention, to clog and embarrass its execution by withholding the most appropriate means.

Throughout this vast republic, from the St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, revenue is to be collected and expended, armies are to be marched and supported. The exigencies of the nation may require that the treasure raised in the north should be transported to the south, that raised in the east conveyed to the west, or that this order should be reversed. Is that construction of the constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive? Can we adopt that construction, (unless the words imperiously require it,) which would impute to the framers of that instrument, when granting these powers for the public good, the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means? If, indeed, such be the mandate of the constitution, we have only to obey; but that instrument does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed; nor does it prohibit the creation of a corporation, if the existence of such a being be essential to the beneficial exercise of those powers. It is, then, the subject of fair inquiry, how far such means may be employed.

It is not denied, that the powers given to the government imply the ordinary means of execution. That, for example, of raising revenue, and applying it to national purposes, is admitted to imply the power of conveying money from place to place, as the exigencies of the nation may require, and of employing the usual means of conveyance. But it is denied that the government has its choice of means; or, that it may employ the most convenient means, if, to employ them, it be necessary to erect a corporation.

On what foundation does this argument rest? On this alone: The power of creating a corporation, is one appertaining to sovereignty, and is not expressly conferred on Congress. This is true. But all legislative powers appertain to sovereignty. The original power of giving the law on any subject whatever, is a sovereign power; and if the government of the Union is restrained from creating a corporation, as a means for performing its functions, on the single reason that the creation of a corporation is an act of sovereignty; if the sufficiency of this reason be acknowledged, there would be some difficulty in sustaining the authority of Congress to pass other laws for the accomplishment of the same objects.

The government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception.
The creation of a corporation, it is said, appertains to sovereignty. This is admitted. But to what portion of sovereignty does it appertain? Does it belong to one more than to another? In America, the powers of sovereignty are divided between the government of the Union, and those of the States. They are each sovereign, with respect to the objects committed to it, and neither sovereign with respect to the objects committed to the other. We cannot comprehend that train of reasoning which would maintain, that the extent of power granted by the people is to be ascertained, not by the nature and terms of the grant, but by its date. Some State constitutions were formed before, some since that of the United States. We cannot believe that their relation to each other is in any degree dependent upon this circumstance. Their respective powers must, we think, be precisely the same as if they had been formed at the same time. Had they been formed at the same time, and had the people conferred on the general government the power contained in the constitution, and on the States the whole residuum of power, would it have been asserted that the government of the Union was not sovereign with respect to those objects which were entrusted to it, in relation to which its laws were declared to be supreme? If this could not have been asserted, we cannot well comprehend the process of reasoning which maintains, that a power appertaining to sovereignty cannot be connected with that vast portion of it which is granted to the general government, so far as it is calculated to subserve the legitimate objects of that government. The power of creating a corporation, though appertaining to sovereignty, is not, like the power of making war, or levying taxes, or of regulating commerce, a great substantive and independent power, which cannot be implied as incidental to other powers, or used as a means of executing them. It is never the end for which other powers are exercised, but a means by which other objects are accomplished. No contributions are made to charity for the sake of an incorporation, but a corporation is created to administer the charity; no seminary of learning is instituted in order to be incorporated, but the corporate character is conferred to subserve the purposes of education. No city was ever built with the sole object of being incorporated, but is incorporated as affording the best means of being well governed. The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is, therefore, perceived, why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given, if it be a direct mode of executing them.

But the constitution of the United States has not left the right of Congress to employ the necessary means, for the execution of the powers conferred on the government, to general reasoning. To its enumeration of powers is added that of making "all laws which shall be necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department thereof."

The counsel for the State of Maryland have urged various arguments, to prove that this clause, though in terms a grant of power, is not so in effect; but is really restrictive of the general right, which might otherwise be implied, of selecting means for executing the enumerated powers.

In support of this proposition, they have found it necessary to contend, that this clause was inserted for the purpose of conferring on Congress the power of making laws. That, without it, doubts might be entertained, whether Congress could exercise its powers in the form of legislation.
But could this be the object for which it was inserted? A government is created by the people, having legislative, executive, and judicial powers. Its legislative powers are vested in a Congress, which is to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. Each house may determine the rule of its proceedings; and it is declared that every bill which shall have passed both houses, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States. The 7th section describes the course of proceedings, by which a bill shall become a law; and, then, the 8th section enumerates the powers of Congress. Could it be necessary to say, that a legislature should exercise legislative powers, in the shape of legislation? After allowing each house to prescribe its own course of proceeding, after describing the manner in which a bill should become a law, would it have entered into the mind of a single member of the Convention, that an express power to make laws was necessary to enable the legislature to make them? That a legislature, endowed with legislative powers, can legislate, is a proposition too self-evident to have been questioned.

But the argument on which most reliance is placed, is drawn from the peculiar language of this clause. Congress is not empowered by it to make all laws, which may have relation to the powers conferred on the government, but such only as may be "necessary and proper" for carrying them into execution. The word "necessary," is considered as controlling the whole sentence, and as limiting the right to pass laws for the execution of the granted powers, to such as are indispensable, and without which the power would be nugatory. That it excludes the choice of means, and leaves to Congress, in each case, that only which is most direct and simple.

Is it true, that this is the sense in which the word "necessary" is always used? Does it always import an absolute physical necessity, so strong, that one thing, to which another may be termed necessary, cannot exist without that other? We think it does not. If reference be had to its use, in the common affairs of the world, or in approved authors, we find that it frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another. To employ the means necessary to an end, is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means, without which the end would be entirely unattainable. Such is the character of human language, that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea; and nothing is more common than to use words in a figurative sense. Almost all compositions contain words, which, taken in their rigorous sense, would convey a meaning different from that which is obviously intended. It is essential to just construction, that many words which import something excessive, should be understood in a more mitigated sense – in that sense which common usage justifies. The word "necessary" is of this description. It has not a fixed character peculiar to itself. It admits of all degrees of comparison; and is often connected with other words, which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, absolutely or indispensably necessary. To no mind would the same idea be conveyed, by these several phrases. This comment on the word is well illustrated, by the passage cited at the bar, from the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution. It is, we think, impossible to compare the sentence which prohibits a State from laying "imposts, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws," with that which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of the general government, without feeling a conviction that the convention understood itself to change materially the meaning of the word "necessary," by prefixing the word "absolutely." This word, then, like others, in used in various senses; and, in its construction, the subject, the context, the intention of the person using them, are all to be taken into view.

. . . . This provision is made in a constitution, intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can best be provided for as they occur. To have declared, that the best means shall not be used, but those alone, without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances.

The argument which most conclusively demonstrates the error of the construction contended for by the counsel for the State of Maryland, is founded on the intention of the Convention, as manifested in the whole clause. To waste time and argument in proving that, without it, Congress might carry its powers into execution, would be not much less idle than to hold a lighted taper to the sun. As little can it be required to prove, that in the absence of this clause, Congress would have some choice of means. That it might employ those which, in its judgment, would most advantageously effect the object to be accomplished. That any means adapted to the end, any means which tended directly to the execution of the constitutional powers of the government, were in themselves constitutional. This clause, as construed by the State of Maryland, would abridge, and almost annihilate this useful and necessary right of the legislature to select its means. That this could not be intended, is, we should think, had it not been already controverted, too apparent for controversy. We think so for the following reasons:

1st. The clause is placed among the powers of Congress, not among the limitations on those powers. 2nd. Its terms purport to enlarge, not to diminish the powers vested in the government. It purports to be an additional power, not a restriction on those already granted. No reason has been, or can be assigned for thus concealing an intention to narrow the discretion of the national legislature under words which purport to enlarge it. The framers of the constitution wished its adoption, and well knew that it would be endangered by its strength, not by its weakness. Had they been capable of suing language which would convey to the eye one idea, and, after deep reflection, impress on the mind another, they would rather have disguised the grant of power, than its limitation. If, then, their intention had been, by this clause, to restrain the free use of means which might otherwise have been implied, that intention would have been inserted in another place, and would have been expressed in terms resembling these. "In carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all others," &c. "no laws shall be passed but such as are necessary and proper." Had the intention been to make this clause restrictive, it would unquestionably have been so in form as well as in effect.

The result of the most careful and attentive consideration bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge, it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress, or to impair the right of the legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bauble.

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional.

That a corporation must be considered as a means not less usual, not of higher dignity, not more requiring a particular specification than other means, has been sufficiently proved. If we look to the origin of corporations, to the manner in which they have been framed in that government from which we have derived most of our legal principles and ideas, or to the uses to which they have been applied, we find no reason to suppose that a constitution, omitting, and wisely omitting, to enumerate all the means for carrying into execution the great powers vested in government, ought to have specified this. Had it been intended to grant this power as one which should be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the government. But being considered merely as a means, to be employed only for the purpose of carrying into execution the given powers, there could be no motive for particularly mentioning it.

After the most deliberate consideration, it is the unanimous and decided opinion of this Court, that the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States is a law made in pursuance of the constitution, and is a part of the supreme law of the land.

It being the opinion of the Court, that the act incorporating the bank is constitutional; and that the power of establishing a branch in the State of Maryland might be properly exercised by the bank itself, we proceed to inquire —

2. Whether the State of Maryland may, without violating the constitution, tax that branch?

That the power of taxation is one of vital importance; that it is retained by the States; that it is not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments: are truths which have never been denied. But, such is the paramount character of the constitution, that its capacity to withdraw any subject from the action of even this power, is admitted. The States are expressly forbidden to lay any duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws. If the obligation of this prohibition must be conceded – if it may restrain a State from the exercise of its taxing power on imports and exports; the same paramount character would seem to restrain, as it certainly may restrain, a State from such other exercise of this power, as is in its nature incompatible with, and repugnant to, the constitutional laws of the Union. A law, absolutely repugnant to another, as entirely repeals that other as if express terms of repeal were used.

On this ground the counsel for the bank place its claim to be exempted from the power of a State to tax its operations. There is no express provision for the case, but the claim has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture, as to be incapable of being separated from it, without rending it into shreds.

This great principle is, that the constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the constitution and laws of the respective States, and cannot be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are deduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are, 1st. that a power to create implies a power to preserve. 2nd. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to, and incompatible with these powers to create and to preserve. 3d. That where this repugnancy exists, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield to that over which it is supreme.

That the power of taxing it by the States may be exercised so as to destroy it, is too obvious to be denied. But taxation is said to be an absolute power, which acknowledges no other limits than those expressly prescribed in the constitution, and like sovereign power of every other description, is trusted to the discretion of those who use it. But the very terms of this argument admit that the sovereignty of the State, in the article of taxation itself, is subordinate to, and may be controlled by the constitution of the United States. How far it has been controlled by that instrument must be a question of construction. In making this construction, no principle not declared, can be admissible, which would defeat the legitimate operations of a supreme government. It is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and so to modify every power vested in subordinate governments, as to exempt its own operations from their own influence. This effect need not be stated in terms. It is so involved in the declaration of supremacy, so necessarily implied in it, that the expression of it could not make it more certain. We must, therefore, keep it in view while construing the constitution.

The argument on the part of the State of Maryland, is, not that the States may directly resist a law of Congress, but that they may exercise their acknowledged powers upon it, and that the constitution leaves them this right in the confidence that they will not abuse it.

That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance, in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to those very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied. But all inconsistencies are to be reconciled by the magic of the word CONFIDENCE. Taxation, it is said, does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy. To carry it to the excess of destruction would be an abuse, to presume which, would banish that confidence which is essential to all government.
But is this a case of confidence? Would the people of any one State trust those of another with a power to control the most insignificant operations of their State government? We know they would not. Why, then, should we suppose that the people of any one State should be willing to trust those of another with a power to control the operations of a government to which they have confided their most important and most valuable interests? In the legislature of the Union alone, are all represented. The legislature of the Union alone, therefore, can be trusted by the people with the power of controlling measures which concern all, in the confidence that it will not be abused. This, then, is not a case of confidence, and we must consider it as it really is.

If we apply the principle for which the State of Maryland contends, to the constitution generally, we shall find it capable of changing totally the character of that instrument. We shall find it capable of arresting all the measures of the government, and of prostrating it at the foot of the States. The American people have declared their constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, to be supreme; but this principle would transfer the supremacy, in fact, to the States.

If the States may tax one instrument, employed by the government in the execution of its powers, they may tax any and every other instrument. They may tax the mail; they may tax the mint; they may tax patent rights; they may tax the papers of the custom-house; they may tax judicial process; they may tax all the means employed by the government, to an excess which would defeat all the ends of government. This was not intended by the American people. They did not design to make their government dependent on the States.

The Court has bestowed on this subject its most deliberate consideration. The result is a conviction that the States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control, the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government. This is, we think, the unavoidable consequence of that supremacy which the constitution has declared.

We are unanimously of opinion, that the law passed by the legislature of Maryland, imposing a tax on the Bank of the United States, is unconstitutional and void.

This approach to the Necessary and Proper Clause naturally gives Congress great latitude in terms of determining appropriate legislative means. Not for nothing was this clause called “the Sweeping Clause” by both proponents and opponents of the Constitution at the time of ratification. Under its terms, much legislation can be “swept” under the umbrella of its protective cover, and thus be made constitutional, although the requirement that the legislation be “necessary” and “proper” does impose a requirement that the legislation advance legitimate government objects.

This conclusion that the Necessary and Proper Clause should be interpreted to give Congress great discretion in deciding upon “appropriate” means to advance “proper” governmental ends has not gone unchallenged. Consistent with Jefferson’s analysis of the Necessary and Proper Clause, Maryland argued in McCulloch that “necessary” meant “absolutely necessary.”36 While not adopting such an extreme view, James Madison indicated that “necessary” must mean more than merely “useful” or “appropriate,” or else the clause would expand Congress’ powers too greatly.37 Indeed, even though Madison supported the constitutionality of a national bank in 1816, Madison criticized this aspect of Marshall’s opinion after McCulloch was decided.38

In part of the McCulloch opinion not excerpted above, Marshall did note that “should Congress under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects, not entrusted to the government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal . . . to say that such an act was not the law of the land.”39 Although it could be argued that this “pretext” language imposes an additional obligation on the Court to consider legislative motives in determining the constitutionality of ordinary legislation, the view of Court precedents has been, and the view of Marshall in private letters was, that this language merely requires Congress to advance legitimate interests, not illegitimate interests outside the scope of constitutionally delegated powers. So viewed, the “pretext” language adds nothing to the modern phrasing of the McCulloch doctrine as requiring statutes to be “rationally related to legitimate government interests.”40

Later commentators focusing on arguments of text, context, and history have also suggested that the Necessary and Proper Clause should have a more limited meaning than that given to it by Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland. For example, Professor Randy Barnett has indicated that while the failure to use the phrase “indispensably necessary” or “absolutely necessary” in the Necessary and Proper Clause does suggest that the State of Maryland’s argument is weak, since had the framers and ratifiers wanted that meaning they were familiar with such a phrase, and would have used it in the Clause, the intent of the framers would have been to have more vigorous scrutiny of the necessity of certain means than Marshall’s mere use of the term “appropriate.”41

There are two main problems with such an approach. The first problem would be to determine how much “need” is required to satisfy this more vigorous “necessary” requirement. No judicially manageable standards have ever been proposed that clearly resolve this issue. Thus, Marshall’s conclusion that the “degree” of the need is substantially within the political discretion of Congress, subject only to an “appropriateness” limitation, or as phrased in contemporary doctrine, “rational related to a legitimate government interest,” is consistent with a concern regarding a “lack of judicially manageable standards” in the political questions doctrine, as noted in Baker v. Carr, excerpted at § 4.3.2. Second, the phrase “necessary and proper” was often used in 18th-century agency and trust documents to give the agent or trustee great discretion to determine means to carry out legitimate ends of the grantor, consistent also with Marshall’s approach toward the term.42

While Madison criticized this aspect of McCulloch soon after its decision, as noted above, consistent judicial precedents following McCulloch, as well as the legislative and executive practice after McCulloch consistent with Marshall’s view of congressional power to determine appropriate means, would mean that Marshall’s views would be viewed today even by Madison as the controlling doctrine under a natural law theory of interpretation, despite whatever historical evidence might be noted to support Madison’s views of 200 years ago. Similarly, the more extreme pro-federal government views of Professor Crosskey, noted at § 5.1 nn. 1, 7-8, which give Congress virtually unlimited power to legislate on any matter, would be rejected today under a natural law theory of interpretation, despite one’s views on the historical evidence that could be used to support that view.

Marshall made no reference in his opinion to the deliberations of the Convention regarding the power of Congress to incorporate a national bank. That history would have shown that Congress rejected a general power of incorporation. The Convention also rejected a more limited proposal to give Congress the power to incorporate companies for the building of canals.43 Without such a general incorporation power, most corporations are creatures of state laws, not federal laws.

However, this history is not conclusive on the narrow question of congressional power to incorporate a bank as an institution “necessary and proper” to advance the other enumerated powers in Article I, § 8. This history on incorporation only conclusively establishes the view that a general power to incorporate, independent of a Necessary and Proper Clause analysis, lies with states, not the federal government.44 Further, despite inferences which could be drawn from this specific historical evidence, under the natural law theory of interpretation, the sources of interpretation other than history would override this historical evidence in any event.45

McCulloch v. Maryland has remained a vital precedent in constitutional law. Chief Justice Marshall crafted a relatively deferential approach towards judicial review of congressional enactments. Once a legitimate governmental interest is established, all that need be established is that the legislative means are an “appropriate” way to advance that legitimate end.

While McCulloch’s holding, and most of its reasoning, have rarely been questioned by later Supreme Court majorities, during the formalist era, between 1873 and 1937, the Court did not always leave questions of the degree of necessity to Congress. During the Lochner era of the late 1800s until 1937, the Court applied a “reasonableness” test that, while never clearly defined, was similar to that proposed by Madison or Professor Barnett in that it second-guessed legislative judgment more than during the natural law era test of “appropriate” government action. The Lochner doctrine is discussed at § 17.1.2 nn.5-19, with Lochner v. New York excerpted at § 17.2.

As discussed at § 19.1 nn. 10, 19-26, since 1937 the Court has phrased the relevant test for the constitutionality of economic regulation under the Equal Protection Clause as whether the government action is “rationally related to a legitimate government interest.”46 This post-1937 phrasing reflects the same deference-to-government approach of the McCulloch test regarding “appropriate” legislation under the Necessary and Proper Clause. Indeed, the Court noted in United States v. Comstock,47 “We have since made clear that, in determining whether the Necessary and Proper Clause grants Congress the legislative authority to enact a particular federal statute, we look to see whether the statute constitutes a means that is rationally related to the implementation of a constitutionally enumerated power.” The Court also indicated that the issue under the Commerce Clause of whether Congress could rationally think some activity has a substantial effect on interstate commerce is governed by the same minimum rationality review. Concurring in the judgment, Justices Kennedy and Alito indicated their belief that the Necessary and Proper Clause analysis, and the Commerce Clause analysis, may well require more justification than a mere Equal Protection rational relationship test. In dissent, Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, was more forceful in rejecting the majority’s deferential Necessary and Proper Clause analysis. However, the 5-Justice majority of the four liberal instrumentalis (Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, Breyer, and Sotomayor), and the deference-to-government Holmesian (Chief Justice Roberts), adopted this view.

In the early 1800s, broad interpretation of Congress' Commerce Clause power was opposed by Southern political interests who feared federal regulation of the slave trade, which, according to the Constitution, was possible beginning in 1808. Southern political interests were also concerned about the aggrandizing of centralized economic power in the large Northern corporate banking centers, such as New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. They preferred economic policy to be left to the market, or a matter of experimentation among the states, rather than a coordinated federal approach. Southern political strategy was thus to limit federal power to regulate commerce among the states.

For example, in 1817, President Madison vetoed a law for building national roads and canals because he said those matters were not enumerated and could not be included in regulating commerce among the states. In 1822, President Monroe vetoed repair of the Cumberland Road for similar reasons and sent a copy of his veto message to the Justices. Following Monroe’s veto, Justice Johnson sent President Monroe a letter saying that all the Justices agreed that McCulloch v. Maryland settled the matter in holding that the grant of a principal power carries all adequate and appropriate means of executing it, and selection of those means rests with Congress and the President, who are supreme. Without regard to justifying such a federal law as a necessary and proper adjunct to the Commerce Clause, such a law would be clearly constitutional today under Hamilton’s and Story’s views on the spending power of the General Welfare Clause, which the Supreme Court has adopted.

The first major Commerce Clause cased decided by the Supreme Court was Gibbons v. Ogden, excerpted below. That case involved whether Congress could pass laws regulating navigation in New York Harbor, and if Congress could pass such laws, how that affected the ability of states to pass laws on the same subject-matter. The case raised the question of what the terms “commerce” and “among the states” meant under the Commerce Clause.

On the first question, Marshall concluded that “commerce” included all kinds of commercial intercourse, including navigation. Marshall’s main argument in support of this conclusion was an argument of legislative, executive, and social practice. Marshall noted, “If commerce does not include navigation, the government of the Union has no direct power over that subject. . . . Yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of the government, has been exercised with the consent of all, and has been understood by all to be a commercial regulation.” Marshall also relied upon an argument of purpose, noting, “The power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their government, and must have been contemplated in forming it.” A related provision argument also confirmed this reading. Article I, § 9, states that “no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one state over those of another.” Marshall noted that in this context “commerce” clearly includes navigation because “the most obvious preference which can be given to one port over another, in regulating commerce, applies to navigation.”

These arguments of practice, purpose, and related provisions clearly outweighed for Marshall any more formalist-inspired argument that the literal textual definition of “commerce” relates only to buying and selling, and thus Congress’ power under the Commerce Clause should be so limited. According to dictionaries in the 18th Century, the term “commerce” was ordinarily defined as “Exchange of one thing for another; trade; traffick.” However, even early states’-rights advocates, such as St. George Tucker, famous for his 1803 annotated edition of Blackstone’s Commentaries, adopted the natural law emphasis on purpose to favor a broader reading of the Commerce Clause.

While Gibbons held that “commerce” should be interpreted to include transportation of goods, the Court did not address directly the broader question of whether “commerce” was limited to buying, selling, and transporting goods, or included other kinds of commercial activity, such as manufacturing goods, mining raw materials, or growing crops. However, Chief Justice Marshall did note that “[t]he genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the states generally.” The phrase “internal concerns” suggests a broad reading of “commerce” to include all kinds of economic activity. Further, Marshall noted that the term “commerce” in the Commerce Clause also modified the phrases “with foreign nations” and “with the Indian tribes,” and that it has been “universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.” Marshall concluded, “If this be the admitted meaning of the word, in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence” and thus be equally applicable to commerce “among the several States.”

It has been argued that despite these passages, Marshall conceived of commerce as not including these other kinds of economic activity, because Marshall indicated, in a part of Gibbons v. Ogden not excerpted below, that “[i]nspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpikes, ferries, etc., are components parts of this mass” of subject-matters for state regulation. However, as Marshall made clear in Gibbons, while the federal government has “[n]o direct general power over these objects,” the “legislative power of the Union can reach them . . . for national purposes,” and the federal government “may use means also employed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged power.”

Cases following Gibbons before the Civil War did not raise this precise issue because the federal government engaged in virtually no regulation of manufacturing, mining, or agricultural activities during this time. A few bills were passed by Congress aiding financing of canals and other projects during the 1820s, and were signed by Presidents James Monroe and John Quincy Adams. In 1852, Congress passed a bill providing for the regulation and licensing of steamboats, including rules regarding boiler construction. This Act contributed to a dramatic decline in deaths by boiler explosions on steamboats that had caused more than 750 deaths during 1850 and 1851. However, such congressional activity was limited and sporadic. For example, after the Panic of 1837, petitions from farmers in 1838 and thereafter requested a federal Department of Agriculture. The Department was not created until 1862, after the Southern states, who opposed federal regulation of agriculture, had left the Union. With the exception of federal tariff laws, regulation of economic activity in the United States prior to the Civil War was predominantly a matter of state law.\textsuperscript{61}

After the Civil War, the closest the Supreme Court came to discussing the issue during the natural law era was in 1868 in \textit{Paul v. Virginia}.\textsuperscript{62} In this case, the Court upheld a state statute regulating an insurance contract, in part because the statute conflicted with no federal law. Foreshadowing the approach soon to be adopted during the formalist era, the Court noted in \textit{dicta} that the purchase of insurance was not “commerce,” and thus the federal government could not regulate insurance contracts even if the federal government had attempted to do so. Despite this suggestion of a limitation on what is “commerce,” the issue of whether “commerce” includes all kinds of commercial activity, or only buying, selling, and transportation, was left substantially unresolved during the natural law era.

As to the second question, how to interpret the phrase “among the several States,” the facts in \textit{Gibbons} presented an easy case, since the navigation at issue in the case involved traveling the New York Harbor between New York and New Jersey. Any definition of “among” would include such activity. Nevertheless, Marshall presented in \textit{Gibbons} a more complete theory of how the term “among” should be read. Focusing on the purpose of the Commerce Clause to provide national economic solutions to national economic problems, Marshall indicated that Congress could regulate commerce as long as the commercial activity “concerns more states than one.” On the other hand, noted Marshall, Congress does not have the power to regulate economic activities “which are completely within a particular state, which do not affect other states, and with which is it not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the government.”\textsuperscript{63}

This doctrine, applied faithfully, would seem to leave only a few matters of exclusively internal commerce for the states. For example, the Court stated that the federal government could regulate the purely intrastate activity of a steamer that transported goods and people between cities in the state of Michigan in the 1871 case, \textit{The Daniel Ball},\textsuperscript{64} because “it is admitted that the steamer was engaged in shipping and transporting down Grand River goods destined and marked for other States than Michigan. . . . So far as [the ship] was employed in transporting goods destined for other States, or goods brought from without the limits of Michigan and destined to places within that State, she was engaged in commerce between the States.”

Once it was determined in Gibbons v. Ogden that Congress could regulate navigation in New York Harbor, the question arose whether the New York State regulation of navigation could stand. Justice Johnson, concurring, said that New York's law would be invalid even without the federal law because the grant of power to regulate commerce among the states carries the whole subject, leaving nothing for the states to act upon. Justice Marshall indicated, "There is great force in this argument, and the court is not satisfied that it has been refuted."

However, Justice Marshall adopted in Gibbons a theory of concurrent federal and state power to pass laws on many subjects, each government seeking its own legitimate purposes, with federal law supreme in case of conflict. Under this approach, a state can regulate subjects that Congress may also regulate if the state's purpose is not to regulate commerce among the states, but for the state's own internal regulatory reasons, and the state law is not inconsistent with federal law. Marshall concluded in Gibbons that the Court need not decide between the Johnson approach and the concurrent jurisdiction approach because the federal license law granted a power with which the New York law conflicted. Thus, the New York law was invalid in any event.65

A few years later, in Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co.,66 excerpted below, Marshall applied the theory of concurrent power by holding that Delaware, for the purpose of improving lands adjacent to a navigable creek, could build a dam on the creek if that did not conflict with an act of Congress. Marshall said that state laws enacted for the purpose of regulating their own purely internal affairs are constitutional if not within a constitutional prohibition unless they conflict with a valid act of Congress. Here, Congress had passed no act with which the state law conflicted, and thus the state law was not "repugnant to the power to regulate commerce in its dormant state."

There is also a possible argument that the term "regulate" in the Commerce Clause only involves the power to limit commerce, but not the power to ban some activity entirely.67 Given the purpose of the Commerce Clause to solve national economic problems, it is no surprise that Marshall instead read the term "regulate" to give a plenary power to Congress to prescribe rules, which would include authorizing or banning the activity entirely, and that later Supreme Courts in every era of interpretation have uniformly adopted the same view.68

68 See, e.g., Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 17-18 (1824) (Congress’ commerce power is plenary, and extends to prohibiting state regulation of commercial activity); Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S. 321 (1903) (banning interstate transportation of lottery ticket); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941) (prohibiting shipment of lumber by workers paid less than the minimum wage).
A limitation on the term “regulate” was stated in 2012. In National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, a 5-Justice majority held that the individual mandate provision of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 (Obamacare), which requires individuals to purchase health insurance by 2014 or pay a penalty, was not a “regulation” of commerce, but rather “mandating” commerce, since it required individuals to purchase insurance, rather than regulate activity already being done. Since the text of the Commerce Clause only gives Congress the power “to Regulate Commerce,” these five Justices concluded that the mandate could not be authorized by the Commerce Clause. In dissent, four Justices concluded that the insurance mandate was a regulation of commerce, since at some point in their lives every individual will need health care, and thus individuals by being alive should be viewed as participating in the health care market. Despite these conclusions under the Commerce Clause, a different 5-4 majority held the mandate was authorized by the Taxing Power, discussed at § 7.1.1 nn.7-12 and excerpted at § 7.1.1.

Gibbons v. Odgen
22 U.S. 1 (1824)

[Ed.: The New York legislature had granted an exclusive license to Livingston and Fulton to navigate on the Hudson River between New York and New Jersey. That law was challenged by a competitor who had a federal license to participate in the coasting trade, which included the Hudson. The New York courts upheld the exclusive privilege granted by New York law.]

Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court.

The appellant contends that this decree is erroneous, because the laws which purport to give the exclusive privilege it sustains, are repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States.

They are said to be repugnant —

1st. To that clause in the constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce.

2d. To that which authorizes Congress to promote the progress of science and useful arts.

The State of New York maintains the constitutionality of these laws; and their Legislature, their Council of Revision, and their Judges, have repeatedly concurred in this opinion. It is supported by great names – by names which have all the titles to consideration that virtue, intelligence, and office, can bestow. No tribunal can approach the decision of this question, without feeling a just and real respect for that opinion which is sustained by such authority; but it is the province of this Court, while it respects, not to bow to it implicitly; and the Judges must exercise, in the examination of the subject, that understanding which Providence has bestowed upon them, with that independence which the people of the United States expect from this department of the government.

As preliminary to the very able discussions of the constitution, which we have heard from the bar, and as having some influence on its construction, reference has been made to the political situation of these States, anterior to its formation. It has been said, that they were sovereign, were completely independent, and were connected with each other only by a league. This is true. But, when these allied sovereigns converted their league into a government, when they converted their Congress of Ambassadors, deputed to deliberate on their common concerns, and to recommend measures of general utility, into a Legislature, empowered to enact laws on the most interesting subjects, the whole character in which the States appear, underwent a change, the extent of which must be determined by a fair consideration of the instrument by which that change was effected.

This instrument contains an enumeration of powers expressly granted by the people to their government. It has been said, that these powers ought to be construed strictly. But why ought they to be so construed? Is there one sentence in the constitution which gives countenance to this rule? In the last of the enumerated powers, that which grants, expressly, the means for carrying all others into execution, Congress is authorized "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" for the purpose. But this limitation on the means which may be used, is not extended to the powers which are conferred; nor is there one sentence in the constitution, which has been pointed out by the gentlemen of the bar, or which we have been able to discern, that prescribes this rule. We do not, therefore, think ourselves justified in adopting it. What do gentlemen mean, by a strict construction? If they contend only against that enlarged construction, which would extend words beyond their natural and obvious import, we might question the application of the term, but should not controvert the principle. If they contend for that narrow construction which, in support of some theory not to be found in the constitution, would deny to the government those powers which the words of the grant, as usually understood, import, and which are consistent with the general views and objects of the instrument; for that narrow construction, which would cripple the government, and render it unequal to the object, for which it is declared to be instituted, and to which the powers given, as fairly understood, render it competent; then we cannot perceive the propriety of this strict construction, nor adopt it as the rule by which the constitution is to be expounded. As men, whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said.

If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well settled rule, that the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction. We know of no reason for excluding this rule from the present case. The grant does not convey power which might be beneficial to the grantor, if retained by himself, or which can enure solely to the benefit of the grantee; but is an investment of power for the general advantage, in the hands of agents selected for that purpose; which power can never be exercised by the people themselves, but must be placed in the hands of agents, or lie dormant. We know of no rule for construing the extent of such powers, other than is given by the language of the instrument which confers them, taken in connexion with the purposes for which they were conferred.

The words are, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration, and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations, which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals, in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter.

If commerce does not include navigation, the government of the Union has no direct power over that subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen. Yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of the government, has been exercised with the consent of all, and has been understood by all to be a commercial regulation. All America understands, and has uniformly understood, the word "commerce," to comprehend navigation. It was so understood, and must have been so understood, when the constitution was framed. The power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their government, and must have been contemplated in forming it. The convention must have used the word in that sense, because all have understood it in that sense; and the attempt to restrict it comes too late.

If the opinion that "commerce," as the word is used in the constitution, comprehends navigation also, requires any additional confirmation, that additional confirmation is, we think, furnished by the words of the instrument itself.

It is a rule of construction, acknowledged by all, that the exceptions from a power mark its extent; for it would be absurd, as well as useless, to except from a granted power, that which was not granted – that which the words of the grant could not comprehend. If, then, there are in the constitution plain exceptions from the power over navigation, plain inhibitions to the exercise of that power in a particular way, it is a proof that those who made these exceptions, and prescribed these inhibitions, understood the power to which they applied as being granted.
The 9th section of the 1st article declares, that "no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." This clause cannot be understood as applicable to those laws only which are passed for the purposes of revenue, because it is expressly applied to commercial regulations; and the most obvious preference which can be given to one port over another, in regulating commerce, relates to navigation. But the subsequent part of the sentence is still more explicit. It is, "nor shall vessels bound to or from one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties, in another." These words have a direct reference to navigation.

The universally acknowledged power of the government to impose embargoes, must also be considered as showing, that all America is united in that construction which comprehends navigation in the word commerce. Gentlemen have said, in argument, that this is a branch of the war-making power, and that an embargo is an instrument of war, not a regulation of trade.

That it may be, and often is, used as an instrument of war, cannot be denied. An embargo may be imposed for the purpose of facilitating the equipment or manning of a fleet, or for the purpose of concealing the progress of an expedition preparing to sail from a particular port. In these, and in similar cases, it is a military instrument, and partakes of the nature of war. But all embargoes are not of this description. They are sometimes resorted to without a view to war, and with a single view to commerce. In such case, an embargo is no more a war measure, than a merchantman is a ship of war, because both are vessels which navigate the ocean with sails and seamen.

The word used in the constitution, then, comprehends, and has been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation, is as expressly granted, as if that term had been added to the word "commerce."

To what commerce does this power extend? The constitution informs us, to commerce "with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

It has, we believe, been universally admitted, that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other, to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said, that commerce, as the word is used in the constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term.

If this be the admitted meaning of the word, in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence, and remain a unit, unless there be some plain intelligible cause which alters it.

The subject to which the power is next applied, is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others, is intermingled with them.

Commerce among the States, cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.
It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary.

Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce, to which the power was to be extended, would not have been made, had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State. The genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

But in regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power, if it could not pass those lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations, is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate in it. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction, pass through the interior of almost every State in the Union, and furnish the means of exercising this right. If Congress has the power to regulate it, that power must be exercised whenever the subject exists. If it exists within the States, if a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a State, then the power of Congress may be exercised within a State.

This principle is, if possible, still more clear, when applied to commerce "among the several States." They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other States lie between them. What is commerce "among" them; and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States, commence and terminate outside each? And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? Commerce among the States must, of necessity, be commerce with the States. In the regulation of trade with the Indian tribes, the action of the law, especially when the constitution was made, was chiefly within a State. The power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States. The sense of the nation on this subject, is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods, by land, between Baltimore and Providence, between New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore.

We are now arrived at the inquiry – What is this power?
It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely, in all representative governments.

The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation, within the limits of every State in the Union; so far as that navigation may be, in any manner, connected with "commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with the Indian tribes." It may, of consequence, pass the jurisdictional line of New York, and act upon the very waters to which the prohibition now under consideration applies.

But it has been urged with great earnestness, that, although the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, be co-extensive with the subject itself, and have no other limits than are prescribed in the constitution, yet the States may severally exercise the same power, within their respective jurisdictions. In support of this argument, it is said, that they possessed it as an inseparable attribute of sovereignty, before the formation of the constitution, and still retain it, except so far as they have surrendered it by that instrument; that this principle results from the nature of the government, and is secured by the tenth amendment; that an affirmative grant of power is not exclusive, unless in its own nature it be such that the continued exercise of it by the former possessor is inconsistent with the grant, and that this is not of that description.

The appellant, conceding these postulates, except the last, contends, that full power to regulate a particular subject, implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum; that a grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it.

Both parties have appealed to the constitution, to legislative, acts, and judicial decisions; and have drawn arguments from all these sources, to support and illustrate the propositions they respectively maintain.

The grant of the power to lay and collect taxes is, like the power to regulate commerce, made in general terms, and has never been understood to interfere with the exercise of the same power by the States; and hence has been drawn an argument which has been applied to the question under consideration. But the two grants are not, it is conceived, similar in their terms or their nature. Although many of the powers formerly exercised by the States, are transferred to the government of the Union, yet the State governments remain, and constitute a most important part of our system.
The power of taxation is indispensable to their existence, and is a power which, in its own nature, is capable of residing in, and being exercised by, different authorities at the same time. . . . When, then, each government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other. But, when a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, it is exercising the very power that is granted to Congress, and is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do. There is no analogy, then, between the power of taxation and the power of regulating commerce.

In discussing the question, whether this power is still in the States, in the case under consideration, we may dismiss from it the inquiry, whether it is surrendered by the mere grant to Congress, or is retained until Congress shall exercise the power. We may dismiss that inquiry, because it has been exercised, and the regulations which Congress deemed it proper to make, are now in full operation. The sole question is, can a State regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, while Congress is regulating it?

The counsel for the respondent answer this question in the affirmative, and rely very much on the restrictions in the 10th section, as supporting their opinion. They say, very truly, that limitations of a power, furnish a strong argument in favour of the existence of that power, and that the section which prohibits the States from laying duties on imports or exports, proves that this power might have been exercised, had it not been expressly forbidden; and, consequently, that any other commercial regulation, not expressly forbidden, to which the original power of the State was competent, may still be made.

That this restriction shows the opinion of the Convention, that a State might impose duties on exports and imports, if not expressly forbidden, will be conceded; but that it follows as a consequence, from this concession, that a State may regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, cannot be admitted.

In our complex system, presenting the rare and difficult scheme of one general government, whose action extends over the whole, but which possesses only certain enumerated powers; and of numerous State governments, which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union, contests respecting power must arise. Were it even otherwise, the measures taken by the respective governments to execute their acknowledged powers, would often be of the same description, and might, sometimes, interfere. This, however, does not prove that the one is exercising, or has a right to exercise, the powers of the other.

It has been contended by the counsel for the appellant, that, as the word "to regulate" implies in its nature, full power over the thing to be regulated, it excludes, necessarily, the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were, as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched, as that on which it has operated.

There is great force in this argument, and the Court is not satisfied that it has been refuted.
Since, however, in exercising the power of regulating their own purely internal affairs, whether of trading or police, the States may sometimes enact laws, the validity of which depends on their interfering with, and being contrary to, an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the constitution, the Court will enter upon the inquiry, whether the laws of New York, as expounded by the highest tribunal of that State, have, in their application to this case, come into collision with an act of Congress, and deprived a citizen of a right to which that act entitles him. Should this collision exist, it will be immaterial whether those laws were passed in virtue of a concurrent power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," or, in virtue of a power to regulate their domestic trade and police. In one case and the other, the acts of New York must yield to the law of Congress; and the decision sustaining the privilege they confer, against a right given by a law of the Union, must be erroneous.

This opinion has been frequently expressed in this Court, and is founded, as well on the nature of the government as on the words of the constitution. In argument, however, it has been contended, that if a law passed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty, comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the constitution, they affect the subject, and each other, like equal opposing powers.

But the framers of our constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it, by declaring the supremacy not only of itself, but of the laws made in pursuance of it.

This act demonstrates the opinion of Congress, that steam boats may be enrolled and licensed, in common with vessels using sails. They are, of course, entitled to the same privileges, and can no more be restrained from navigating waters, and entering ports which are free to such vessels, than if they were wafted on their voyage by the winds, instead of being propelled by the agency of fire. The one element may be as legitimately used as the other, for every commercial purpose authorized by the laws of the Union; and the act of a State inhibiting the use of either to any vessel having a license under the act of Congress, comes, we think, in direct collision with that act.

This Court is, therefore, of opinion, that the decree of the Court of New York for the Trial of Impeachments and the Correction of Errors, affirming the decree of the Chancellor of that State, which perpetually enjoins the said Thomas Gibbons, the appellant, from navigating the waters of the State of New York with the steam boats the Stoudinger and the Bellona, by steam or fire, is erroneous, and ought to be reversed, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled: and this Court doth further DIRECT, ORDER, and DECREE, that the bill of the said Aaron Ogden be dismissed, and this same is hereby dismissed accordingly.

Justice JOHNSON, concurring.

The judgment entered by the Court in this cause, has my entire approbation; but having adopted my conclusions on views of the subject materially different from those of my brethren, I feel it incumbent on me to exhibit those views. I have, also, another inducement: in questions of great importance and great delicacy, I feel my duty to the public best discharged, by an effort to maintain my opinions in my own way.
The law of nations, regarding man as a social animal, pronounces all commerce legitimate in a state of peace, until prohibited by positive law. The power of a sovereign state over commerce, therefore, amounts to nothing more than a power to limit and restrain it at pleasure. And since the power to prescribe the limits to its freedom, necessarily implies the power to determine what shall remain unrestrained, it follows, that the power must be exclusive; it can reside but in one potentate; and hence, the grant of this power carries with it the whole subject, leaving nothing for the State to act upon.

It is impossible, with the views which I entertain of the principle on which the commercial privileges of the people of the United States, among themselves, rests, to concur in the view which this Court takes of the effect of the coasting license in this cause. I do not regard it as the foundation of the right set up in behalf of the appellant. If there was any one object riding over every other in the adoption of the constitution, it was to keep the commercial intercourse among the States free from all invidious and partial restraints. And I cannot overcome the conviction, that if the licensing act was repealed tomorrow, the rights of the appellant to a reversal of the decision complained of, would be as strong as it is under this license.

Willson v. Black-Bird Creek Marsh

Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants in error deny the jurisdiction of this Court, because, they say, the record does not show that the constitutionality of the act of the legislature, under which the plaintiff claimed to support his action, was drawn into question.

Undoubtedly the plea might have stated in terms that the act, so far as it authorized a dam across the creek, was repugnant to the constitution of the United States; and it might have been safer, it might have avoided any question respecting jurisdiction, so to frame it. But we think it impossible to doubt that the constitutionality of the act was the question, and the only question, which could have been discussed in the state court. That question must have been discussed and decided.

The plaintiffs sustain their right to build a dam across the creek by the act of assembly. Their declaration is founded upon that act. The injury of which they complain is to a right given by it. They do not claim for themselves any right independent of it. They rely entirely upon the act of assembly.

The plea does not controvert the existence of the act, but denies its capacity to authorise the construction of a dam across a navigable stream, in which the tide ebbs and flows; and in which there was, and of right ought to have been, a certain common and public way in the nature of a highway. This plea draws nothing into question but the validity of the act; and the judgment of the court must have been in favour of its validity. Its consistency with, or repugnancy to the constitution of the United States, necessarily arises upon these pleadings, and must have been determined. This Court has repeatedly decided in favour of its jurisdiction in such a case. Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, Miller vs. Nicholls, and Williams vs. Norris, are expressly in point. They establish, as far as precedents can establish any thing, that it is not necessary to state in terms on the record, that the constitution or a law of the United States was drawn in question. It is sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the 25th section of the judicial act, if the record shows, that the constitution or a law or a treaty of the United States must have been misconstrued, or the decision could not be made. Or, as in this case, that the constitutionality of a state law was questioned, and the decision has been in favour of the party claiming under such law.

The jurisdiction of the Court being established, the more doubtful question is to be considered, whether the act incorporating the Black Bird Creek Marsh Company is repugnant to the constitution, so far as it authorizes a dam across the creek. The plea states the creek to be navigable, in the nature of a highway, through which the tide ebbs and flows.

The act of assembly by which the plaintiffs were authorized to construct their dam, shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks, passing through a deep level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the general government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the states. But the measure authorised by this act stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgement, unless it comes in conflict with the constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this Court can take no cognizance.

The counsel for the plaintiffs in error insist that it comes in conflict with the power of the United States "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states."

If congress had passed any act which bore upon the case; any act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control state legislation over those small navigable creeks into which the tide flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the middle and southern states; we should feel not much difficulty in saying that a state law coming in conflict with such act would be void. But congress has passed no such act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware to the constitution is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states; a power which has not been so exercised as to affect the question.

There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

§ 6.1 Commerce Clause Power Between 1873-1937: Formalist View

During the formalist era, the majority of the Supreme Court gave a more literal reading to the terms “commerce” and “among the states.” Reflecting the formalist emphasis on literal, textual meaning, the Court departed from an emphasis on legislative and executive practice under the Constitution, and the purpose behind the Commerce Clause to provide national economic solutions to national economic problems, the twin focuses of Chief Justice Marshall’s opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, excerpted at § 5.4. This formalist mode of interpretation also advanced the pro-business perspective of many of the Republican-appointed Justices to the Supreme Court during this period. Most of these Justices were former corporate attorneys, served as corporate or railroad directors, or otherwise had “an influential clientele of railroad, banking, oil, coal, iron, and steel interests.”1

With regard to the first issue of the definition of “commerce,” the formalist-era Court narrowed the concept of “commerce” to buying and selling, the “core” dictionary definition of “commerce,” as well as transportation incident thereto. The first set of cases in the 1880s involved state regulations of activity, where the more limited definition of commerce appeared in dicta. For example, in Coe v. Town of Errol,2 the Court held that a state could tax logs destined for export, because those logs were not articles of commerce until their interstate journey began, and thus questions of federal preemption could not arise. In Kidd v. Pearson,3 Iowa was allowed to ban the manufacture of liquor because manufacturing was held not to be interstate commerce, and neither were mining, agriculture, or domestic fisheries, commerce being defined as buying and selling and transportation incidental thereto. The exercise of federal power was thus indirectly inhibited by cases upholding state laws that suggested that the states had exclusive power over the subjects involved.

Federal regulation began to be ruled unconstitutional beginning in the 1890s. For example, in 1895, the Court held in United States v. E.C. Knight Co., excerpted below, that the Sherman Act could not be applied to a “monopoly” in “manufacture” because “[c]ommerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it.” In 1918, in Hammer v. Dagenhart, excerpted below, over a 4-Justice dissent authored by Justice Holmes, the Court held that Congress could not prevent shipment in interstate commerce of goods made by children who worked longer hours than permitted since the evil occurred during the manufacturing process before the goods became articles of commerce, which would occur when they were being transported. In the mid-1930s, the Court indicated a willingness to invalidate much of President Roosevelt's "New Deal," including regulations of agriculture, manufacturing, and mining. These rulings were all inconsistent, of course, with legislative and executive practice in passing the bills, including during the natural law era, where Congress created the Department of Agriculture in 1862.

Despite this narrowing, the Court did not adopt a more extreme version of formalism that would have limited the Commerce Clause power only to the core dictionary definition of buying and selling. The natural law-era precedents of Gibbons, Willson, and The Daniel Ball were maintained, the Court stating in 1878 in Hannibal v. Husen, "Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself." Indeed, these precedents were extended in cases like Champion v. Ames excerpted below, which involved transporting a lottery ticket across state lines. In Ames, this more moderate formalist view prevailed by just one vote, with four more extreme formalist Justices in dissent stating that if “a lottery ticket is not an article of commerce, how can it become so when placed in an envelope or box or other covering, and transported by an express company.”

With regard to the second issue of defining the phrase “among the several States,” the Court also adopted a moderate formalist view. The extreme view would have been that only activity literally crossing state lines could be defined as commerce among the states. However, in The Shreveport Rate Cases, excerpted below, with two Justices dissenting, the Court permitted the Interstate Commerce Commission to adjust intrastate railroad rates to prevent discrimination between intrastate and interstate rates because Congress can regulate the instruments of commerce "in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that it is necessary or appropriate to exercise the control for the effective government of that commerce."

United States v. E.C. Knight Co.

Chief Justice FULLER, delivered the opinion of the court.

By the purchase of the stock of the four Philadelphia refineries with shares of its own stock the American Sugar Refining Company acquired nearly complete control of the manufacture of refined sugar within the United States. The bill charged that the contracts under which these purchases were made constituted combinations in restraint of trade, and that in entering into them the defendants combined and conspired to restrain the trade and commerce in refined sugar among the several states and with foreign nations, contrary to the act of congress of July 2, 1890 [The Sherman Antitrust Act].

The argument is that the power to control the manufacture of refined sugar is a monopoly over a necessary of life, to the enjoyment of which by a large part of the population of the United States interstate commerce is indispensable, and that, therefore, the general government, in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce, may repress such monopoly directly, and set aside the instruments which have created it. But this argument cannot be confined to necessaries of life merely, and must include all articles of general consumption. Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves, in a certain sense, the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary, and not the primary, sense; and, although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly.

United States, 196 U.S. 375, 397, 399 (1905) (the Sherman Act could be applied to price fixing in a stock yard because “its affects upon commerce among the States is not accidental, or secondary, remote or merely probable,” but instead “is a typical, constantly recurring course” making the affect of that price-fixing “a current of commerce”); Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U.S. 557, 576-77 (1886) (power to regulate interstate railroad rates is exclusively in Congress, even as to trips within a state).
whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed, or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce.

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power [of Congress] and of the police power [of the states], and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for, while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the states as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne, than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

It will be perceived how far-reaching the proposition is that the power of dealing with a monopoly directly may be exercised by the general government whenever interstate or international commerce may be ultimately affected. The regulation of commerce applies to the subjects of commerce, and not to matters of internal police. Contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several states, the transportation and its instrumentalities, and articles bought, sold, or exchanged for the purposes of such transit among the states, or put in the way of transit, may be regulated; but this is because they form part of interstate trade or commerce. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another state does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce.

Justice HARLAN, dissenting.

What is commerce among the states? The decisions of this court fully answer the question. “Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse.” It does not embrace the completely interior traffic of the respective states, – that which is “carried on between man and man in a state, or between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend to or affect other states” – but it does embrace “every species of commercial intercourse” between the United States and foreign nations and among the states, and therefore it includes such traffic or trade, buying, selling, and interchange of commodities, as directly affects or necessarily involves the interests of the people of the United States. “Commerce, as the word is used in the constitution, is a unit,” and “cannot stop at the external boundary line of each state, but may be introduced into the interior.” “The genius and character of the whole government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the states generally.”

These principles were announced in Gibbons v. Ogden, and have often been approved. It is the settled doctrine of this court that interstate commerce embraces something more than the mere physical transportation of articles of property, and the vehicles or vessels by which such transportation is effected.

The power of congress covers and protects the absolute freedom of such intercourse and trade among the states as may or must succeed manufacture and precede transportation from the place of purchase. . . . Each part of such trade is then under the protection of congress. And yet, by the opinion and judgment in this case, if I do not misapprehend them, congress is without power to protect the commercial intercourse that such purchasing necessarily involves against the restraints and burdens arising from the existence of combinations that meet purchasers, from whatever state they come, with the threat – for it is nothing more nor less than a threat – that they shall not purchase what they desire to purchase, except at the prices fixed by such combinations. A citizen of Missouri has the right to go in person, or send orders, to Pennsylvania and New Jersey for the purpose of purchasing refined sugar. But of what value is that right if he is confronted in those states by a vast combination, which absolutely controls the price of that article by reason of its having acquired all the sugar refineries in the United States in order that they may fix prices in their own interest exclusively?

In my judgment, the citizens of the several states composing the Union are entitled of right to buy goods in the state where they are manufactured, or in any other state, without being confronted by an illegal combination whose business extends throughout the whole country, which, by the law everywhere, is an enemy to the public interests, and which prevents such buying, except at prices arbitrarily fixed by it. I insist that the free course of trade among the states cannot coexist with such combinations.

Champion v. Ames

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the court.

. . . The cases cited, however, sufficiently indicate the grounds upon which this court has proceeded when determining the meaning and scope of the commerce clause. They show that commerce among the states embraces navigation, intercourse, communication, traffic, the transit of persons, and the transmission of messages by telegraph. They also show that the power to regulate commerce among the several states is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States; that such power is plenary, complete in itself, and may be exerted by Congress to its utmost extent, subject only to such limitations as the Constitution imposes upon the exercise of the powers granted by it; and that in determining the character of the regulations to be adopted Congress has a large discretion which is not to be controlled by the courts, simply because, in their opinion, such regulations may not be the best or most effective that could be employed.

We come, then, to inquire whether there is any solid foundation upon which to rest the contention that Congress may not regulate the carrying of lottery tickets from one state to another, at least by corporations or companies whose business it is, for hire, to carry tangible property from one state to another.
We are of opinion that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic, and therefore are subjects of commerce, and the regulation of the carriage of such tickets from state to state, at least by independent carriers, is a regulation of commerce among the several states.

But it is said that the statute in question does not regulate the carrying of lottery tickets from state to state, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress in effect prohibits such carrying; that in respect of the carrying from one state to another of articles or things that are, in fact, or according to usage in business, the subjects of commerce, the authority given Congress was not to prohibit, but only to regulate. This view was earnestly pressed at the bar by learned counsel, and must be examined.

It is to be remarked that the Constitution does not define what is to be deemed a legitimate regulation of interstate commerce. In Gibbons v. Ogden it was said that the power to regulate such commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which it is to be governed. But this general observation leaves it to be determined, when the question comes before the court, whether Congress, in prescribing a particular rule, has exceeded its power under the Constitution. While our government must be acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 405, 407), the Constitution does not attempt to set forth all the means by which such powers may be carried into execution. It leaves to Congress a large discretion as to the means that may be employed in executing a given power. The sound construction of the Constitution, this court has said, “must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.” 4 Wheat. 421.

We have said that the carrying from state to state of lottery tickets constitutes interstate commerce, and that the regulation of such commerce is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. Are we prepared to say that a provision which is, in effect, a prohibition of the carriage of such articles from state to state is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic, and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the states, and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means, within the scope of the Constitution, and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the states?

In determining whether regulation may not under some circumstances properly take the form or have the effect of prohibition, the nature of the interstate traffic which it was sought by the act of May 2d, 1895, to suppress cannot be overlooked. When enacting that statute Congress no doubt shared the views upon the subject of lotteries heretofore expressed by this court. In Phalen v. Virginia, 8 How. 163, 168, after observing that the suppression of nuisances injurious to public health or morality is among the most important duties of government, this court said: “Experience has shown that the common forms of gambling are comparatively innocuous when placed in contrast with the widespread pestilence of lotteries. The former are confined to a few persons and places, but the latter infests the whole community; it enters every dwelling; it reaches every class; it preys upon the hard earnings of the poor; it plunders the ignorant and simple.” In other cases we have adjudged that authority given by legislative enactment to carry on a lottery, although based upon a consideration in money, was not protected by the contract clause of the Constitution; this, for the reason that no state may bargain away its power to protect the public morals, nor excuse its failure to perform a public duty by saying that it had agreed, by legislative enactment, not to do so. Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814; Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U.S. 488.

If a state, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money, in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several states, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one state to another? In this connection it must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states is plenary, is complete in itself, and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution.

We decide nothing more in the present case than that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic among those who choose to sell or buy them; that the carriage of such tickets by independent carriers from one state to another is therefore interstate commerce; that under its power to regulate commerce among the several states Congress – subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the powers granted – has plenary authority over such commerce, and may prohibit the carriage of such tickets from state to state; and that legislation to that end, and of that character, is not inconsistent with any limitation or restriction imposed upon the exercise of the powers granted to Congress.

The lottery ticket purports to create contractual relations, and to furnish the means of enforcing a contract right.

This is true of insurance policies, and both are contingent in their nature. Yet this court has held that the issuing of fire, marine, and life insurance policies, in one state, and sending them to another, to be there delivered to the insured on payment of premium, is not interstate commerce. Paul v. Virginia, [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168 (1868)].

If a lottery ticket is not an article of commerce, how can it become so when placed in an envelope or box or other covering, and transported by an express company? To say that the mere carrying of an article which is not an article of commerce in and of itself nevertheless becomes such the moment it is to be transported from one state to another, is to transform a non-commercial article into a commercial one simply because it is transported. I cannot conceive that any such result can properly follow.

It would be to say that everything is an article of commerce the moment it is taken to be transported from place to place, and of interstate commerce if from state to state.

An invitation to dine, or to take a drive, or a note of introduction, all become articles of commerce under the ruling in this case, by being deposited with an express company for transportation. This in effect breaks down all the differences between that which is, and that which is not, an article of commerce, and the necessary consequence is to take from the states all jurisdiction over the subject so far as interstate communication is concerned. It is a long step in the direction of wiping out all traces of state lines, and the creation of a centralized government.

Houston, East & West Texas Railway v. United States (The Shreveport Rate Cases)

Justice HUGHES delivered the opinion of the court.

These suits were brought in the commerce court by the Houston, East & West Texas Railway Company and the Houston & Shreveport Railroad Company, and by the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, respectively, to set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, dated March 11, 1912, upon the ground that it exceeded the Commission's authority. Other railroad companies intervened in support of the petitions, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Railroad Commission of Louisiana intervened in opposition. The petitions were dismissed. 205 Fed. 380, 391.

The order of the Interstate Commerce Commission was made in a proceeding initiated in March, 1911, by the Railroad Commission of Louisiana. The complaint was that the appellants, and other interstate carriers, maintained unreasonable rates from Shreveport, Louisiana, to various points in Texas, and, further, that these carriers, in the adjustment of rates over their respective lines, unjustly discriminated in favor of traffic within the state of Texas, and against similar traffic between Louisiana and Texas. The carriers filed answers; numerous pleas of intervention by shippers and commercial bodies were allowed; testimony was taken and arguments were heard.

The gravamen of the complaint, said the Interstate Commerce Commission, was that the carriers made rates out of Dallas and other Texas points into eastern Texas which were much lower than those which they extended into Texas from Shreveport. The situation may be briefly described: Shreveport, Louisiana, is about 40 miles from the Texas state line, and 231 miles from Houston, Texas, on the line of the Houston, East & West Texas and Houston & Shreveport Companies (which are affiliated in interest); it is 189 miles from Dallas, Texas, on the line of the Texas & Pacific. Shreveport competes with both cities for the trade of the intervening territory. The rates on these lines from Dallas and Houston, respectively, eastward to intermediate points in Texas, were much less, according to distance, than from Shreveport westward to the same points. It is undisputed that the difference was substantial, and injuriously affected the commerce of Shreveport.
Congress is empowered to regulate, – that is, to provide the law for the government of interstate commerce; to enact “all appropriate legislation” for its “protection and advancement” (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 564); to adopt measures “to promote its growth and insure its safety” (Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U.S. 691, 696, 697); “to foster, protect, control, and restrain” (Second Employers' Liability Cases [Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.] 223 U.S. 1, 47, 53, 54. Its authority, extending to these interstate carriers as instruments of interstate commerce, necessarily embraces the right to control their operations in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance. As it is competent for Congress to legislate to these ends, unquestionably it may seek their attainment by requiring that the agencies of interstate commerce shall not be used in such manner as to cripple, retard, or destroy it. The fact that carriers are instruments of intrastate commerce, as well as of interstate commerce, does not derogate from the complete and paramount authority of Congress over the latter, or preclude the Federal power from being exerted to prevent the intrastate operations of such carriers from being made a means of injury to that which has been confided to Federal care. Wherever the interstate and intrastate transactions of carriers are so related that the government of the one involves the control of the other, it is Congress, and not the state, that is entitled to prescribe the final and dominant rule, for otherwise Congress would be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority, and the state, and not the nation, would be supreme within the national field.

It is to be noted – as the government has well said in its argument in support of the Commission's order – that the power to deal with the relation between the two kinds of rates, as a relation, lies exclusively with Congress. It is manifest that the state cannot fix the relation of the carrier's interstate and intrastate charges without directly interfering with the former, unless it simply follows the standard set by Federal authority. This question was presented with respect to the long and short haul provision of the Kentucky Constitution, adopted in 1891, which the court had before it in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eubank, 184 U.S. 27. The state court had construed this provision as embracing a long haul, from a place outside to one within the state, and a shorter haul on the same line and in the same direction between points within the state. This court held that, so construed, the provision was invalid as being a regulation of interstate commerce because “it linked the interstate rate to the rate for the shorter haul, and thus the interstate charge was directly controlled by the state law.” See 230 U.S. at 428, 429. It is for Congress to supply the needed correction where the relation between intrastate and interstate rates presents the evil to be corrected, and this it may do completely, by reason of its control over the interstate carrier in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that it is necessary or appropriate to exercise the control for the effective government of that commerce.

. . . Congress, in the exercise of its paramount power, may prevent the common instrumentalities of interstate and intrastate commercial intercourse from being used in their intrastate operations to the injury of interstate commerce. This is not to say that Congress possesses the authority to regulate the internal commerce of a state, as such, but that it does possess the power to foster and protect interstate commerce, and to take all measures necessary or appropriate to that end, although intrastate transactions of interstate carriers may thereby be controlled.
Justice DAY delivered the opinion of the Court.

The controlling question for decision is: Is it within the authority of Congress in regulating commerce among the states to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of manufactured goods, the product of a factory in which, within thirty days prior to their removal therefrom, children under the age of fourteen have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p.m., or before the hour of 6 o'clock a.m.?

The act in its effect does not regulate transportation among the states, but aims to standardize the ages at which children may be employed in mining and manufacturing within the states. The goods shipped are of themselves harmless. The act permits them to be freely shipped after thirty days from the time of their removal from the factory. When offered for shipment, and before transportation begins, the labor of their production is over, and the mere fact that they were intended for interstate commerce transportation does not make their production subject to federal control under the commerce power.

Commerce “consists of intercourse and traffic . . . and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities.” The making of goods and the mining of coal are not commerce, nor does the fact that these things are to be afterwards shipped, or used in interstate commerce, make their production a part thereof. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co. v. Yurkonis, 238 U.S. 439.

Over interstate transportation, or its incidents, the regulatory power of Congress is ample, but the production of articles, intended for interstate commerce, is a matter of local regulation. “When the commerce begins is determined, not by the character of the commodity, nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another state for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation, but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation, or the actual commencement of its transfer to another state.” Mr. Justice Jackson in Re Greene (C. C.) 52 Fed. 113. This principle has been recognized often in this court. Coe v. Errol, 116 U.S. 517; Bacon v. Illinois, 227 U. S. 504, and cases cited. If it were otherwise, all manufacture intended for interstate shipment would be brought under federal control to the practical exclusion of the authority of the states, a result certainly not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when they vested in Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1, 21.

The grant of power of Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the states in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture.

The single question in this case is whether Congress has power to prohibit the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of any product of a cotton mill situated in the United States, in which within thirty days before the removal of the product children under fourteen have been employed, or children between fourteen and sixteen have been employed more than eight hours in a day, or more than six days in any week, or between seven in the evening and six in the morning. The objection urged against the power is that the States have exclusive control over their methods of production and that Congress cannot meddle with them, and taking the proposition in the sense of direct intermeddling I agree to it and suppose that no one denies it. But if an act is within the powers specifically conferred upon Congress, it seems to me that it is not made any less constitutional because of the indirect effects that it may have, however obvious it may be that it will have those effects, and that we are not at liberty upon such grounds to hold it void.

The first step in my argument is to make plain what no one is likely to dispute – that the statute in question is within the power expressly given to Congress if considered only as to its immediate effects and that if invalid it is so only upon some collateral ground. The statute confines itself to prohibiting the carriage of certain goods in interstate or foreign commerce. Congress is given power to regulate such commerce in unqualified terms. It would not be argued today that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. Regulation means the prohibition of something, and when interstate commerce is the matter to be regulated I cannot doubt that the regulation may prohibit any part of such commerce that Congress sees fit to forbid. At all events it is established by the Lottery Case and others that have followed it that a law is not beyond the regulative power of Congress merely because it prohibits certain transportation out and out. Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S. 321, 355, 359.

The Act does not meddle with anything belonging to the States. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like. But when they seek to send their products across the State line they are no longer within their rights. If there were no Constitution and no Congress their power to cross the line would depend upon their neighbors. Under the Constitution such commerce belongs not to the States but to Congress to regulate. It may carry out its views of public policy whatever indirect effect they may have upon the activities of the States. Instead of being encountered by a prohibitive tariff at her boundaries the State encounters the public policy of the United States which it is for Congress to express. The public policy of the United States is shaped with a view to the benefit of the nation as a whole. If, as has been the case within the memory of men still living, a State should take a different view of the propriety of sustaining a lottery from that which generally prevails, I cannot believe that the fact would require a different decision from that reached in Champion v. Ames. Yet in that case it would be said with quite as much force as in this that Congress was attempting to intermeddle with the State's domestic affairs. The national welfare as understood by Congress may require a different attitude within its sphere from that of some self-seeking State. It seems to me entirely constitutional for Congress to enforce its understanding by all the means at its command.
§ 6.2  The Holmesian Era: The Post-1937 Broadening of Federal Commerce Power

The practical result of formalist-era doctrine was that it was left to states to deal with problems of working conditions, monopoly practices, or child labor, and business interests could play one state off against another by threatening to relocate if any state regulated too vigorously.\(^\text{11}\) In 1937, this formalist analysis gave way to a Holmesian analysis which took note of the felt necessities of the times. This took place in 1937 after moderate formalists, Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts, changed their minds regarding a proper interpretation of the Commerce Clause and joined non-formalist Justices Brandies, Stone, and Cardozo to make a 5-Justice non-formalist majority.

As noted at § 6.1 n.6, in the mid-1930s the formalist-era Court indicated a willingness to invalidate much of President Roosevelt's "New Deal," including regulations of agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, through following the \textit{E.C. Knight} doctrine that “commerce succeeds to” agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, and is not part of it until transportation occurs. In the Spring of 1937, subsequent to his and the Democratic Party’s landslide victory in the 1936 election, President Roosevelt sought to enlarge the Court in order to “pack” it with Justices who would change the formalist-era Commerce Clause doctrine and uphold "New Deal" economic regulations. Roosevelt’s specific proposal was to add one new Justice for each current Justice over 70 years of age, if that Justice did not retire within six months. In 1937, this would have given Roosevelt 6 new appointments to the Court, increasing the Court’s membership from 9 to 15, and would have tipped the balance on the Court in favor of upholding “New Deal” regulations.\(^\text{12}\) As noted at § 10.1 text following n.3, it is up to Congress to determine the size of the Court.

Before the “Court-Packing Plan” was considered by Congress, Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts, who had sided more often with formalists prior to 1937, but who were moderate formalists with Holmesian leanings, began to decide cases upholding the power of Congress and the states to regulate economic matters.\(^\text{13}\) Given this shift, the “Court-Packing Plan” became unnecessary and it died in Congress during the summer of 1937. At the time, because it appeared the switch was linked to the “Court-Packing Plan,” this switch in voting gave rise to the phrase, “the switch in time that saved nine.” As subsequent historical documents reveal, the initial shift in voting was made at one of the Court’s weekly conferences after the November, 1936 elections, which Roosevelt won in a landslide, but before the “Court-Packing Plan” was announced in 1937.\textsuperscript{14} The rejection of formalism continued after 1937 because President Roosevelt got to make a number of Court appointments between 1937 and 1941, allowing him to replace all four extreme formalists then on the Court – Justices Van DeVanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler – with non-formalists.

Indeed, Chief Justice Hughes had already broke with the formalist Justices in a related \textit{Lochner} “liberty of contract” case in June, 1936 in \textit{Morehead v. People of the State of New York ex rel. Tipaldo}, 298 U.S. 587 (1936) (New York minimum wage law for women unconstitutional); \textit{id. at} 618-19, 631 (Hughes, C.J., joined by Brandies, Stone & Cardozo, JJ., dissenting). Justice Roberts still voted with the formalist Justices in \textit{Tipaldo} to create a 5-4 opinion striking down the law, discussed at § 17.1.2 nn.24-25.

With regard to the first issue of interpretation under the Commerce Clause, the Holmesian Court adopted the view that commercial activities like agriculture, manufacturing, or mining, in addition to buying, selling, and transportation, and disposing of goods as well, met the first part of the Commerce Clause test that the regulation be a regulation of “commerce” because all such economic activity is part of the “stream of commerce.” Thus, in 1937, in \textit{NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.},\textsuperscript{15} the Court held that Congress can regulate any activity, not merely railroad transportation at issue in \textit{The Shreveport Rate Cases}, even though it has an intrastate character, if the activity is in the “stream of commerce” and has such a “close and substantial relation” to interstate commerce that control is appropriate to attain a legitimate end.

With regard to the second issue, the Court concluded that even indirect, secondary, or remote affects upon interstate commerce could satisfy the requirement that commerce was commerce “among the States” as long as the affects upon interstate commerce were “substantial.” Thus, in 1937, in \textit{Jones & Laughlin},\textsuperscript{16} the Court made much of the fact that the business was engaged in nationwide operations. In 1939, the Court held in \textit{NLRB v. Fainblatt} that the NLRB could also reach small garment manufacturers because small units, in the aggregate, contribute to a vast amount of commerce. In 1941, the Court held in \textit{United States v. Darby},\textsuperscript{18} excerpted below, that a purpose to control some aspect of local activity is irrelevant, and Congress can exclude from interstate commerce all goods produced in substandard conditions, overruling \textit{Hammer v. Dagenhart}.

In 1942, in \textit{Wickard v. Filburn},\textsuperscript{19} excerpted below, Justice Jackson said for the Court that even if an activity is local, it can be regulated by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic affect when taken together with actions of others similarly situated. Thus, in \textit{Wickard}, the Court upheld the Agricultural Adjustment Act’s wheat allocation provisions, as applied to a wheat farmer who grew wheat, mostly for use as feed on his own farm, on only 23 acres of land. This was so because while “appellee’s own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial . . ., his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial.” In 1944, Justice Black wrote for the Court in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association that a nationwide business is not deprived of its interstate character merely because it is built on local sales contracts. This case rejected the limitation upon congressional power stated in Paul v. Virginia, where in 1868 the Court stated in dicta that Congress could not regulate the insurance industry, saying that such a business based on local contracts was not in interstate commerce.

As a result of these cases, the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause was much changed from 1936 to 1944. In 1936, Congress could only regulate interstate commerce, with commerce defined as buying, selling, and transportation, and activities directly affecting interstate commerce, such as occurred in Shreveport Rate. Congress could not regulate intrastate activities such as agriculture, manufacturing, and mining that affect interstate commerce only indirectly, such as the effect of shipment after production or transactions after goods have come to rest. By 1944, however, Congress could regulate any economic activity, including agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, if, considered in the aggregate, that activity could exert a substantial economic affect on interstate commerce so that federal regulation would be an appropriate means to obtain a legitimate end.

This doctrine edged quite close to the view of congressional power in Gibbons v. Ogden. The only apparent difference is that under Gibbons Congress could regulate any commercial activity which “concerns more States than one,” while under the Holmesian-era doctrine, the commercial activity had to have a “substantial affect” on interstate commerce for Congress to regulate. In practice, however, these two formulations are almost identical, given the Wickard aggregation principle, discussed above, that even if an activity is local, it can be regulated by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic affect when taken together with actions of others “similarly situated.” The Wickard principle virtually ensures that any economic activity which “concerns more States than one” would be viewed by the Court as having a “substantial affect” on interstate commerce.

United States v. Darby

Justice STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The two principal questions raised by the record in this case are, first, whether Congress has constitutional power to prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of lumber manufactured by employees whose wages are less than a prescribed minimum or whose weekly hours of labor at that wage are greater than a prescribed maximum, and, second, whether it has power to prohibit the employment of workmen in the production of goods “for interstate commerce” at other than prescribed wages and hours.

The Fair Labor Standards Act set up a comprehensive legislative scheme for preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of certain products and commodities produced in the United States under labor conditions as respects wages and hours which fail to conform to standards set up by the Act. Its purpose, as we judicially know from the declaration of policy in § 2(a) of the Act, and the reports of Congressional committees proposing the legislation, S.Rept. No. 884, 75th Cong. 1st Sess.; H.Rept. No. 1452, 75th Cong. 1st Sess.; H.Rept. No. 2182, 75th Cong. 3d Sess., Conference Report, H.Rept. No. 2738, 75th Cong. 3d Sess., is to exclude from interstate commerce goods produced for . . . interstate commerce, under conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standards of living necessary for health and general well-being; and to prevent the use of interstate commerce as the means of competition in the distribution of goods so produced, and as the means of spreading and perpetuating such substandard labor conditions.

The power of Congress over interstate commerce “is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed by the constitution.” Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, 9 Wheat. 196. That power can neither be enlarged nor diminished by the exercise or non-exercise of state power. Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., [299 U.S. 334]. Congress, following its own conception of public policy concerning the restrictions which may appropriately be imposed on interstate commerce, is free to exclude from the commerce articles whose use in the states for which they are destined it may conceive to be injurious to the public health, morals or welfare, even though the state has not sought to regulate their use. Reid v. Colorado, [187 U.S. 137]; Lottery Case, [Ames, 188 U.S. 321]; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, [220 U.S. 45]; Hoke v. United States, [227 U.S. 308].

In the more than a century which has elapsed since the decision of Gibbons v. Ogden, these principles of constitutional interpretation have been so long and repeatedly recognized by this Court as applicable to the Commerce Clause, that there would be little occasion for repeating them now were it not for the decision of this Court twenty-two years ago in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 [(1918)]. In that case it was held by a bare majority of the Court over the powerful and now classic dissent of Mr. Justice Holmes setting forth the fundamental issues involved, that Congress was without power to exclude the products of child labor from interstate commerce. The reasoning and conclusion of the Court's opinion there cannot be reconciled with the conclusion which we have reached, that the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause is plenary to exclude any article from interstate commerce subject only to the specific prohibitions of the Constitution.

Hammer v. Dagenhart has not been followed. The distinction on which the decision was rested that Congressional power to prohibit interstate commerce is limited to articles which in themselves have some harmful or deleterious property – a distinction which was novel when made and unsupported by any provision of the Constitution – has long since been abandoned. Brooks v. United States, supra; Kentucky Whip & Collar Co. v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities & Exchange Commission, 303 U.S. 419; Mulford v. Smith, 307 U.S. 38. The thesis of the opinion that the motive of the prohibition or its effect to control in some measure the use or production within the states of the article thus excluded from the commerce can operate to deprive the regulation of its constitutional authority has long since ceased to have force. Reid v. Colorado, supra; Lottery Case, supra; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, supra; Seven Cases v. United States,
The conclusion is inescapable that Hammer v. Dagenhart, was a departure from the principles which have prevailed in the interpretation of the commerce clause both before and since the decision and that such vitality, as a precedent, as it then had has long since been exhausted. It should be and now is overruled.

There remains the question whether such restriction on the production of goods for commerce is a permissible exercise of the commerce power. The power of Congress over interstate commerce is not confined to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. See McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421. Cf. United States v. Ferger, 250 U.S. 199.

In the absence of Congressional legislation on the subject state laws which are not regulations of the commerce itself or its instrumentalities are not forbidden even though they affect interstate commerce. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1; Bacon v. Illinois, 227 U.S. 504; Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co., 260 U.S. 245; Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord, 262 U.S. 172.

But it does not follow that Congress may not by appropriate legislation regulate intrastate activities where they have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 303 U.S. 453, 466. A recent example is the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., for the regulation of employer and employee relations in industries in which strikes, induced by unfair labor practices named in the Act, tend to disturb or obstruct interstate commerce. See National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 38, 40; National Labor Relations Board v. Fainblatt, 306 U.S. 601, 604, and cases cited. But long before the adoption of the National Labor Relations Act, this Court had many times held that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce extends to the regulation through legislative action of activities intrastate which have a substantial effect on the commerce or the exercise of the Congressional power over it.

Wickard v. Filburn
317 U.S. 111 (1942)

Justice JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellee filed his complaint against the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, three members of the County Agricultural Conservation Committee for Montgomery County, Ohio, and a member of the State Agricultural Conservation Committee for Ohio. He sought to enjoin enforcement against himself of the marketing penalty imposed by the amendment of May 26, 1941, to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, upon that part of his 1941 wheat crop which was available for marketing in excess of the marketing quota established for his farm. He also sought a declaratory judgment that the wheat marketing quota provisions of the Act as amended and applicable to him were unconstitutional because not sustainable under the Commerce Clause or consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

The appellee for many years past has owned and operated a small farm in Montgomery County, Ohio, maintaining a herd of dairy cattle, selling milk, raising poultry, and selling poultry and eggs. It has been his practice to raise a small acreage of winter wheat, sown in the Fall and harvested in the following July; to sell a portion of the crop; to feed part to poultry and livestock on the farm, some of which is sold; to use some in making flour for home consumption; and to keep the rest for the following seeding. The intended disposition of the crop here involved has not been expressly stated.

In July of 1940, pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as then amended, there were established for the appellee's 1941 crop a wheat acreage allotment of 11.1 acres and a normal yield of 20.1 bushels of wheat an acre. He was given notice of such allotment in July of 1940 before the Fall planting of his 1941 crop of wheat, and again in July of 1941, before it was harvested. He sowed, however, 23 acres, and harvested from his 11.9 acres of excess acreage 239 bushels, which under the terms of the Act as amended on May 26, 1941, constituted farm marketing excess, subject to a penalty of 49 cents a bushel, or $117.11 in all. The appellee has not paid the penalty and he has not postponed or avoided it by storing the excess under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or by delivering it up to the Secretary. The Committee, therefore, refused him a marketing card, which was, under the terms of Regulations promulgated by the Secretary, necessary to protect a buyer from liability to the penalty and upon its protecting lien.

The general scheme of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 as related to wheat is to control the volume moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses and shortages and the consequent abnormally low or high wheat prices and obstructions to commerce. Within prescribed limits and by prescribed standards the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to ascertain and proclaim each year a national acreage allotment for the next crop of wheat, which is then apportioned to the states and their counties, and is eventually broken up into allotments for individual farms. Loans and payments to wheat farmers are authorized in stated circumstances.

The maintenance by government regulation of a price for wheat undoubtedly can be accomplished as effectively by sustaining or increasing the demand as by limiting the supply. The effect of the statute before us is to restrict the amount which may be produced for market and the extent as well to which one may forestall resort to the market by producing to meet his own needs. That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial.
It is well established by decisions of this Court that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate the prices at which commodities in that commerce are dealt in and practices affecting such prices. One of the primary purposes of the Act in question was to increase the market price of wheat and to that end to limit the volume thereof that could affect the market. It can hardly be denied that a factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. This may arise because being in marketable condition such wheat overhangs the market and if induced by rising prices tends to flow into the market and check price increases. But if we assume that it is never marketed, it supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market. Home-grown wheat in this sense competes with wheat in commerce. The stimulation of commerce is a use of the regulatory function quite as definitely as prohibitions or restrictions thereon. This record leaves us in no doubt that Congress may properly have considered that wheat consumed on the farm where grown if wholly outside the scheme of regulation would have a substantial effect in defeating and obstructing its purpose to stimulate trade therein at increased prices.

§ 6.3 The Instrumentalist Era: Further Broadening of Federal Commerce Power

During the instrumentalist era between 1954 and 1986, the Court not only edged closer to the Gibbons v. Ogden formulation, but went beyond the Gibbons formulation of when a commercial activity meets the Commerce Clause test of being “commerce among the several States.”

With regard to the first part of the Commerce Clause test, whether the activity being regulated is “commerce,” dicta in some of the instrumentalist-era cases suggested that a finding that the activity is commercial in nature is no longer required. It would be enough if the activity, whether commercial or not, had the requisite affect on interstate commerce to satisfy the “among the States” prong of what previously had been regarded as a two-pronged test. Thus, in Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States,21 the Court stated that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was constitutional, because the activity it regulated, racial discrimination at hotels generally open to the public, affected the movement of persons across state lines. If individuals knew they could be discriminated against on racial grounds, they would be less likely to travel. Similarly, in Perez v. United States,22 a criminal law banning extortionate credit transactions was constitutional because of the affect of extortionate credit on interstate organized crime. Indeed, Congress was permitted to require in *Preseault v. Interstate Commerce Commission*23 the preservation of railroad rights-of-way not currently in service, allowing interim use of the land as a recreational trail. The Court held that Congress could decide that every line is a potentially valuable national asset that could eventually affect interstate commerce, and thus merits preservation, even if no future rail use is currently foreseeable.
With regard to the second issue of what constitutes commerce “among the states,” the Gibbons formulation only required that the commerce “affects other states,” without a requirement that this affect be “substantial.” In Hodel v. Indiana and in Russell v. United States, the majority opinions also spoke of an “affect” on commerce, but did not specify that the affect must be "substantial," language which provoked Justice Rehnquist, concurring in Hodel, to insist on the Holmesian-era phrasing that Congress can regulate intrastate activity only if it has a "substantial" affect on commerce. In addition, the instrumentalist cases made clear, in cases like Katzenbach v. McClung, that the test for whether an activity "affects interstate commerce" is not what a court concludes from its own independent review of the facts, but whether there is any “rational basis” for a finding by Congress that a class of activity, in the aggregate, affects interstate commerce. In addition, the particular intrastate activity involved in the litigation need not itself affect commerce where the general activity regulated by the statute, in the aggregate, affects commerce. And it is not necessary that every facet of a program directly relate to a valid congressional goal. It is enough that the entire scheme, as a whole, satisfy the McCulloch test of being “rationally related to a legitimate government interest.” All of these instrumentalist-era doctrines support broad federal power to regulate, which is consistent with a liberal instrumentalist judicial predisposition to support governmental regulatory programs in general.

This line of cases did not directly alter the two-part Commerce Clause test, however, because in each case economic activity was being regulated. Thus, the civil rights law in Heart of Atlanta Motel involved the economic transaction of renting a hotel room. The criminal law in Perez involved the economic crime of extortionate credit. Even the railroad right-of-way in Preseault involved something that was a potentially valuable economic asset. Thus, although the general reasoning in these cases seemed to dispense with an independent requirement that the activity being regulated be commerce, and focused only on whether the activity being regulated had an affect on interstate commerce, the core holdings of each of the cases involved an activity with a clear economic nexus.

Katzenbach v. McClung

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case was argued with No. 515, Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States, decided this date, 379 U.S. 241, in which we upheld the constitutional validity of Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 against an attack on hotels, motels, and like establishments. This complaint for injunctive relief against appellants attacks the constitutionality of the Act as applied to a restaurant. The case was heard by a three-judge United States District Court and an injunction was issued restraining appellants from enforcing the Act against the restaurant. 233 F. Supp. 815. On direct appeal, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1252, 1253 (1958 ed.), we noted probable jurisdiction. 379 U.S. 802. We now reverse.

Ollie's Barbecue is a family-owned restaurant in Birmingham, Alabama, specializing in barbecued meats and homemade pies, with a seating capacity of 220 customers. It is located on a state highway 11 blocks from an interstate one and a somewhat greater distance from railroad and bus stations. The restaurant caters to a family and white-collar trade with a take-out service for Negroes. It employs 36 persons, two-thirds of whom are Negroes.

In the 12 months preceding the passage of the Act, the restaurant purchased locally approximately $150,000 worth of food, $69,683 or 46% of which was meat that it bought from a local supplier who had procured it from outside the State. The District Court expressly found that a substantial portion of the food served in the restaurant had moved in interstate commerce. The restaurant has refused to serve Negroes in its dining accommodations since its original opening in 1927, and since July 2, 1964, it has been operating in violation of the Act. The court below concluded that if it were required to serve Negroes it would lose a substantial amount of business.

Ollie's Barbecue admits that it is covered by these provisions of the Act. The Government makes no contention that the discrimination at the restaurant was supported by the State of Alabama. There is no claim that interstate travelers frequented the restaurant. The sole question, therefore, narrows down to whether Title II, as applied to a restaurant annually receiving about $70,000 worth of food which has moved in commerce, is a valid exercise of the power of Congress. The Government has contended that Congress had ample basis upon which to find that racial discrimination at restaurants which receive from out of state a substantial portion of the food served does, in fact, impose commercial burdens of national magnitude upon interstate commerce.

It goes without saying that, viewed in isolation, the volume of food purchased by Ollie's Barbecue from sources supplied from out of state was insignificant when compared with the total foodstuffs moving in commerce. But, as our late Brother Jackson said for the Court in Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942): “That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial.” At 127-128.

We noted in Heart of Atlanta Motel that a number of witnesses attested to the fact that racial discrimination was not merely a state or regional problem but was one of nationwide scope. Against this background, we must conclude that while the focus of the legislation was on the individual restaurant's relation to interstate commerce, Congress appropriately considered the importance of that connection with the knowledge that the discrimination was but “representative of many others throughout the country, the total incidence of which if left unchecked may well become far-reaching in its harm to commerce.” Polish National Alliance of U.S. v. National Labor Relations Board, 322 U.S. 643, 648 (1944).
Congress has determined for itself that refusals of service to Negroes have imposed burdens both upon the interstate flow of food and upon the movement of products generally. Of course, the mere fact that Congress has said when particular activity shall be deemed to affect commerce does not preclude further examination by this Court. But where we find that the legislators, in light of the facts and testimony before them, have a rational basis for finding a chosen regulatory scheme necessary to the protection of commerce, our investigation is at an end. The only remaining question— one answered in the affirmative by the court below— is whether the particular restaurant either serves or offers to serve interstate travelers or serves food a substantial portion of which has moved in interstate commerce.

Confronted as we are with the facts laid before Congress, we must conclude that it had a rational basis for finding that racial discrimination in restaurants had a direct and adverse effect on the free flow of interstate commerce. Insofar as the sections of the Act here relevant are concerned, §§ 201(b)(2) and (c), Congress prohibited discrimination only in those establishments having a close tie to interstate commerce, i.e., those, like the McClungs’, serving food that has come from out of the State. We think in so doing that Congress acted well within its power to protect and foster commerce in extending the coverage of Title II only to those restaurants offering to serve interstate travelers or serving food, a substantial portion of which has moved in interstate commerce.

The absence of direct evidence connecting discriminatory restaurant service with the flow of interstate food, a factor on which the appellees place much reliance, is not, given the evidence as to the effect of such practices on other aspects of commerce, a crucial matter.

The power of Congress in this field is broad and sweeping; where it keeps within its sphere and violates no express constitutional limitation it has been the rule of this Court, going back almost to the founding days of the Republic, not to interfere. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, as here applied, we find to be plainly appropriate in the resolution of what the Congress found to be a national commercial problem of the first magnitude. We find it in no violation of any express limitations of the Constitution and we therefore declare it valid.

§ 6.4  The Modern Natural Law Era: Return to the 2-Part Commerce Clause Test

In 1995, in United States v. Lopez,28 excerpted below, the Supreme Court summarized Commerce Clause precedents as holding that where “commerce” is involved, commerce “among the states” exists in three kinds of cases: (1) regulating “the use of the channels of interstate commerce,” as in the lottery case, Champion v. Ames; (2) protecting “the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities,” as in The Shreveport Rate Cases; and (3) regulating “those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce,” as in the Darby and Wickard cases.

Two main issues have framed the Court’s recent elaboration of this Commerce Clause doctrine. The first is whether the Holmesian-era “substantial affects” test or the Gibbons v. Ogden and instrumentalist-era “affects” test will be used to determine commerce “among the States.” The second is whether to keep the traditional requirement that the activity regulated be “commerce,” or to adopt the suggestion in dicta in the instrumentalist-era cases that no independent “commerce” requirement need be satisfied and any activity can be regulated, whether economic or not, as long as that activity affects interstate commerce.

With regard to the first issue, as a doctrinal matter, there is much less to the debate than may initially appear. Even under the Holmesian-era “substantial affects” test, the Wickard aggregation analysis has meant that even very local affects can be regulated by Congress as long as the local affect exerts a substantial economic affect when taken together with actions of other similarly situated parties. Further, instrumentalist-era judges, as well as judges following the natural law approach of Marshall in cases like Gibbons and McCulloch, agree that the test is not what the Court must find, but whether there is any rational basis for a finding by Congress that a class of activity, in the aggregate, sufficiently affects interstate commerce. Given this, if the underlying activity being regulated is truly economic activity, it is likely that the substantial affects test will be met.

In Lopez, a 5-4 Court held that Congress violated its Commerce Clause powers in adopting the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, which banned gun possession within 1000 feet of any school. In an opinion authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court required that the congressional legislation must apply to activity that "substantially affects" interstate commerce. Justices O’Connor and Kennedy joined Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas in this holding. Despite the “affects” language being more faithful to Chief Justice Marshall’s opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, where the test was phrased only as whether the regulation “affects” or “concerns” more states than one, the history of precedents since 1937 using the “substantial affects” language appears to have convinced natural law Justices Kennedy and O’Connor to adopt that terminology today. In contrast, Justice Breyer’s dissent in Lopez, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter and Ginsburg, concluded that the Court should have adopted a “significant affects” test. Acknowledging that the Court had used various phrases to describe how much “affect” was required, Justice Breyer settled on the term “significant” because “the word ‘substantial’ implies a somewhat narrower power than recent precedents suggest.”

The second issue in the modern Commerce Clause cases – whether to keep the traditional requirement that the activity regulated be “commerce,” or to adopt the suggestion in dicta in the instrumentalist-era cases that no independent requirement need be done and that any activity, whether economic or not, can be regulated by Congress under the Commerce Clause as long as that activity affects interstate commerce – was also in the backdrop in Lopez. Justice Rehnquist noted in Lopez that the statute had nothing to do with “commerce” or any sort of economic enterprise.\(^{31}\) In his dissent, Justice Breyer rejected the notion that the regulated activity must itself be commerce as distinguished from its affect on commerce. He added that, in any event, schools serve both social and commercial purposes.\(^{32}\) Justice Rehnquist replied to Justice Breyer by stating that under Breyer's approach Congress could regulate not only all violent crimes, but also all activities that might lead to violent crime, including marriage, divorce, and custody, and Congress could regulate the educational process directly, based on a hypothetical substantial effect on interstate commerce.\(^{33}\)

All of these arguments were underdeveloped in Lopez, however, because of the 5-4 majority’s conclusion that the mere possession of a gun around a school did not substantially affect interstate commerce in any event. However, this second issue regarding whether the activity being regulated must be “commerce” in some sense came to the forefront in United States v. Morrison,\(^{34}\) excerpted below. Morrison involved the constitutionality of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (VAWA). That Act allowed victims of “gender-motivated violence” to bring federal civil-rights lawsuits against their attackers. In Morrison, it was relatively undisputed, as noted in Justice Souter’s dissent, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, that Congress had assembled a mountain of data regarding the effects on interstate commerce caused by lost days from work and lost productivity as a result of violence against women. Under the general reasoning of the instrumentalist-era precedents, that substantial affect would permit Congress to regulate without finding that the activity being regulated was commercial in nature.

For the 5-Justice majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist replied that it was not enough to find that the cost of crime and work days lost by victims had a substantial effect on commerce. That would permit Congress “to regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce.” Instead, the majority concluded that Congress may not regulate “noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct’s aggregate affect on interstate commerce.” This conclusion is consistent with the core holdings of the instrumentalist-era cases, which all involved some aspect of commercial activity. Thus, based upon the actual holdings, Rehnquist could accurately conclude in Morrison, “The regulation and punishment of intrastate violence that is not directed at the instrumentalities, channels, or goods involved in interstate commerce has always been the province of the States.”\(^{35}\)

Looking to the future, it seems clear that Lopez and Morrison, while important, do not represent a major shift from the Court’s Commerce Clause doctrine. Thus, Heart of Atlanta Motel and Katzenbach v. McClung are still good law upholding congressional power to pass civil rights laws regarding renting a hotel room or buying food in a restaurant, as is Perez, regarding congressional power over economic criminal activity. And Wickard is still good law regarding aggregating affects on interstate commerce. In addition, without regard to any “substantial affects” analysis, Congress can also regulate under the first two categories listed in Lopez, use of the channels of interstate commerce (ala Ames) and protecting instrumentalities of interstate commerce (ala Shreveport Rate).

For example, five days after Lopez was handed down, the Court issue a unanimous per curiam decision in United States v. Robertson. Without regard to whether a single gold mine in Alaska had a substantial affect on interstate commerce, the Court held that Congress could regulate the ownership and operation of a gold mine in Alaska because some goods used at the mine had moved in interstate commerce, and some workers at the mine had come from out of state. Thus, under Champion v. Ames, Congress was regulating “the use of the channels of interstate commerce.” Under the second category listed in Lopez, Congress can also regulate purely intrastate activities if they threaten the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, because that congressional regulation would then be “necessary and proper” to advance legitimate governmental ends, as it was in The Shreveport Rate Cases.

An example of how all of these various theories give Congress great power to regulate activities with an economic nexus of any kind occurred in 2005 in Gonzales v. Raich, excerpted below. In Raich, a 6-3 Court upheld application of the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA) to intrastate growers and users of marijuana for medical purposes under the provisions of California law. The majority opinion by Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Kennedy, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, reasoned, citing Wickard v. Filburn, that there was a rational basis for Congress to find that failure to regulate this class of activity could result, in the aggregate, in a substantial affect on the broad market for illegal drugs that Congress was regulating by the CSA. Lopez and Morrison were distinguishable because the laws in those cases did not regulate economic activity, whereas the activities regulated by the CSA, involving the production, distribution, and consumption of commodities, were “quintessentially economic.” Justice Scalia, concurring, said that in addition to a power to regulate activities having a substantial affect on interstate commerce, Congress has power under the The Shreveport Rate Cases to make its regulations of interstate commerce effective. Justice Scalia noted that even Lopez suggested that “Congress may regulate even noneconomic local activity if that regulation is a necessary part of a more general regulation of interstate commerce.”

United States v. Lopez

Chief Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

In the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, Congress made it a federal offense “for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone.” 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(A) (1988 ed., Supp. V). [FN1 The term “school zone” is defined as “in, or on the grounds of, a public, parochial or private school” or “within a distance of 1,000 feet from the grounds of a public, parochial or private school.” § 921(a)(25).] The Act neither regulates a commercial activity nor contains a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce. We hold that the Act exceeds the authority of Congress “[t]o regulate Commerce . . . among the several States. . . .” U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3

[W]e have identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate under its commerce power. First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce. See, e.g., Darby, 312 U.S., at 114; Heart of Atlanta Motel, [379 U.S.], at 256 (“T]he authority of Congress to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from immoral and injurious uses has been frequently sustained, and is no longer open to question.” (quoting Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 491 (1917) [citing Lottery Case, Champion v. Ames, 188 U.S., at 321, 357]). Second, Congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities. See, e.g., Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342 (1914); Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U.S. 20 (1911) (upholding amendments to Safety Appliance Act as applied to vehicles used in intrastate commerce); Perez, [402 U.S.], at 150 (“F]or example, the destruction of an aircraft (18 U.S.C. § 32), or . . . thefts from interstate shipments (18 U.S.C. § 659”). Finally, Congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, Jones & Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S., at 37, i.e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce, Wirtz, [392 U.S.], at 196, n.27.

Within this final category, admittedly, our case law has not been clear whether an activity must “affect” or “substantially affect” interstate commerce in order to be within Congress' power to regulate it under the Commerce Clause. Compare Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S. 1, 17 (1990), with Wirtz, supra, at 196, n.27 (the Court has never declared that “Congress may use a relatively trivial impact on commerce as an excuse for broad general regulation of state or private activities”). We cultivation and personal possession and use of marijuana for medicinal purposes has no apparent commercial character.” Even if the activity was commercial in some sense, Justice O'Connor concluded, “There is simply no evidence that homegrown medicinal marijuana users constitute, in the aggregate, a sizable enough class to have a discernable, let alone substantial, impact on the national illicit drug market – or otherwise to threaten the CSA regime.” Id. at 49-56 (O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Thomas, J., as to all but Part III, dissenting).

conclude, consistent with the great weight of our case law, that the proper test requires an analysis of whether the regulated activity “substantially affects” interstate commerce.

We now turn to consider the power of Congress, in the light of this framework, to enact § 922(q). The first two categories of authority may be quickly disposed of: § 922(q) is not a regulation of the use of the channels of interstate commerce, nor is it an attempt to prohibit the interstate transportation of a commodity through the channels of commerce; nor can § 922(q) be justified as a regulation by which Congress has sought to protect an instrumentality of interstate commerce or a thing in interstate commerce. Thus, if § 922(q) is to be sustained, it must be under the third category as a regulation of an activity that substantially affects interstate commerce.

Section 922(q) is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with “commerce” or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms. Section 922(q) is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated. It cannot, therefore, be sustained under our cases upholding regulations of activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce.

Although as part of our independent evaluation of constitutionality under the Commerce Clause we of course consider legislative findings, and indeed even congressional committee findings, regarding effect on interstate commerce, see, e.g., Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S., at 17, the Government concedes that “[n]either the statute nor its legislative history contain[s] express congressional findings regarding the effects upon interstate commerce of gun possession in a school zone.” Brief for United States 5–6. We agree with the Government that Congress normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens that an activity has on interstate commerce. See McClung, 379 U.S., at 304; see also Perez, 402 U.S., at 156 (“Congress need [not] make particularized findings in order to legislate”). But to the extent that congressional findings would enable us to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affected interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect was visible to the naked eye, they are lacking here.

The Government's essential contention, in fine, is that we may determine here that § 922(q) is valid because possession of a firearm in a local school zone does indeed substantially affect interstate commerce. Brief for United States 17. The Government argues that possession of a firearm in a school zone may result in violent crime and that violent crime can be expected to affect the functioning of the national economy in two ways. First, the costs of violent crime are substantial, and, through the mechanism of insurance, those costs are spread throughout the population. See United States v. Evans, 928 F.2d 858, 862 (CA9 1991). Second, violent crime reduces the willingness of individuals to travel to areas within the country that are perceived to be unsafe. Cf. Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S., at 253. The Government also argues that the presence of guns in schools poses a substantial threat to the educational process by threatening the learning environment. A handicapped educational process, in turn, will result in a less productive citizenry. That, in turn, would have an adverse effect on the Nation's economic well-being. As a result, the Government argues that Congress could rationally have concluded that § 922(q) substantially affects interstate commerce.
We pause to consider the implications of the Government's arguments. The Government admits, under its “costs of crime” reasoning, that Congress could regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 8-9. Similarly, under the Government's “national productivity” reasoning, Congress could regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens: family law (including marriage, divorce, and child custody), for example. Under the theories that the Government presents in support of § 922(q), it is difficult to perceive any limitation on federal power, even in areas such as criminal law enforcement or education where States historically have been sovereign.

Justice KENNEDY, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, concurring.

The history of the judicial struggle to interpret the Commerce Clause during the transition from the economic system the Founders knew to the single, national market still emergent in our own era counsels great restraint before the Court determines that the Clause is insufficient to support an exercise of the national power. That history gives me some pause about today's decision, but I join the Court's opinion with these observations on what I conceive to be its necessary though limited holding.

Chief Justice Marshall announced that the national authority reaches "that commerce which concerns more States than one" and that the commerce power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824). His statements can be understood now as an early and authoritative recognition that the Commerce Clause grants Congress extensive power and ample discretion to determine its appropriate exercise. The progression of our Commerce Clause cases from Gibbons to the present was not marked, however, by a coherent or consistent course of interpretation; for neither the course of technological advance nor the foundational principles for the jurisprudence itself were self-evident to the courts that sought to resolve contemporary disputes by enduring principles.

The case that seems to mark the Court's definitive commitment to the practical conception of the commerce power is NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937). . . . The deference given to Congress has since been confirmed [in] United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117 (1941), overruled Hammer v. Dagenhart, supra. And in Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942), the Court disapproved E. C. Knight and the entire line of direct-indirect and manufacture-production cases, explaining that "broader interpretations of the Commerce Clause [were] destined to supersede the earlier ones," 317 U.S. at 122, and "whatever terminology is used, the criterion is necessarily one of degree and must be so defined. This does not satisfy those who seek mathematical or rigid formulas. But such formulas are not provided by the great concepts of the Constitution," id., at 123, n.24. Later examples of the exercise of federal power where commercial transactions were the subject of regulation include Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964), Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964), and Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146 (1971). These and like authorities are within the fair ambit of the Court's practical conception of commercial regulation and are not called in question by our decision today.
The history of our Commerce Clause decisions contains at least two lessons of relevance to this case. The first, as stated at the outset, is the imprecision of content-based boundaries used without more to define the limits of the Commerce Clause. The second, related to the first but of even greater consequence, is that the Court as an institution and the legal system as a whole have an immense stake in the stability of our Commerce Clause jurisprudence as it has evolved to this point. Stare decisis operates with great force in counseling us not to call in question the essential principles now in place respecting the congressional power to regulate transactions of a commercial nature. That fundamental restraint on our power forecloses us from reverting to an understanding of commerce that would serve only an 18th-century economy, dependent then upon production and trading practices that had changed but little over the preceding centuries; it also mandates against returning to the time when congressional authority to regulate undoubted commercial activities was limited by a judicial determination that those matters had an insufficient connection to an interstate system. Congress can regulate in the commercial sphere on the assumption that we have a single market and a unified purpose to build a stable national economy.

[I]t was the insight of the Framers that freedom was enhanced by the creation of two governments, not one. "In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each subdivided among distinct and separate departments. Hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself." The Federalist No. 51, p. 323 (C. Rossiter ed. 1961) (J. Madison). See also Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 458-459 (1991) ("Just as the separation and independence of the coordinate branches of the Federal Government serve to prevent the accumulation of excessive power in any one branch, a healthy balance of power between the States and the Federal Government will reduce the risk of tyranny and abuse from either front."); New York v. United States, [505 U.S. 142, 181 (1992)] ("The Constitution divides authority between federal and state governments for the protection of individuals. State sovereignty is not just an end in itself: 'Rather, federalism secures to citizens the liberties that derive from the diffusion of sovereign power'") (quoting Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 759 (1991) (Blackmun, J., dissenting)).

The theory that two governments accord more liberty than one requires for its realization two distinct and discernable lines of political accountability: one between the citizens and the Federal Government; the second between the citizens and the States. If, as Madison expected, the Federal and State Governments are to control each other, see The Federalist No. 51, and hold each other in check by competing for the affections of the people, see The Federalist No. 46, those citizens must have some means of knowing which of the two governments to hold accountable for the failure to perform a given function. "Federalism serves to assign political responsibility, not to obscure it." FTC v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 504 U.S. 621, 636 (1992). Were the Federal Government to take over the regulation of entire areas of traditional state concern, areas having nothing to do with the regulation of commercial activities, the boundaries between the spheres of federal and state authority would blur and political responsibility would become illusory. Cf. New York v. United States, supra, at 155-169; FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 787 (1982) (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). The resultant inability to hold either branch of the government answerable to the citizens is more dangerous even than devolving too much authority to the remote central power.

The statute before us upsets the federal balance to a degree that renders it an unconstitutional assertion of the commerce power, and our intervention is required. As the Chief Justice explains, unlike the earlier cases to come before the Court here neither the actors nor their conduct have a commercial character, and neither the purposes nor the design of the statute have an evident commercial nexus. The statute makes the simple possession of a gun within 1,000 feet of the grounds of the school a criminal offense. In a sense any conduct in this interdependent world of ours has an ultimate commercial origin or consequence, but we have not yet said the commerce power may reach so far. If Congress attempts that extension, then at the least we must inquire whether the exercise of national power seeks to intrude upon an area of traditional state concern.

An interference of these dimensions occurs here, for it is well established that education is a traditional concern of the States. Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 741-742 (1974); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104 (1968). The proximity to schools, including of course schools owned and operated by the States or their subdivisions, is the very premise for making the conduct criminal. In these circumstances, we have a particular duty to ensure that the federal-state balance is not destroyed. Cf. Rice, supra, at 230 ("We start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States" are not displaced by a federal statute "unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress"); Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 146 (1963).

While it is doubtful that any State, or indeed any reasonable person, would argue that it is wise policy to allow students to carry guns on school premises, considerable disagreement exists about how best to accomplish that goal. In this circumstance, the theory and utility of our federalism are revealed, for the States may perform their role as laboratories for experimentation to devise various solutions where the best solution is far from clear. See San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 49-50 (1973); New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

Other, more practicable means to rid the schools of guns may be thought by the citizens of some States to be preferable for the safety and welfare of the schools those States are charged with maintaining. See Brief for National Conference of State Legislatures et al. as Amici Curiae 26-30 (injection of federal officials into local problems causes friction and diminishes political accountability of state and local governments). These might include inducements to inform on violators where the information leads to arrests or confiscation of the guns,; programs to encourage the voluntary surrender of guns with some provision for amnesty; penalties imposed on parents or guardians for failure to supervise the child; laws providing for suspension or expulsion of gun-toting students; or programs for expulsion with assignment to special facilities. [Citations omitted].

The statute now before us forecloses the States from experimenting and exercising their own judgment in an area to which States lay claim by right of history and expertise, and it does so by regulating an activity beyond the realm of commerce in the ordinary and usual sense of that term.

For these reasons, I join in the opinion and judgment of the Court.

Justice THOMAS, concurring.

The Court today properly concludes that the Commerce Clause does not grant Congress the authority to prohibit gun possession within 1,000 feet of a school, as it attempted to do in the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, Pub. L. 101-647, 104 Stat. 4844. Although I join the majority, I write separately to observe that our case law has drifted far from the original understanding of the Commerce Clause. In a future case, we ought to temper our Commerce Clause jurisprudence in a manner that both makes sense of our more recent case law and is more faithful to the original understanding of that Clause.

At the time the original Constitution was ratified, “commerce” consisted of selling, buying, and bartering, as well as transporting for these purposes. See 1 S. Johnson, A Dictionary*586 of the English Language 361 (4th ed. 1773) (defining commerce as “Intercour[s]e; exchange of one thing for another; interchange of any thing; trade; traffick”); N. Bailey, An Universal Etymological English Dictionary (26th ed. 1789) (“trade or traffic”); T. Sheridan, A Complete Dictionary of the English Language (6th ed. 1796) (“Exchange of one thing for another; trade, traffick”). This understanding finds support in the etymology of the word, which literally means “with merchandise.” See 3 Oxford English Dictionary 552 (2d ed. 1989) (com – “with”; merci – “merchandise”). In fact, when Federalists and Anti–Federalists discussed the Commerce Clause during the ratification period, they often used trade (in its selling/bartering sense) and commerce interchangeably. See The Federalist No. 4, p. 22 (J. Jay) (asserting that countries will cultivate our friendship when our “trade” is prudently regulated by Federal Government); id., No. 7, at 39-40 (A. Hamilton) (discussing “competitions of commerce” between States resulting from state “regulations of trade”); id., No. 40, at 262 (J. Madison) (asserting that it was an “acknowledged object of the Convention . . . that the regulation of trade should be submitted to the general government”); Lee, Letters of a Federal Farmer No. 5, in Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States 319 (P. Ford ed. 1888); Smith, An Address to the People of the State of New York, in id., at 107. [FN1. All references to The Federalist are to the Jacob E. Cooke 1961 edition.]

As one would expect, the term “commerce” was used in contradistinction to productive activities such as manufacturing and agriculture. Alexander Hamilton, for example, repeatedly treated commerce, agriculture, and manufacturing as three separate endeavors. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 36, at 224 (referring to “agriculture, commerce, manufactures”); id., No. 21, at 133 (distinguishing commerce, arts, and industry); id., No. 12, at 74 (asserting that commerce and agriculture have... shared interests). The same distinctions were made in the state ratification conventions. See, e.g., 2 Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 57 (J. Elliot ed. 1836) (hereinafter Debates) (T. Dawes at Massachusetts convention); id., at 336 (M. Smith at New York convention).

Moreover, interjecting a modern sense of commerce into the Constitution generates significant textual and structural problems. For example, one cannot replace “commerce” with a different type of enterprise, such as manufacturing. When a manufacturer produces a car, assembly cannot take place “with a foreign nation” or “with the Indian Tribes.” Parts may come from different States or other nations and hence may have been in the flow of commerce at one time, but manufacturing takes place at a discrete site. Agriculture and manufacturing involve the production of goods; commerce encompasses traffic in such articles.

The Port Preference Clause also suggests that the term “commerce” denoted sale and/or transport rather than business generally. According to that Clause, “[n]o Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another.” U.S. Const., Art. I, § 9, cl. 6. Although it is possible to conceive of regulations of manufacturing or farming that prefer one port over another, the more natural reading is that the Clause prohibits Congress from using its commerce power to channel commerce through certain favored ports.

The Constitution not only uses the word “commerce” in a narrower sense than our case law might suggest, it also does not support the proposition that Congress has authority over all activities that “substantially affect” interstate commerce. The Commerce Clause does not state that Congress may “regulate matters that substantially affect commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.” In contrast, the Constitution itself temporarily prohibited amendments that would “affect” Congress' lack of authority to prohibit or restrict the slave trade or to enact unproportioned direct taxation. Art. V. Clearly, the Framers could have drafted a Constitution that contained a “substantially affects interstate commerce” Clause had that been their objective.

[T]he Constitution requires us to judge the connection between a regulated activity and interstate commerce, not directly, but at one remove. Courts must give Congress a degree of leeway in determining the existence of a significant factual connection between the regulated activity and interstate commerce – both because the Constitution delegates the commerce power directly to Congress and because the determination requires an empirical judgment of a kind that a legislature is more likely than a court to make with accuracy. The traditional words “rational basis” capture this leeway. See Hodel, supra, 452 U.S., at 276-277. Thus, the specific question before us, as the Court recognizes, is not whether the “regulated activity sufficiently affected interstate commerce,” but, rather, whether Congress could have had “a rational basis” for so concluding.
. . . Could Congress rationally have found that “violent crime in school zones,” through its effect on the “quality of education,” significantly (or substantially) affects “interstate” or “foreign commerce”? 18 U.S.C. §§ 922(q)(1)(F), (G). As long as one views the commerce connection, not as a “technical legal conception,” but as “a practical one, Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 398 (1905) (Holmes, J.), the answer to this question must be yes. Numerous reports and studies – generated both inside and outside government – make clear that Congress could reasonably have found the empirical connection that its law, implicitly or explicitly, asserts. (See Appendix, infra, at 1665, for a sample of the documentation [and] complete citations to the sources referenced).

For one thing, reports, hearings, and other readily available literature make clear that the problem of guns in and around schools is widespread and extremely serious. These materials report, for example, that four percent of American high school students (and six percent of inner-city high school students) carry a gun to school at least occasionally, Centers for Disease Control 2342; Sheley, McGee, & Wright 679; that 12 percent of urban high school students have had guns fired at them, ibid.; that 20 percent of those students have been threatened with guns, ibid.; and that, in any 6–month period, several hundred thousand schoolchildren are victims of violent crimes in or near their schools, U.S. Dept. of Justice 1 (1989); House Select Committee Hearing 15 (1989). And, they report that this widespread violence in schools throughout the Nation significantly interferes with the quality of education in those schools. See, e.g., House Judiciary Committee Hearing 44 (1990) (linking school violence to dropout rate); U.S. Dept. of Health 118-119 (1978) (school-violence victims suffer academically); compare U.S. Dept. of Justice 1 (1991) (gun violence worst in inner-city schools), with National Center 47 (dropout rates highest in inner cities). Based on reports such as these, Congress obviously could have thought that guns and learning are mutually exclusive. Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee Hearing 39 (1993); U.S. Dept. of Health 118, 123-124 (1978). Congress could therefore have found a substantial educational problem — teachers unable to teach, students unable to learn – and concluded that guns near schools contribute substantially to the size and scope of that problem.

Having found that guns in schools significantly undermine the quality of education in our Nation's classrooms, Congress could also have found, given the effect of education upon interstate and foreign commerce, that gun-related violence in and around schools is a commercial, as well as a human, problem. Education, although far more than a matter of economics, has long been inextricably intertwined with the Nation's economy. When this Nation began, most workers received their education in the workplace, typically (like Benjamin Franklin) as apprentices. See generally Seybolt; Rorabaugh; U.S. Dept. of Labor (1950). As late as the 1920's, many workers still received general education directly from their employers – from large corporations, such as General Electric, Ford, and Goodyear, which created schools within their firms to help both the worker and the firm. See Bolino 15-25. (Throughout most of the 19th century fewer than one percent of all Americans received secondary education through attending a high school. See id., at 11.) As public school enrollment grew in the early 20th century, see Becker 218 (1993), the need for industry to teach basic educational skills diminished. But, the direct economic link between basic education and industrial productivity remained. Scholars estimate that nearly a quarter of America's economic growth in the early years of this century is traceable directly to increased schooling, see Denison 243; that investment in “human capital” (through spending on education) exceeded investment in “physical capital” by a ratio of almost two to one, see Schultz 26 (1961); and that the economic returns to this investment in education exceeded the returns to conventional capital investment, see, e.g., Davis & Morrall 48-49.

In recent years the link between secondary education and business has strengthened, becoming both more direct and more important. Scholars on the subject report that technological changes and innovations in management techniques have altered the nature of the workplace so that more jobs now demand greater educational skills. See, e.g., MIT 32 (only about one-third of hand tool company's 1,000 workers were qualified to work with a new process that requires high-school-level reading and mathematical skills); Cyert & Mowery 68 (gap between wages of high school dropouts and better trained workers increasing); U.S. Dept. of Labor 41 (1981) (job openings for dropouts declining over time).

Following Lopez, Congress passed an amended Gun-Free School Zones Act which regulates the possession of guns around schools only if the gun “has moved in or that otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce.” As a regulation of an article moving in interstate commerce, this amended statute is probably constitutional under the first of the three categories of commerce clause power mentioned at the beginning of Lopez, that is, an Ames rationale regulating “the use of the channels of interstate commerce.” Since virtually every gun has moved in interstate commerce, this current statute covers almost the same amount of activity as the statute struck down in Lopez.40

United States v. Morrison
529 U.S. 598 (2000)

Chief Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

In these cases we consider the constitutionality of 42 U.S.C. § 13981, which provides a federal civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence.

Petitioner Christy Brzonkala enrolled at Virginia Polytechnic Institute (Virginia Tech) in the fall of 1994. In September of that year, Brzonkala met respondents Antonio Morrison and James Crawford, who were both students at Virginia Tech and members of its varsity football team. Brzonkala alleges that, within 30 minutes of meeting Morrison and Crawford, they assaulted and repeatedly raped her.

After the attack, Morrison allegedly told Brzonkala, “You better not have any . . . diseases.” Complaint ¶ 22. In the months following the rape, Morrison also allegedly announced in the dormitory's dining room that he “like[d] to get girls drunk and . . . .” Id., ¶ 31. The omitted portions, quoted verbatim in the briefs on file with this Court, consist of boasting, debased remarks about what Morrison would do to women, vulgar remarks that cannot fail to shock and offend.

Brzonkala alleges that this attack caused her to become severely emotionally disturbed and depressed. She sought assistance from a university psychiatrist, who prescribed antidepressant medication. Shortly after the rape Brzonkala stopped attending classes and withdrew from the university.

Gender-motivated crimes of violence are not, in any sense of the phrase, economic activity. While we need not adopt a categorical rule against aggregating the effects of any noneconomic activity in order to decide these cases, thus far in our Nation's history our cases have upheld Commerce Clause regulation of intrastate activity only where that activity is economic in nature.

We accordingly reject the argument that Congress may regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce. The Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. Lopez, 514 U.S., at 568 (citing Jones & Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S., at 30). In recognizing this fact we preserve one of the few principles that has been consistent since the Clause was adopted. The regulation and punishment of intrastate violence that is not directed at the instrumentalities, channels, or goods involved in interstate commerce has always been the province of the States.

Our cases, which remain at least nominally undisturbed, stand for the following propositions. Congress has the power to legislate with regard to activity that, in the aggregate, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 124-128 (1942); Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 277 (1981). The fact of such a substantial effect is not an issue for the courts in the first instance, ibid., but for the Congress, whose institutional capacity for gathering evidence and taking testimony far exceeds ours. By passing legislation, Congress indicates its conclusion, whether explicitly or not, that facts support its exercise of the commerce power. The business of the courts is to review the congressional assessment, not for soundness but simply for the rationality of concluding that a jurisdictional basis exists in fact. See ibid. Any explicit findings that Congress chooses to make, though not dispositive of the question of rationality, may advance judicial review by identifying factual authority on which Congress relied. Applying those propositions in these cases can lead to only one conclusion.

One obvious difference from United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), is the mountain of data assembled by Congress, here showing the effects of violence against women on interstate commerce. Passage of the Act in 1994 was preceded by four years of hearings, which included testimony from physicians and law professors; from survivors of rape and domestic violence; and from representatives of state law enforcement and private business. The record includes reports on gender bias from task forces in 21 States, and we have the benefit of specific factual findings in the eight separate Reports issued by Congress and its committees over the long course leading to enactment. Cf. Hodel, 452 U.S., at 278-279 (noting “extended hearings,” “vast amounts of testimony and documentary evidence,” and “years of the most thorough legislative consideration”).

Justice BREYER, with whom Justice STEVENS joins, and with whom Justice SOUTER and Justice GINSBURG join as to Part I-A, dissenting.

I

The majority holds that the federal commerce power does not extend to such “noneconomic” activities as “noneconomic, violent criminal conduct” that significantly affects interstate commerce only if we “aggregate” the interstate “effect[s]” of individual instances. Justice Souter explains why history, precedent, and legal logic militate against the majority's approach. I agree and join his opinion. I add that the majority's holding illustrates the difficulty of finding a workable judicial Commerce Clause touchstone – a set of comprehensible interpretive rules that courts might use to impose some meaningful limit, but not too great a limit, upon the scope of the legislative authority that the Commerce Clause delegates to Congress.

The line becomes yet harder to draw given the need for exceptions. The Court itself would permit Congress to aggregate, hence regulate, “noneconomic” activity taking place at economic establishments. See Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964) (upholding civil rights laws forbidding discrimination at local motels); Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964) (same for restaurants). And it would permit Congress to regulate where that regulation is “an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated.” Lopez, supra, at 561; cf. Controlled Substances Act, 21 U.S.C. § 801 et seq. (regulating drugs produced for home consumption). Given the former exception, can Congress simply rewrite the present law and limit its application to restaurants, hotels, perhaps universities, and other places of public accommodation? Given the latter exception, can Congress save the present law by including it, or much of it, in a broader “Safe Transport” or “Workplace Safety” act?
More important, why should we give critical constitutional importance to the economic, or noneconomic, nature of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause? If chemical emanations through indirect environmental change cause identical, severe commercial harm outside a State, why should it matter whether local factories or home fireplaces release them? The Constitution itself refers only to Congress' power to "regulate Commerce . . . among the several States," and to make laws "necessary and proper" to implement that power. Art. I, § 8, cls. 3, 18. The language says nothing about either the local nature, or the economic nature, of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause.

Subsequent to Morrison, Congress has continued to pass versions of a Violence Against Women Act, using its Spending power, addressed at §§ 7.2.1-7.2.2, to aid states in combating violence against women. See Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act of 2013, Pub.-L 113-4, 127 Stat. 54 (March 7, 2013) (Title I: Enhancing Judicial and Law Enforcement Tools to Combat Violence Against Women; Title II: Improving Services for Victims of Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, Sexual Assault, and Stalking; Title III: Services, Protection, and Justices for Young Victims of Violence; Title IV: Violence Reduction Practices; Title V: Strengthening the Healthcare System's Response to Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, Sexual Assault, and Stalking; Title VI: Safe Homes for Victims of Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, Sexual Assault, and Stalking; Title VII: Economic Security for Victims of Violence; Title VIII: Protection of Battered Immigrants; Title IX: Safety for Indian Women; Title X: Safer Act (Debbie Smith grants for auditing sexual assault evidence backlogs; reports to Congress, reducing the rape kit backlog, oversight and accountability, and sunset); Title XI: Other matters (sexual abuse in custodial settings, anonymous online harassment, stalker database, federal victim assistants reauthorization, child abuse training programs for judicial personnel and practitioners reauthorization); Title XII: trafficking victims protection). Given the greater enforcement resources of states and local communities versus the limited number of federal enforcement agents, this approach may be as effective as the original Violence Against Women Act.

Gonzales v. Raich

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

California is one of at least nine States that authorize the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes. The question presented in this case is whether the power vested in Congress by Article I, § 8, of the Constitution "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution" its authority to "regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States" includes the power to prohibit the local cultivation and use of marijuana in compliance with California law.

California has been a pioneer in the regulation of marijuana. In 1913, California was one of the first States to prohibit the sale and possession of marijuana, and at the end of the century, California became the first State to authorize limited use of the drug for medicinal purposes. In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 215, now codified as the Compassionate Use Act of 1996. The proposition was designed to ensure that "seriously ill" residents of the State have access to marijuana for medical purposes, and to encourage Federal and State Governments to take steps towards ensuring the safe and affordable distribution of the drug to patients in need. The Act creates an exemption from criminal prosecution for physicians, as well as for patients and primary caregivers who possess or cultivate marijuana for medicinal purposes with the recommendation or approval of a physician. A "primary caregiver" is a person who has consistently assumed responsibility for the housing, health, or safety of the patient.

Respondents Angel Raich and Diane Monson are California residents who suffer from a variety of serious medical conditions and have sought to avail themselves of medical marijuana pursuant to the terms of the Compassionate Use Act. They are being treated by licensed, board-certified family practitioners, who have concluded, after prescribing a host of conventional medicines to treat respondents' conditions and to alleviate their associated symptoms, that marijuana is the only drug available that provides effective treatment. Both women have been using marijuana as a medication for several years pursuant to their doctors' recommendation, and both rely heavily on cannabis to function on a daily basis. Indeed, Raich's physician believes that forgoing cannabis treatments would certainly cause Raich excruciating pain and could very well prove fatal.

Respondent Monson cultivates her own marijuana, and ingests the drug in a variety of ways including smoking and using a vaporizer. Respondent Raich, by contrast, is unable to cultivate her own, and thus relies on two caregivers, litigating as "John Does," to provide her with locally grown marijuana at no charge. These caregivers also process the cannabis into hashish or keif, and Raich herself processes some of the marijuana into oils, balms, and foods for consumption.

On August 15, 2002, county deputy sheriffs and agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) came to Monson's home. After a thorough investigation, the county officials concluded that her use of marijuana was entirely lawful as a matter of California law. Nevertheless, after a 3-hour standoff, the federal agents seized and destroyed all six of her cannabis plants.

Respondents thereafter brought this action against the Attorney General of the United States and the head of the DEA seeking injunctive and declaratory relief prohibiting the enforcement of the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA), 84 Stat. 1242, 21 U.S.C. § 801 et seq., to the extent it prevents them from possessing, obtaining, or manufacturing cannabis for their personal medical use. In their complaint and supporting affidavits, Raich and Monson described the severity of their afflictions, their repeatedly futile attempts to obtain relief with conventional medications, and the opinions of their doctors concerning their need to use marijuana.

The obvious importance of the case prompted our grant of certiorari. 542 U.S. 936 (2004). The case is made difficult by respondents' strong arguments that they will suffer irreparable harm because, despite a congressional finding to the contrary, marijuana does have valid therapeutic purposes. The question before us, however, is not whether it is wise to enforce the statute in these circumstances; rather, it is whether Congress' power to regulate interstate markets for medicinal substances encompasses the portions of those markets that are supplied with drugs produced and consumed locally. Well-settled law controls our answer. The CSA is a valid exercise of federal power, even as applied to the troubling facts of this case. We accordingly vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Shortly after taking office in 1969, President Nixon declared a national "war on drugs." As the first campaign of that war, Congress set out to enact legislation that would consolidate various drug laws on the books into a comprehensive statute, provide meaningful regulation over legitimate sources of drugs to prevent diversion into illegal channels, and strengthen law enforcement tools against the traffic in illicit drugs. That effort culminated in the passage of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, 84 Stat. 1236.

Respondents in this case do not dispute that passage of the CSA, as part of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act, was well within Congress' commerce power. Brief for Respondents 22, 38. Nor do they contend that any provision or section of the CSA amounts to an unconstitutional exercise of congressional authority. Rather, respondents' challenge is actually quite limited; they argue that the CSA's categorical prohibition of the manufacture and possession of marijuana as applied to the intrastate manufacture and possession of marijuana for medical purposes pursuant to California law exceeds Congress' authority under the Commerce Clause.

In assessing the validity of congressional regulation, none of our Commerce Clause cases can be viewed in isolation. As charted in considerable detail in United States v. Lopez, our understanding of the reach of the Commerce Clause, as well as Congress' assertion of authority thereunder, has evolved over time. The Commerce Clause emerged as the Framers' response to the central problem giving rise to the Constitution itself: the absence of any federal commerce power under the Articles of Confederation. For the first century of our history, the primary use of the Clause was to preclude the kind of discriminatory state legislation that had once been permissible. Then, in response to rapid industrial development and an increasingly interdependent national economy, Congress "ushered in a new era of federal regulation under the commerce power," beginning with the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887, 24 Stat. 379, and the Sherman Antitrust Act in 1890, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 2 et seq.

Our case law firmly establishes Congress' power to regulate purely local activities that are part of an economic "class of activities" that have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See, e.g., Perez, 402 U.S., at 151; Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 128-129 (1942). As we stated in Wickard, "even if appellee's activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce." Id., at 125. We have never required Congress to legislate with scientific exactitude. When Congress decides that the "total incidence" of a practice poses a threat to a national market, it may regulate the entire class. See Perez, 402 U.S., at 154-155 (quoting Westfall v. United States, 274 U.S. 256, 259 (1927) ("[W]hen it is necessary in order to prevent an evil to make the law embrace more than the precise thing to be prevented it may do so")). In this vein, we have reiterated that when "a general regulatory statute bears a substantial relation to commerce, the de minimis character of individual instances arising under that statute is of no consequence." E.g., Lopez, 514 U.S., at 558 (emphasis deleted) (quoting Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 196, n.27 (1968)).
Our decision in Wickard, 317 U.S. 111, is of particular relevance. In Wickard, we upheld the application of regulations promulgated under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, 52 Stat. 31, which were designed to control the volume of wheat moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses and consequent abnormally low prices. The regulations established an allotment of 11.1 acres for Filburn's 1941 wheat crop, but he sowed 23 acres, intending to use the excess by consuming it on his own farm. Filburn argued that even though we had sustained Congress' power to regulate the production of goods for commerce, that power did not authorize "federal regulation [of] production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm." Wickard, 317 U.S., at 118. Justice Jackson's opinion for a unanimous Court rejected this submission. He wrote:

"The effect of the statute before us is to restrict the amount which may be produced for market and the extent as well to which one may forestall resort to the market by producing to meet his own needs. That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial." Id., at 127-128.

Wickard thus establishes that Congress can regulate purely intrastate activity that is not itself "commercial," in that it is not produced for sale, if it concludes that failure to regulate that class of activity would undercut the regulation of the interstate market in that commodity.

The similarities between this case and Wickard are striking. Like the farmer in Wickard, respondents are cultivating, for home consumption, a fungible commodity for which there is an established, albeit illegal, interstate market. Just as the Agricultural Adjustment Act was designed "to control the volume [of wheat] moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses . . ." and consequently control the market price, id., at 115, a primary purpose of the CSA is to control the supply and demand of controlled substances in both lawful and unlawful drug markets. See nn 20-21, supra. In Wickard, we had no difficulty concluding that Congress had a rational basis for believing that, when viewed in the aggregate, leaving home-consumed wheat outside the regulatory scheme would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. Here too, Congress had a rational basis for concluding that leaving home-consumed marijuana outside federal control would similarly affect price and market conditions.

In assessing the scope of Congress' authority under the Commerce Clause, we stress that the task before us is a modest one. We need not determine whether respondents' activities, taken in the aggregate, substantially affect interstate commerce in fact, but only whether a "rational basis" exists for so concluding. Lopez, 514 U.S., at 557; see also Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276-280 (1981); Perez, 402 U.S., at 155-156; Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 299-301 (1964); Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 252-253 (1964). Given the enforcement difficulties that attend distinguishing between marijuana cultivated locally and marijuana grown elsewhere, 21 U.S.C. § 801(5), and concerns about diversion into illicit channels, 33 we have no difficulty concluding that Congress had a rational basis for believing that failure to regulate the intrastate manufacture and possession of marijuana would leave a gaping hole in the CSA. Thus, as in Wickard, when it enacted comprehensive legislation to regulate the interstate market in a fungible commodity, Congress was acting well within its authority to "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper" to "regulate Commerce . . . among the several States." U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8. That the regulation ensnares some purely intrastate activity is of no moment. As we have done many times before, we refuse to excise individual components of that larger scheme.

Indeed, that the California exemptions will have a significant impact on both the supply and demand sides of the market for marijuana is not just "plausible" as the principal dissent concedes, post, 162 L. Ed. 2d, at 44 (O'Connor, J., dissenting), it is readily apparent. The exemption for physicians provides them with an economic incentive to grant their patients permission to use the drug. In contrast to most prescriptions for legal drugs, which limit the dosage and duration of the usage, under California law the doctor's permission to recommend marijuana use is open-ended. The authority to grant permission whenever the doctor determines that a patient is afflicted with "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief," Cal. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 11362.5(b)(1)(A) (West Supp. 2005), is broad enough to allow even the most scrupulous doctor to conclude that some recreational uses would be therapeutic. And our cases have taught us that there are some unscrupulous physicians who overprescribe when it is sufficiently profitable to do so.

The exemption for cultivation by patients and caregivers can only increase the supply of marijuana in the California market. The likelihood that all such production will promptly terminate when patients recover or will precisely match the patients' medical needs during their convalescence seems remote; whereas the danger that excesses will satisfy some of the admittedly enormous demand for recreational use seems obvious. Moreover, that the national and international narcotics trade has thrived in the face of vigorous criminal enforcement efforts suggests that no small number of unscrupulous people will make use of the California exemptions to serve their commercial ends whenever it is feasible to do so. Taking into account the fact that California is only one of at least nine States to have authorized the medical use of marijuana, a fact Justice O'Connor's dissent conveniently disregards in arguing that the demonstrated effect on commerce while admittedly "plausible" is ultimately "unsubstantiated," Congress could have rationally concluded that the aggregate impact on the national market of all the transactions exempted from federal supervision is unquestionably substantial.

Under the present state of the law, however, the judgment of the Court of Appeals must be vacated. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Justice SCALIA, concurring in the judgment.

I agree with the Court's holding that the Controlled Substances Act (CSA) may validly be applied to respondents' cultivation, distribution, and possession of marijuana for personal, medicinal use. I write separately because my understanding of the doctrinal foundation on which that holding rests is, if not inconsistent with that of the Court, at least more nuanced.
Our cases show that the regulation of intrastate activities may be necessary to and proper for the regulation of interstate commerce in two general circumstances. Most directly, the commerce power permits Congress not only to devise rules for the governance of commerce between States but also to facilitate interstate commerce by eliminating potential obstructions, and to restrict it by eliminating potential stimulants. See NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 36-37 (1937). That is why the Court has repeatedly sustained congressional legislation on the ground that the regulated activities had a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See, e.g., Hodel, supra, at 281 (surface coal mining); Katzenbach, supra, at 300 (discrimination by restaurants); Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 258 (1964) (discrimination by hotels); Mandeville Island Farms v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. 219, 237 (1948) (intrastate price-fixing); Board of Trade of Chicago v. Olsen, 262 U.S. 1, 40 (1923) (activities of a local grain exchange); Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 517, 524-525 (1922) (intrastate transactions at stockyard). Lopez and Morrison recognized the expansive scope of Congress's authority in this regard: "[T]he pattern is clear. Where economic activity substantially affects interstate commerce, legislation regulating that activity will be sustained." Lopez, supra, at 560; Morrison, supra, at 610 (same).

This principle is not without limitation. In Lopez and Morrison, the Court – conscious of the potential of the "substantially affects" test to "obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local," Lopez, supra, at 566-567 (quoting A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 554 (1935)); see also Morrison, supra, at 615-616 – rejected the argument that Congress may regulate noneconomic activity based solely on the effect that it may have on interstate commerce through a remote chain of inferences. Lopez, supra, at 564-566; Morrison, supra, at 617-618. "[I]f we were to accept [such] arguments," the Court reasoned in Lopez, "we are hard pressed to posit any activity by an individual that Congress is without power to regulate." Lopez, supra, at 564; see also Morrison, supra, at 615-616. Thus, although Congress's authority to regulate intrastate activity that substantially affects interstate commerce is broad, it does not permit the Court to "pile inference upon inference," Lopez, supra, at 567, in order to establish that noneconomic activity has a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

As we implicitly acknowledged in Lopez, however, Congress's authority to enact laws necessary and proper for the regulation of interstate commerce is not limited to laws directed against economic activities that have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Though the conduct in Lopez was not economic, the Court nevertheless recognized that it could be regulated as "an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated." 514 U.S., at 561. This statement referred to those cases permitting the regulation of intrastate activities "which in a substantial way interfere with or obstruct the exercise of the granted power." Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U.S., at 119; see also United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 118-119 (1941); Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S., at 353. As the Court put it in Wrightwood Dairy, where Congress has the authority to enact a regulation of interstate commerce, "it possesses every power needed to make that regulation effective." 315 U.S., at 118-119.
Although this power "to make . . . regulation effective" commonly overlaps with the authority to regulate economic activities that substantially affect interstate commerce, and may in some cases have been confused with that authority, the two are distinct. The regulation of an intrastate activity may be essential to a comprehensive regulation of interstate commerce even though the intrastate activity does not itself "substantially affect" interstate commerce. Moreover, as the passage from Lopez quoted above suggests, Congress may regulate even noneconomic local activity if that regulation is a necessary part of a more general regulation of interstate commerce. See Lopez, supra, at 561. The relevant question is simply whether the means chosen are "reasonably adapted" to the attainment of a legitimate end under the commerce power. See Darby, supra, at 121.

The application of these principles to the case before us is straightforward. In the CSA, Congress has undertaken to extinguish the interstate market in Schedule I controlled substances, including marijuana. The Commerce Clause unquestionably permits this. The power to regulate interstate commerce "extends not only to those regulations which aid, foster and protect the commerce, but embraces those which prohibit it." Darby, 312 U.S., at 113. See also Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U.S. 45, 58 (1911); Lottery Case, 188 U.S. 321, 354 (1903). To effectuate its objective, Congress has prohibited almost all intrastate activities related to Schedule I substances – both economic activities (manufacture, distribution, possession with the intent to distribute) and noneconomic activities (simple possession). See 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a), 844(a). That simple possession is a noneconomic activity is immaterial to whether it can be prohibited as a necessary part of a larger regulation. Rather, Congress's authority to enact all of these prohibitions of intrastate controlled-substance activities depends only upon whether they are appropriate means of achieving the legitimate end of eradicating Schedule I substances from interstate commerce.

Justice O'CONNOR, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and Justice THOMAS join as to all but Part III, dissenting.

We enforce the "outer limits" of Congress' Commerce Clause authority not for their own sake, but to protect historic spheres of state sovereignty from excessive federal encroachment and thereby to maintain the distribution of power fundamental to our federalist system of government. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 557 (1995); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 37 (1937). One of federalism's chief virtues, of course, is that it promotes innovation by allowing for the possibility that "a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country." New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

This case exemplifies the role of States as laboratories. The States' core police powers have always included authority to define criminal law and to protect the health, safety, and welfare of their citizens. Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 635 (1993); Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 603, n 30 (1977). Exercising those powers, California (by ballot initiative and then by legislative codification) has come to its own conclusion about the difficult and sensitive question of whether marijuana should be available to relieve severe pain and suffering. Today the Court sanctions an application of the federal Controlled Substances Act that extinguishes that experiment, without any proof that the personal cultivation, possession, and use of marijuana for medicinal purposes, if economic activity in the first place, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce and is therefore an appropriate subject of federal regulation. In so doing, the Court announces a rule that gives Congress a perverse incentive to legislate broadly pursuant to the Commerce Clause – nestling questionable assertions of its authority into comprehensive regulatory schemes – rather than with precision. That rule and the result it produces in this case are irreconcilable with our decisions in Lopez, supra, and United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000). Accordingly I dissent.

What is the relevant conduct subject to Commerce Clause analysis in this case? The Court takes its cues from Congress, applying the above considerations to the activity regulated by the Controlled Substances Act (CSA) in general. The Court's decision rests on two facts about the CSA: (1) Congress chose to enact a single statute providing a comprehensive prohibition on the production, distribution, and possession of all controlled substances, and (2) Congress did not distinguish between various forms of intrastate noncommercial cultivation, possession, and use of marijuana. See 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1), 844(a). Today's decision suggests that the federal regulation of local activity is immune to Commerce Clause challenge because Congress chose to act with an ambitious, all-encompassing statute, rather than piecemeal. In my view, allowing Congress to set the terms of the constitutional debate in this way, i.e., by packaging regulation of local activity in broader schemes, is tantamount to removing meaningful limits on the Commerce Clause.

A number of objective markers are available to confine the scope of constitutional review here. Both federal and state legislation – including the CSA itself, the California Compassionate Use Act, and other state medical marijuana legislation – recognize that medical and nonmedical (i.e., recreational) uses of drugs are realistically distinct and can be segregated, and regulate them differently. See 21 U.S.C. § 812; Cal. Health & Safety Code Ann. § 11362.5 (West Supp. 2005). Respondents challenge only the application of the CSA to medicinal use of marijuana. Cf. United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 20-22 (1960) (describing our preference for as-applied rather than facial challenges). Moreover, because fundamental structural concerns about dual sovereignty animate our Commerce Clause cases, it is relevant that this case involves the interplay of federal and state regulation in areas of criminal law and social policy, where "States lay claim by right of history and expertise." Lopez, supra, at 583 (Kennedy, J., concurring); see also Morrison, supra, at 617-619; Lopez, supra, at 580 (Kennedy, J., concurring) ("The statute before us upsets the federal balance to a degree that renders it an unconstitutional assertion of the commerce power, and our intervention is required"); cf. Garcia, 469 U.S., at 586 (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("[S]tate autonomy is a relevant factor in assessing the means by which Congress exercises its powers" under the Commerce Clause). California, like other States, has drawn on its reserved powers to distinguish the regulation of medicinal marijuana. To ascertain whether Congress' encroachment is constitutionally justified in this case, then, I would focus here on the personal cultivation, possession, and use of marijuana for medicinal purposes.

Having thus defined the relevant conduct, we must determine whether, under our precedents, the conduct is economic and, in theaggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce. Even if intrastate cultivation and possession of marijuana for one's own medicinal use can properly be characterized as economic, and I question whether it can, it has not been shown that such activity substantially affects interstate commerce. Similarly, it is neither self-evident nor demonstrated that regulating such activity is necessary to the interstate drug control scheme.

The Court's definition of economic activity is breathtaking. It defines as economic any activity involving the production, distribution, and consumption of commodities. And it appears to reason that when an interstate market for a commodity exists, regulating the intrastate manufacture or possession of that commodity is constitutional either because that intrastate activity is itself economic, or because regulating it is a rational part of regulating its market. Putting to one side the problem endemic to the Court's opinion – the shift in focus from the activity at issue in this case to the entirety of what the CSA regulates, see Lopez, supra, at 565 ("depending on the level of generality, any activity can be looked upon as commercial") – the Court's definition of economic activity for purposes of Commerce Clause jurisprudence threatens to sweep all of productive human activity into federal regulatory reach.

In Lopez and Morrison, we suggested that economic activity usually relates directly to commercial activity. See Morrison, 529 U.S., at 611, n.4 (intrastate activities that have been within Congress' power to regulate have been "of an apparent commercial character"); Lopez, 514 U.S., at 561 (distinguishing the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 from "activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction"). The homegrown cultivation and personal possession and use of marijuana for medicinal purposes has no apparent commercial character. Everyone agrees that the marijuana at issue in this case was never in the stream of commerce, and neither were the supplies for growing it. (Marijuana is highly unusual among the substances subject to the CSA in that it can be cultivated without any materials that have traveled in interstate commerce.) Lopez makes clear that possession is not itself commercial activity. Ibid. And respondents have not come into possession by means of any commercial transaction; they have simply grown, in their own homes, marijuana for their own use, without acquiring, buying, selling, or bartering a thing of value.

The Court suggests that Wickard, which we have identified as "perhaps the most far reaching example of Commerce Clause authority over intrastate activity," Lopez, supra, at 560, established federal regulatory power over any home consumption of a commodity for which a national market exists. I disagree. Wickard involved a challenge to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (AAA), which directed the Secretary of Agriculture to set national quotas on wheat production, and penalties for excess production. 317 U.S., at 115-116. The AAA itself confirmed that Congress made an explicit choice not to reach – and thus the Court could not possibly have approved of federal control over – small-scale, noncommercial wheat farming. In contrast to the CSA's limitless assertion of power, Congress provided an exemption within the AAA for small producers. When Filburn planted the wheat at issue in Wickard, the statute exempted plantings less than 200 bushels (about six tons), and when he harvested his wheat it exempted plantings less than six acres. Id., at 130, n.30. Wickard, then, did not extend Commerce Clause authority to something as modest as the home cook's herb garden. This is not to say that Congress may never regulate small quantities of commodities possessed or produced for personal use, or to deny that it sometimes needs to enact a zero tolerance regime for such commodities. It is merely to say that Wickard did not hold or imply that small-scale production of commodities is always economic, and automatically within Congress' reach.
Even assuming that economic activity is at issue in this case, the Government has made no showing in fact that the possession and use of homegrown marijuana for medical purposes, in California or elsewhere, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Similarly, the Government has not shown that regulating such activity is necessary to an interstate regulatory scheme. Whatever the specific theory of "substantial effects" at issue (i.e., whether the activity substantially affects interstate commerce, whether its regulation is necessary to an interstate regulatory scheme, or both), a concern for dual sovereignty requires that Congress’ excursion into the traditional domain of States be justified.

There is simply no evidence that homegrown medicinal marijuana users constitute, in the aggregate, a sizable enough class to have a discernable, let alone substantial, impact on the national illicit drug market – or otherwise to threaten the CSA regime. Explicit evidence is helpful when substantial effect is not "visible to the naked eye." See Lopez, 514 U.S., at 563. And here, in part because common sense suggests that medical marijuana users may be limited in number and that California's Compassionate Use Act and similar state legislation may well isolate activities relating to medicinal marijuana from the illicit market, the effect of those activities on interstate drug traffic is not self-evidently substantial.

In this regard, again, this case is readily distinguishable from Wickard. To decide whether the Secretary could regulate local wheat farming, the Court looked to "the actual effects of the activity in question upon interstate commerce." 317 U.S., at 120. Critically, the Court was able to consider "actual effects" because the parties had "stipulated a summary of the economics of the wheat industry." Id., at 125. After reviewing in detail the picture of the industry provided in that summary, the Court explained that consumption of homegrown wheat was the most variable factor in the size of the national wheat crop, and that on-site consumption could have the effect of varying the amount of wheat sent to market by as much as 20 percent. Id., at 127. With real numbers at hand, the Wickard Court could easily conclude that "a factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions" nationwide. Id., at 128; see also id., at 128-129 ("This record leaves us in no doubt" about substantial effects).

The Court recognizes that "the record in the Wickard case itself established the causal connection between the production for local use and the national market" and argues that "we have before us findings by Congress to the same effect." Ante, 162 L. Ed. 2d, at 21 (emphasis added). The Court refers to a series of declarations in the introduction to the CSA saying that (1) local distribution and possession of controlled substances causes "swelling" in interstate traffic; (2) local production and distribution cannot be distinguished from interstate production and distribution; (3) federal control over intrastate incidents "is essential to effective control" over interstate drug trafficking. 21 U.S.C. §§ 801(1)-(6). These bare declarations cannot be compared to the record before the Court in Wickard.

The Government has not overcome empirical doubt that the number of Californians engaged in personal cultivation, possession, and use of medical marijuana, or the amount of marijuana they produce, is enough to threaten the federal regime. . . . The Court also offers some arguments about the effect of the Compassionate Use Act on the national market. It says that the California statute might be vulnerable to exploitation by unscrupulous physicians, that Compassionate Use Act patients may overproduce, and that the history of the narcotics trade shows the difficulty of cordonning off any drug use from the rest of the market. These arguments are plausible; if borne out in fact they could justify prosecuting Compassionate Use Act patients under the federal CSA. But, without substantiation, they add little to the CSA's conclusory statements about diversion, essentiality, and market effect. Piling assertion upon assertion does not, in my view, satisfy the substantiality test of Lopez and Morrison.

Respondents Diane Monson and Angel Raich use marijuana that has never been bought or sold, that has never crossed state lines, and that has had no demonstrable effect on the national market for marijuana. If Congress can regulate this under the Commerce Clause, then it can regulate virtually anything – and the Federal Government is no longer one of limited and enumerated powers.

Here, Congress has encroached on States' traditional police powers to define the criminal law and to protect the health, safety, and welfare of their citizens. Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 635 (1993); Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 719 (1985). Further, the Government's rationale – that it may regulate the production or possession of any commodity for which there is an interstate market – threatens to remove the remaining vestiges of States' traditional police powers. See Brief for Petitioners 21-22; cf. Ehrlich, The Increasing Federalization of Crime, 32 Ariz. St. L. J. 825, 826, 841 (2000) (describing both the relative recency of a large percentage of federal crimes and the lack of a relationship between some of these crimes and interstate commerce). This would convert the Necessary and Proper Clause into precisely what Chief Justice Marshall did not envision, a "pretext . . . for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the government." McCulloch, supra, at 423.

The majority prevents States like California from devising drug policies that they have concluded provide much-needed respite to the seriously ill. It does so without any serious inquiry into the necessity for federal regulation or the propriety of "displac[ing] state regulation in areas of traditional state concern," id., at 583 (Kennedy, J., concurring). The majority's rush to embrace federal power "is especially unfortunate given the importance of showing respect for the sovereign States that comprise our Federal Union." United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative, 532 U.S. 483, 502 (2001) (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment). Our federalist system, properly understood, allows California and a growing number of other States to decide for themselves how to safeguard the health and welfare of their citizens. I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals. I respectfully dissent.

Following Gonzales v. Raich, the Bush and Obama Administrations engaged in some enforcement actions, although the focus of their efforts tended to be on larger, commercial outlets growing and selling marijuana, not isolated individuals, as in Raich. Federal enforcement has been complicated by the fact that state officials who wish to follow state law have a constitutional right not to aid the government in enforcing federal law, as discussed at § 8.2.2 nn.35-42. Most state police in states with medical marijuana laws, which were close to 20 states in 2014 (and 29 states and the District of Columbia by 2017), have not aggressively helped the federal government in enforcement actions, leaving the federal government with tough choices given limited numbers of federal officers available to enforce the entire range of federal laws. The Obama Administration has also announced that it has no plans to enforce federal marijuana laws against recreational users in Colorado and Washington, two states which legalized recreational marijuana use for citizens over 21, starting in 2014. Since 2014, Alaska, California, Maine, Massachusetts, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, D.C. have also legalized use. Thus, plaintiffs like Ms. Raich are not likely to be prosecuted today, even though the federal government retains the constitutional authority to prosecute based on _Raich_.

Recent cases in the United States Courts of Appeals, even before _Raich_, applied _Lopez_ and _Morrison_ in a narrow manner. In virtually all the court of appeals cases where the federal regulation was economically related, the court found the necessary substantial connection with interstate commerce. When they have not, the Supreme Court has shown a willingness to intervene.

41 See, e.g., Rancho Viejo, LLC. v. Norton, 323 F.3d 1062 (D.C. Cir. 2003) (preventing a large developer from construction that would harm an endangered species of arroyo toads was substantially related to interstate commerce because commercial real estate development, in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce); GDF Realty Investments, Ltd. v. Norton, 326 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 2003) (protecting five subterranean invertebrate species was upheld from a Commerce Clause attack because taking endangered species, in the aggregate, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce); United States v. Rayborn, 312 F.3d 229 (6th Cir. 2002) (federal arson statute could be applied to burning a church which was involved in interstate commerce through its radio broadcasts which brought in money and attendees from several states); United States v. Deaton, 332 F.3d 698 (4th Cir. 2003) (no serious constitutional question when the United States Corps of Engineers prevented a landowner from affecting a wetland by digging a 1000-foot ditch which emptied into a roadside ditch that eventually led to navigable waters because Congress has long had power to protect navigable waters from injurious purposes and that permits regulation of non-navigable waters if necessary to achieve congressional goals). On court of appeals decisions after _Morrison_, see generally Daniel J. Lowenberg, The Texas Cave Bug and the California Arroyo Toad “Take” on the Constitution’s Commerce Clause, 36 St. Mary’s L. Rev. 149 (2004).

42 For example, on a 2-1 vote, an Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals panel held it was not a valid exercise of Congress’ Commerce Clause power to apply the Americans with Disabilities Act to ban a state from assessing a $2 annual fee for windshield placards authorizing the use of reserved parking spaces by physically disabled persons. The Eight Circuit noted in _Klingler v. Director, Department of Revenue_ that Congress had made no findings suggesting the existence of a substantial relationship between the fee and interstate commerce. It added that the effect of the placard fee on interstate commerce was much more speculative and attenuated than that of the racial discrimination in _Katzenbach_ and _Heart of Atlanta_. In response to _Klingler_, the Supreme Court vacated the judgment in light of _Gonzales v. Raich_, and on remand, the state abandoned the Commerce Clause challenge. The Eighth Circuit then held, consistent with other courts, that such a surcharge does constitute “discriminatory” treatment under the ADA and is properly banned. 366 F.3d 614 (8th Cir. 2004), judgment vacated, 545 U.S. 1111 (2005), on remand, 433 F.3d 1078, 1079, 1082 (2006).
Courts have also struggled with the question of the impact of Lopez’s holding on gun possession around a school on other areas where mere possession has been made a crime. For example, a range of federal statutes criminalize the production or possession of child pornography. In most cases, Courts of Appeals have found the requisite affects on interstate traffic in child pornography to uphold the statutes. When they have not, the Supreme Court has been willing to intervene.

Despite the limited impact of Lopez and Morrison in cases involving economic regulation, these cases nonetheless send a message that Congress should consider federalism when legislating near the outer reaches of its Commerce Clause power, and it should do something to make it clear how Congress perceives a connection between its regulation and commerce. Indeed, it seems likely that the main practical effect of Lopez and Morrison regarding economic regulation is to suggest that Congress buttress its Commerce Clause legislation with findings that show a connection between the legislation and a substantial affect on interstate commerce. Although such findings are not constitutionally required, a prudent Congress would indicate its view of the connection.

A second impact of Lopez and Morrison lies in the realm of statutory interpretation. For example, in Solid Waste Agency v. Army Corps of Engineers, the same 5-4 majority as in Lopez and Morrison refrained from ruling on whether Congress could authorize the Army Corps of Engineers to regulate abandoned sand and gravel pits that provided a habitat for migratory birds. Instead, the majority held that because of the constitutional problems that such an attempted delegation would present – what is the commercial activity that is being regulated, and what is the substantial affect on interstate commerce – the Court would read the Clean Water Act as not granting the Corps power over non-navigable, isolated, intrastate waters merely because of the presence of migratory birds. Justice Rehnquist noted that Congress does not ordinarily casually authorize administrative agencies to interpret a statute in a way that pushes the limits of congressional power, particularly if altering the federal-state framework by permitting federal encroachment upon a traditional state power.

43 See, e.g., United States v. Adams, 343 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003) (criminal statute banning possession of commercially-produced child pornography constitutional, the court saying that those who possess and view child porn encourage its continued production and distribution); United States v. Holston, 343 F.3d 83 (2nd Cir. 2003) (intrastate use of camera equipment to produce child pornography feeds the national market for child pornography); United States v. Rodia, 194 F.3d 465 (3rd Cir. 1999) (a person viewing child pornography produced intrastate might develop an increased appetite for child pornography that could increase demand for interstate child pornography).

44 For example, in United States v. Maxwell, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that mere possession of child pornography on a disk that, when blank, had moved in interstate commerce, was insufficient to create a substantial affect on interstate commerce, nor could Ames be used since the disk was blank, and thus did not contain child pornography, when it moved across state lines. The Supreme Court vacated this judgment in light of Gonzales v. Raich, and on remand the Eleventh Circuit upheld the constitutionality of the prosecution. 386 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 2004), judgment vacated, 546 U.S 801 (2005), on remand, 446 F.3d. 1210 (2006).

In contrast to Chief Justice Rehnquist’s use of the canon of interpretation to avoid constitutional problems if an interpretation of a statute is possible that avoids the constitutional issue, it has been noted that vigorous application of this canon, often associated with the 1806 case, Murray v. The Schooner Charming Betsy, may denigrate actual congressional or administration agency intent. In Solid Waste Agency, a dissent by Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, found that Congress did indeed intend to adopt the broad definition of power claimed by the Corps. Further, Stevens noted that no serious constitutional problem was presented inasmuch as the strong causal connection between the filling of wetlands and the decline of commercial activities associated with migratory birds, such as funds spent on bird watching, was not attenuated, but direct.\(^\text{46}\)

Solid Waste Agency provides a good reminder that in each Commerce Clause case the first issue is whether (1) the congressional statute actually was intended to reach the conduct at issue in the case. Once it is determined that the statute does apply, then the two constitutional questions apply of whether the activity is (2) “commerce” and (3) “among the states.” In determining this, (4) congressional findings, particularly if the case involves proving substantial affects, will be useful.

With regard to noneconomic activity, the impact of Lopez and Morrison is more profound. Lopez and Morrison make clear that the Court will not grant to Congress under the Commerce Clause plenary legislative power to regulate on any social matter that Congress may wish to regulate. For noneconomic regulation, Congress must find its constitutional grant of power in some other clause of the Constitution. Thus, for example, federal hate crimes laws, or laws making it an independent crime to do violence to a fetus, such as the Unborn Victims of Violence Act of 2004 (UVVA), would \(^{46}\) Id. at 693-96 (Stevens, J., joined by Souter, Ginsburg & Breyer, JJ., dissenting). See generally William K. Kelley, Avoiding Constitutional Questions as a Three-Branch Problem, 86 Cornell L. Rev. 831 (2001), discussing, inter alia, Charming Betsy, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 64 (1804). The Court returned to the Clean Water Act in Rapanos v. United States. In Rapanos, Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Thomas and Alito, held that the phrases “the waters of the United States” and “navigable waters” in the Clean Water Act should be given a literal meaning to “connote continuously present, fixed bodies of water, as opposed to ordinarily dry channels through which water occasionally or intermittently flows.” Reflecting a natural law focus on purpose, Justice Kennedy indicated in his concurrence, that the term “navigable waters” should refer to any body of water with a “substantial nexus” to a continuously present, fixed body of water, since the purpose of the Clean Water Act was to permit federal regulation of any body of water that could affect the navigable waters of the United States. Reflecting the liberal predisposition to uphold grants of federal power, Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, in dissent, indicated their view that “any nexus” should be sufficient for federal regulation. Under that approach, which was implicit in an instrumentalist-era case, United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes, Inc., if any “hydrological connection,” even a single drop of water, can be traced from its source to a navigable waterway, the Corps has jurisdiction. 126 S. Ct. 2208, 2220-25 (2006); id. at 2247-50 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 2252-53 (Stevens, joined by Souter, Ginsburg & Breyer, JJ., dissenting), citing United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes, Inc., 474 U.S. 121, 131-33 (1985).

need to be authorized under some provision of the Constitution other than the Commerce Clause. This may be difficult, both for hate crimes statutes, but also for the UVVA, since the jurisdictional hook for many of the crimes covered by the UVVA depend on the person attacked being a federal employee, or serving in a federal role, or being a foreign official serving in the United States, which could be true of the pregnant woman being harmed, but not true for the fetus. Provisions of the UVVA based on federal control over events on federal property could more easily be upheld. \footnote{See generally John S. Baker, Jr., \textit{United States v. Morrison and Other Arguments Against Federal \textquotedblleft Hate Crimes\textquotedblright\ Legislation}, 80 B.U.L. Rev. 1191, 1215-25 (2000) (questioning constitutionality of federal hate crimes legislation); 18 U.S.C. § 1841(b) (UVVA statute).}

The overall result of \textit{Lopez} and \textit{Morrison} seems consistent with the text and structure of Article I, § 8, which does seem to indicate that congressional power under the Commerce Clause must have some connection to economic activity. Thus, congressional power over purely non-economic kind of activities must be found in other of the enumerated provisions in Article I.

As noted at § 5.4 nn. 69-70, a limitation on the term “regulate” in the Commerce Clause was stated in 2012 in \textit{National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius}, where a 5-Justice majority held that the individual mandate provision of the Affordable Care Act of 2010 (ACA), which requires individuals to purchase health insurance by 2014 or pay a penalty by being denied part of an otherwise due tax refund, was not a “regulation” of commerce, but rather “mandating” commerce. As addressed at § 7.1.1 nn.7-12, a different 5-Justice majority nevertheless upheld the individual mandate provision of the ACA in \textit{Sebelius}, excerpted at § 7.1.1, as an exercise of the Taxing power.

A Circuit split over whether the power over “foreign commerce” in the “Foreign Commerce Clause” is broader than “domestic commerce,” or whether \textit{United States v. Lopez}’s 3 categories of Commerce Clause power applies to “foreign commerce,” continued in \textit{United States v. Bollinger}, 798 F.3d 201, 215-16 (4th Cir. 2015) (United States can convict a U.S. citizen who molested young girls while living in Haiti as the acts “demonstrably effect” the foreign commercial sex industry, without regard to whether that effect was “substantial,” as required by \textit{Lopez}; broader viewed adopted by Fourth and Ninth Circuits; \textit{Lopez} seems to apply in the Third, Sixth, and D.C. Circuits).

§ 7.1 Congressional Power Under the Taxing Clause

The Basic Doctrine

Article I, § 8, cl.1 states, “Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises.” This grants Congress a broad power to tax. The Supreme Court has always held Congress has the power to tax generally, and is not limited to taxing to advance other congressional powers in Article I, § 8. In such decisions, the Court has adopted the views of Hamilton and Story, noted at § 5.1 n.6, that the General Welfare Clause is part of a general grant of power to tax and spend.

If a law appears to be a tax, does not act or treat the subject as criminal, and produces some revenue, the law is a tax even though it has a regulatory effect or discourages the activities taxed. Indeed, even the Uniformity Clause in § 8, cl. 1, which provides that “all Duties, Imposts, and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States,” has been held not to bar Congress from dealing with geographically isolated problems by using geographically neutral factors, such as the high cost of extracting oil in Alaska, which justified an exemption of such oil from a windfall profits tax. Laws regarding punishment for income tax evasion are constitutional as a “necessary and proper” means to make effective the taxing power.

During the formalist era, the Court applied a more literal approach to the taxing power and held that a tax would be invalid if it were intended to have (1) a coercive effect of regulating an area over which (2) Congress did not have regulatory power. Thus, in 1922, in the Child Labor Tax Case, excerpted below, the Court invalidated a 10% tax on goods produced by child labor because the tax was a coercive attempt to regulate child labor indirectly, and thus evade the Supreme Court’s 1918 decision in Hammer v. Dagenhart that Congress did not have the power to regulate child labor conditions at manufacturing plants. Reflecting the moderate formalism that characterized a majority during the formalist era, the Court said regarding element (1) of the test stated above that a tax must truly be “coercive” or a “penalty” before it would be held unconstitutional. The Court noted that every tax will create some incentives for parties not to engage in the taxed behavior, and that such “incidental restraint and regulation which a tax must inevitably involve” is constitutional. As part of the shift from the formalist era to the Holmesian deference-to-government era, Justice Stone noted in 1937 in Sonzinski v. United States that it is beyond judicial competence to inquire into the "hidden motives" of Congress to determine whether a tax is an attempt to exercise forbidden regulatory power, and thus that aspect of the tax must appear on the face of the tax itself.

Since 1937 Congress has been granted broad regulatory power over economic activity that substantially affects interstate commerce, as addressed at §§ 6.2 - 6.4 Thus, regarding element (2) of the test stated above, there are few areas today where the Child Labor Tax Case reasoning could apply. If Congress has the power to regulate, and thus the power to ban the activity entirely, Congress has the power to tax the activity however Congress sees fit.

The formalist-era Court held in 1895 in Pollack v. Farmers’ Loan & Trust Co. that a generic income tax was unconstitutional as violating Article I, § 9, cl. 4, which provides, “No Capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in direct Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.” Based on literal text and specific historical intent, five members of the Court (Chief Justice Fuller, and Justices Brewer, Field, Gray, and Shiras) held that an income tax was a “direct tax” to which the “Census and Enumeration” Clause applied. Since an income tax is not based proportionately on population, but merely on income of individuals, such a tax was held to be unconstitutional. Four Justices in dissent, looking more to arguments of purpose, general historical evidence, legislative and executive practice, and judicial precedents (as would moderate formalists, or Holmesians, as for Justice Harlan), concluded that an income tax was not such a “direct tax.” In his dissent, Justice Brown noted that were the case to be decided based on literal text alone, he might vote with the majority, but the other sources of interpretation counseled for him a different result. In his dissent, Justice Jackson, rejecting a conclusion based on literal text, specifically referred to arguments of purpose, stating that “we cannot attribute to the framers of the constitution an intention to make any tax a direct tax which it was impossible to apportion.” Bowing to the practical needs of government financing, the decision in Pollack was overturned in 1913 by the 16th Amendment to the Constitution, which provides: “The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.”

In National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, excerpted below, Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, voted together to uphold the constitutionality of the individual mandate provision of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 (Obamacare). As addressed at the end of § 6.4 nn.48-49, the four liberal instrumentalists would have upheld the mandate provision, which requires individuals to purchase health insurance by 2014 or pay a penalty, under the Commerce Clause. In contrast, Chief Justice Roberts, in a viewed shared by the other four Justices on the Court, concluded the mandate was not a “regulation” of commerce, but rather “mandating” commerce, since it required individuals to purchase insurance. Reflecting his Holmesian deference-to-government predisposition, however, Chief Justice Roberts then adopted the Holmesian judicial restraint maxim stated in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, excerpted at § 2.3.3 n.70, that “[w]hen the validity of an act of Congress is drawn in question, [the Court] will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.” Applying that maxim, Chief Justice Roberts concluded that the mandate could be viewed as a tax on individuals who do not have health insurance, since “functionally” the provision operates as a tax, is collected by the IRS, and the amount of the payment varies depending on a person’s income, just like a tax. In concluding that the individual mandate was a tax, Chief Justice Roberts noted that the Court is not bound by what Congress calls a piece of legislation, but rather by its actual effect. Even Justice Scalia had acknowledged that principle in Clinton v. City of New York, excerpted at § 9.4, when he concluded that the Line-Item Veto Act was not an unconstitutional Line-Item Veto, but rather an impoundment provision, because it operated as an impoundment despite the terminology Congress used in the Act.

A four-Justice dissent rejected viewing the mandate as a tax, because, from an analytical perspective, it was imposed as a penalty for not procuring insurance, and was called that by Congress in passing the Act. For Justices who are more analytically minded, as are formalist (Scalia, Thomas & Alito) and natural law (Kennedy) Justices, such analytic considerations are more important. For functionalists, like Holmesian (Roberts) and instrumentalist (Ginsburg, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan) Justices, the functional aspect of a law is more critical. The tendencies of these Justices to be analytical or functional is addressed at § 1.1.2, Table 3.

Chief Justice TAFT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The law is attacked on the ground that it is a regulation of the employment of child labor in the states – an exclusively state function under the federal Constitution and within the reservations of the Tenth Amendment. It is defended on the ground that it is a mere excise tax levied by the Congress of the United States under its broad power of taxation conferred by section 8, article 1, of the federal Constitution. We must construe the law and interpret the intent and meaning of Congress from the language of the act. The words are to be given their ordinary meaning unless the context shows that they are differently used. Does this law impose a tax with only that incidental restraint and regulation which a tax must inevitably involve? Or does it regulate by the use of the so-called tax as a penalty? If a tax, it is clearly an excise. If it were an excise on a commodity or other thing of value, we might not be permitted under previous decisions of this court to infer solely from its heavy burden that the act intends a prohibition instead of a tax. But this act is more. It provides a heavy exaction for a departure from a detailed and specified course of conduct in business. That course of business is that employers shall employ in mines and quarries, children of an age greater than 16 years; in mills and factories, children of an age greater than 14 years, and shall prevent children of less than 16 years in mills and factories from working more than 8 hours a day or 6 days in the week. If an employer departs from this prescribed course of business, he is to pay to the government one-tenth of his entire net income in the business for a full year. The amount is not to be proportioned in any degree to the extent or frequency of the departures, but is to be paid by the employer in full measure whether he employs 500 children for a year, or employs only one for a day. Moreover, if he does not know the child is within the named age limit, he is not to pay; that is to say, it is only where he knowingly departs from the prescribed course that payment is to be exacted. Scienter is associated with penalties, not with taxes. The employer's factory is to be subject to inspection at any time not only by the taxing officers of the Treasury, the Department normally charged with the collection of taxes, but also by the Secretary of Labor and his subordinates, whose normal function is the advancement and protection of the welfare of the workers. In the light of these features of the act, a court must be blind not to see that the so-called tax is imposed to stop the employment of children within the age limits prescribed. Its prohibitory and regulatory effect and purpose are palpable. All others can see and understand this. How can we properly shut our minds to it?

The difference between a tax and a penalty is sometimes difficult to define, and yet the consequences of the distinction in the required method of their collection often are important. Where the sovereign enacting the law has power to impose both tax and penalty, the difference between revenue production and mere regulation may be immaterial, but not so when one sovereign can impose a tax only, and the power of regulation rests in another. Taxes are occasionally imposed in the discretion of the Legislature on proper subjects with the primary motive of obtaining revenue from them and with the incidental motive of discouraging them by making their continuance onerous. They do not lose their character as taxes because of the incidental motive. But there comes a time in the extension of the penalizing features of the so-called tax when it loses its character as such and becomes a mere penalty, with the characteristics of regulation and punishment. Such is the case in the law before us. Although Congress does not invalidate the contract of employment or expressly declare that the employment within the mentioned ages is illegal, it does exhibit its intent practically to achieve the latter result by adopting the criteria of wrongdoing and imposing its principal consequence on those who transgress its standard.

The case before us cannot be distinguished from that of Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 [(1918)]. Congress there enacted a law to prohibit transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which there was employment of children within the same ages and for the same number of hours a day and days in a week as are penalized by the act in this case. This court held the law in that case to be void. It said: “In our view the necessary effect of this act is, by means of a prohibition against the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the states, a purely state authority.”

In the case at the bar, Congress in the name of a tax which on the face of the act is penalty seeks to do the same thing, and the effort must be equally futile.

So here the so-called tax is a penalty to coerce people of a state to act as Congress wishes them to act in respect of a matter completely the business of the state government under the federal Constitution.

National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius

132 S. Ct. 2566 (2012)

Chief Justice ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court, and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, and III-C, in which Justice GINSBURG, Justice BREYER, Justice SOTOMAYOR, and Justice KAGAN join.

B

That is not the end of the matter. Because the Commerce Clause does not support the individual mandate, it is necessary to turn to the Government's second argument: that the mandate may be upheld as within Congress's enumerated power to “lay and collect Taxes.” Art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

The most straightforward reading of the mandate is that it commands individuals to purchase insurance. After all, it states that individuals “shall” maintain health insurance. 26 U.S.C. § 5000A(a). Congress thought it could enact such a command under the Commerce Clause, and the Government primarily defended the law on that basis. But, for the reasons explained above, the Commerce Clause does not give Congress that power. Under our precedent, it is therefore necessary to ask whether the Government's alternative reading of the statute – that it only imposes a tax on those without insurance – is a reasonable one.

Under the mandate, if an individual does not maintain health insurance, the only consequence is that he must make an additional payment to the IRS when he pays his taxes. See § 5000A(b). That, according to the Government, means the mandate can be regarded as establishing a condition – not owning health insurance – that triggers a tax – the required payment to the IRS. Under that theory, the mandate is not a legal command to buy insurance. Rather, it makes going without insurance just another thing the Government taxes, like buying gasoline or earning income. And if the mandate is in effect just a tax hike on certain taxpayers who do not have health insurance, it may be within Congress's constitutional power to tax.

The question is not whether that is the most natural interpretation of the mandate, but only whether it is a “fairly possible” one. Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932). As we have explained, “every reasonable construction must be resorted to, in order to save a statute from unconstitutionality.” Hooper v. California, 155 U.S. 648, 657 (1895). The Government asks us to interpret the mandate as imposing a tax, if it would otherwise violate the Constitution. Granting the Act the full measure of deference owed to federal statutes, it can be so read, for the reasons set forth below.

The exaction the Affordable Care Act imposes on those without health insurance looks like a tax in many respects. The “[s]hared responsibility payment,” as the statute entitles it, is paid into the Treasury by “taxpayer[s]” when they file their tax returns. 26 U.S.C. § 5000A(b). It does not apply to individuals who do not pay federal income taxes because their household income is less than the filing threshold in the Internal Revenue Code. § 5000A(e)(2). For taxpayers who do owe the payment, its amount is determined by such familiar factors as taxable income, number of dependents, and joint filing status. §§ 5000A(b)(3), (c)(2), (c)(4). The requirement to pay is found in the Internal Revenue Code and enforced by the IRS, which – as we previously explained – must assess and collect it “in the same manner as taxes.” Supra, at 2583-2584. This process yields the essential feature of any tax: it produces at least some revenue for the Government. United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22, 28, n 4 (1953). Indeed, the payment is expected to raise about $4 billion per year by 2017. Congressional Budget Office, Payments of Penalties for Being Uninsured Under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (Apr. 30, 2010), in Selected CBO Publications Related to Health Care Legislation, 2009-2010, p. 71 (rev. 2010).

It is of course true that the Act describes the payment as a “penalty,” not a “tax.” . . . That choice does not, however, control whether an exaction is within Congress's constitutional power to tax.

[We have] held that exactions not labeled taxes nonetheless were authorized by Congress's power to tax. In the License Tax Cases, for example, we held that federal licenses to sell liquor and lottery tickets – for which the licensee had to pay a fee – could be sustained as exercises of the taxing power.
power. 5 Wall., at 471. And in New York v. United States we upheld as a tax a “surcharge” on out-of-state nuclear waste shipments, a portion of which was paid to the Federal Treasury. 505 U.S., at 171. We thus ask whether the shared responsibility payment falls within Congress's taxing power, “[d]isregarding the designation of the exaction, and viewing its substance and application.” United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287, 294 (1935); cf. Quill Corp. v. North Dakota, 504 U.S. 298, 310 (1992) (“[M]agic words or labels” should not “disable an otherwise constitutional levy” (internal quotation marks omitted)); Nelson v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 312 U.S. 359, 363 (1941) (“In passing on the constitutionality of a tax law, we are concerned only with its practical operation, not its definition or the precise form of descriptive words which may be applied to it” (internal quotation marks omitted)); United States v. Sotelo, 436 U.S. 268, 275 (1978) (“That the funds due are referred to as a ‘penalty’ . . . does not alter their essential character as taxes”.

For example, in Drexel Furniture [Child Labor Tax Case], we focused on three practical characteristics of the so-called tax on employing child laborers that convinced us the “tax” was actually a penalty. First, the tax imposed an exceedingly heavy burden – 10 percent of a company's net income – on those who employed children, no matter how small their infraction. Second, it imposed that exaction only on those who knowingly employed underage laborers. Such scienter requirements are typical of punitive statutes, because Congress often wishes to punish only those who intentionally break the law. Third, this “tax” was enforced in part by the Department of Labor, an agency responsible for punishing violations of labor laws, not collecting revenue. 259 U.S., at 36-37; see also, e.g., Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S., at 780-782 (considering, inter alia, the amount of the exaction, and the fact that it was imposed for violation of a separate criminal law).

The same analysis here suggests that the shared responsibility payment may for constitutional purposes be considered a tax, not a penalty: First, for most Americans the amount due will be far less than the price of insurance, and, by statute, it can never be more. It may often be a reasonable financial decision to make the payment rather than purchase insurance, unlike the “prohibitory” financial punishment in Drexel Furniture. 259 U.S., at 37. Second, the individual mandate contains no scienter requirement. Third, the payment is collected solely by the IRS through the normal means of taxation – except that the Service is not allowed to use those means most suggestive of a punitive sanction, such as criminal prosecution. See § 5000A(g)(2). The reasons the Court in Drexel Furniture held that what was called a “tax” there was a penalty support the conclusion that what is called a “penalty” here may be viewed as a tax.

Even if the taxing power enables Congress to impose a tax on not obtaining health insurance, any tax must still comply with other requirements in the Constitution. Plaintiffs argue that the shared responsibility payment does not do so, citing Article I, § 9, clause 4. That clause provides: “No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.” This requirement means that any “direct Tax” must be apportioned so that each State pays in proportion to its population. According to the plaintiffs, if the individual mandate imposes a tax, it is a direct tax, and it is unconstitutional because Congress made no effort to apportion it among the States.
Even when the Direct Tax Clause was written it was unclear what else, other than a capitation (also known as a “head tax” or a “poll tax”), might be a direct tax. See Springer v. United States, 102 U.S.
586, 596-598 (1881). Soon after the framing, Congress passed a tax on ownership of carriages, over James Madison's objection that it was an unapportioned direct tax. Id., at 597. This Court upheld the tax, in part reasoning that apportioning such a tax would make little sense, because it would have required taxing carriage owners at dramatically different rates depending on how many carriages were in their home State. See Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall. 171, 174 (1796) (opinion of Chase, J.). The Court was unanimous, and those Justices who wrote opinions either directly asserted or strongly suggested that only two forms of taxation were direct: capitations and land taxes. See id., at 175; id., at 177 (opinion of Paterson, J.); id., at 183 (opinion of Iredell, J.).

That narrow view of what a direct tax might be persisted for a century. In 1880, for example, we explained that “direct taxes, within the meaning of the Constitution, are only capitation taxes, as expressed in that instrument, and taxes on real estate.” Springer, supra, at 602. In 1895, we expanded our interpretation to include taxes on personal property and income from personal property, in the course of striking down aspects of the federal income tax. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601, 618 (1895). That result was overturned by the Sixteenth Amendment, although we continued to consider taxes on personal property to be direct taxes. See Eisner v. Macomber, 252

A tax on going without health insurance does not fall within any recognized category of direct tax.
It is not a capitation. Capitations are taxes paid by every person, “without regard to property, profession, or any other circumstance.” Hylton, supra, at 175 (opinion of Chase, J.) (emphasis altered). The whole point of the shared responsibility payment is that it is triggered by specific circumstances – earning a certain amount of income but not obtaining health insurance. The payment is also plainly not a tax on the ownership of land or personal property. The shared responsibility payment is thus not a direct tax that must be apportioned among the several States.

There may, however, be a more fundamental objection to a tax on those who lack health insurance.
Even if only a tax, the payment under § 5000A(b) remains a burden that the Federal Government imposes for an omission, not an act. If it is troubling to interpret the Commerce Clause as authorizing Congress to regulate those who abstain from commerce, perhaps it should be similarly troubling to permit Congress to impose a tax for not doing something.

Three considerations allay this concern. First, and most importantly, it is abundantly clear the Constitution does not guarantee that individuals may avoid taxation through inactivity. A capitation, after all, is a tax that everyone must pay simply for existing, and capitations are expressly contemplated by the Constitution. The Court today holds that our Constitution protects us from federal regulation under the Commerce Clause so long as we abstain from the regulated activity. But from its creation, the Constitution has made no such promise with respect to taxes. See Letter from Benjamin Franklin to M. Le Roy (Nov. 13, 1789) (“Our new Constitution is now established . . . but in this world nothing can be said to be certain, except death and taxes”).
Second, Congress's ability to use its taxing power to influence conduct is not without limits. A few of our cases policed these limits aggressively, invalidating punitive exactions obviously designed to regulate behavior otherwise regarded at the time as beyond federal authority. See, e.g., United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936); Drexel Furniture, 259 U.S. 20. More often and more recently we have declined to closely examine the regulatory motive or effect of revenue-raising measures. See Kahriger, 345 U.S., at 27-31 (collecting cases). We have nonetheless maintained that “‘there comes a time in the extension of the penalizing features of the so-called tax when it loses its character as such and becomes a mere penalty with the characteristics of regulation and punishment.’” Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S., at 779 (quoting Drexel Furniture, supra, at 38).

We have already explained that the shared responsibility payment's practical characteristics pass muster as a tax under our narrowest interpretations of the taxing power. Because the tax at hand is within even those strict limits, we need not here decide the precise point at which an exaction becomes so punitive that the taxing power does not authorize it. It remains true, however, that the “‘power to tax is not the power to destroy while this Court sits.’” Oklahoma Tax Comm'n v. Texas Co., 336 U.S. 342, 364 (1949) (quoting Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi ex rel. Knox, 277 U.S. 218, 223 (1928) (Holmes, J., dissenting)).

Third, although the breadth of Congress's power to tax is greater than its power to regulate commerce, the taxing power does not give Congress the same degree of control over individual behavior. Once we recognize that Congress may regulate a particular decision under the Commerce Clause, the Federal Government can bring its full weight to bear. Congress may simply command individuals to do as it directs. An individual who disobeys may be subjected to criminal sanctions. Those sanctions can include not only fines and imprisonment, but all the attendant consequences of being branded a criminal: deprivation of otherwise protected civil rights, such as the right to bear arms or vote in elections; loss of employment opportunities; social stigma; and severe disabilities in other controversies, such as custody or immigration disputes.

By contrast, Congress's authority under the taxing power is limited to requiring an individual to pay money into the Federal Treasury, no more. If a tax is properly paid, the Government has no power to compel or punish individuals subject to it. We do not make light of the severe burden that taxation – especially taxation motivated by a regulatory purpose – can impose. But imposition of a tax nonetheless leaves an individual with a lawful choice to do or not do a certain act, so long as he is willing to pay a tax levied on that choice.

The Affordable Care Act's requirement that certain individuals pay a financial penalty for not obtaining health insurance may reasonably be characterized as a tax. Because the Constitution permits such a tax, it is not our role to forbid it, or to pass upon its wisdom or fairness.

The issue is not whether Congress had the power to frame the minimum-coverage provision as a tax, but whether it did so.
In answering that question we must, if “fairly possible,” Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932), construe the provision to be a tax rather than a mandate-with-penalty, since that would render it constitutional rather than unconstitutional (ut res magis valeat quam pereat). But we cannot rewrite the statute to be what it is not. “[A]lthough this Court will often strain to construe legislation so as to save it against constitutional attack, it must not and will not carry this to the point of perverting the purpose of a statute . . .” or judicially rewriting it.” Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 841 (1986) (quoting Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500, 515 (1964), in turn quoting Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 211 (1961)). In this case, there is simply no way, “without doing violence to the fair meaning of the words used,” Grenada County Supervisors v. Brogden, 112 U.S. 261, 269 (1884), to escape what Congress enacted: a mandate that individuals maintain minimum essential coverage, enforced by a penalty.

Our cases establish a clear line between a tax and a penalty: “ ‘[A] tax is an enforced contribution to provide for the support of government; a penalty . . . is an exaction imposed by statute as punishment for an unlawful act.’ ” United States v. Reorganized CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc., 518 U.S. 213, 224 (1996) (quoting United States v. La Franca, 282 U.S. 568, 572 (1931)). In a few cases, this Court has held that a “tax” imposed upon private conduct was so onerous as to be in effect a penalty. But we have never held – never – that a penalty imposed for violation of the law was so trivial as to be in effect a tax. We have never held that any exaction imposed for violation of the law is an exercise of Congress' taxing power – even when the statute calls it a tax, much less when (as here) the statute repeatedly calls it a penalty. When an act “adopt[s] the criteria of wrongdoing” and then imposes a monetary penalty as the “principal consequence on those who transgress its standard,” it creates a regulatory penalty, not a tax. Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20, 38 (1922).

We never have classified as a tax an exaction imposed for violation of the law, and so too, we never have classified as a tax an exaction described in the legislation itself as a penalty. To be sure, we have sometimes treated as a tax a statutory exaction (imposed for something other than a violation of law) which bore an agnostic label that does not entail the significant constitutional consequences of a penalty – such as “license” (License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462 (1867)) or “surcharge” (New York v. United States, supra.). But we have never – never – treated as a tax an exaction which faces up to the critical difference between a tax and a penalty, and explicitly denominates the exaction a “penalty.” Eighteen times in § 5000A itself and elsewhere throughout the Act, Congress called the exaction in § 5000A(b) a “penalty.”

That § 5000A imposes not a simple tax but a mandate to which a penalty is attached is demonstrated by the fact that some are exempt from the tax who are not exempt from the mandate – a distinction that would make no sense if the mandate were not a mandate. Section 5000A(d) exempts three classes of people from the definition of “applicable individual” subject to the minimum coverage requirement: Those with religious objections or who participate in a “health care sharing ministry,” § 5000A(d)(2); those who are “not lawfully present” in the United States, § 5000A(d)(3); and those who are incarcerated, § 5000A(d)(4). Section 5000A(e) then creates a separate set of exemptions, excusing from liability for the penalty certain individuals who are subject to the minimum coverage requirement: Those who cannot afford coverage, § 5000A(e)(1); who earn too little income to require filing a tax return, § 5000A(e)(2); who are members of an Indian tribe, § 5000A(e)(3); who experience only short gaps in coverage, § 5000A(e)(4); and who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Health and Human Services, “have suffered a hardship with respect to the capability to obtain coverage,” § 5000A(e)(5). If § 5000A were a tax, these two classes of exemption would make no sense; there being no requirement, all the exemptions would attach to the penalty (renamed tax) alone.

In the face of all these indications of a regulatory requirement accompanied by a penalty, the Solicitor General assures us that “neither the Treasury Department nor the Department of Health and Human Services interprets Section 5000A as imposing a legal obligation,” Petitioners' Minimum Coverage Brief 61, and that “[i]f [those subject to the Act] pay the tax penalty, they're in compliance with the law,” Tr. of Oral Arg. 50 (Mar. 26, 2012). These self-serving litigating positions are entitled to no weight. What counts is what the statute says, and that is entirely clear.

To say that the Individual Mandate merely imposes a tax is not to interpret the statute but to rewrite it. Judicial tax-writing is particularly troubling. Taxes have never been popular, see, e.g., Stamp Act of 1765, and in part for that reason, the Constitution requires tax increases to originate in the House of Representatives. See Art. I, § 7, cl. 1. That is to say, they must originate in the legislative body most accountable to the people, where legislators must weigh the need for the tax against the terrible price they might pay at their next election, which is never more than two years off. The Federalist No. 58 “defend[ed] the decision to give the origination power to the House on the ground that the Chamber that is more accountable to the people should have the primary role in raising revenue.” United States v. Munoz-Flores, 495 U.S. 385, 395 (1990). We have no doubt that Congress knew precisely what it was doing when it rejected an earlier version of this legislation that imposed a tax instead of a requirement-with-penalty. See Affordable Health Care for America Act, H.R. 3962, 111th Cong., 1st Sess., § 501 (2009); America's Healthy Future Act of 2009, S. 1796, 111th Cong., 1st Sess., § 1301. Imposing a tax through judicial legislation inverts the constitutional scheme, and places the power to tax in the branch of government least accountable to the citizenry.

Finally, we must observe that rewriting § 5000A as a tax in order to sustain its constitutionality would force us to confront a difficult constitutional question: whether this is a direct tax that must be apportioned among the States according to their population. Art. I, § 9, cl. 4. Perhaps it is not (we have no need to address the point); but the meaning of the Direct Tax Clause is famously unclear, and its application here is a question of first impression that deserves more thoughtful consideration than the lick-and-a-promise accorded by the Government and its supporters. The Government's opening brief did not even address the question – perhaps because, until today, no federal court has accepted the implausible argument that § 5000A is an exercise of the tax power. And once respondents raised the issue, the Government devoted a mere 21 lines of its reply brief to the issue. Petitioners' Minimum Coverage Reply Brief 25. At oral argument, the most prolonged statement about the issue was just over 50 words. Tr. of Oral Arg. 79 (Mar. 27, 2012). One would expect this Court to demand more than fly-by-night briefing and argument before deciding a difficult constitutional question of first impression.
Although referenced in Chief Justice Roberts opinion above, it is useful to note that, under the Affordable Care Act, the Internal Revenue Service is prevented from using its normal enforcement powers to collect the tax due for failure to obtain insurance: criminal indictments for nonpayment, including the possibility of jail time, penalties with respect to untimely payment, or liens on property to collect taxes dues. The only remedy for the government is to deduct the penalty amount from any refund check to which the person would normally be entitled. If the penalty is greater than the refund amount, the government can take the penalty out of the next year’s withholding payments.

An additional issue in National Federation of Independent Business was whether the individual mandate was a tax for purposes of the Anti-Injunction Act. If the individual mandate had been viewed as a tax under the Anti-Injunction Act, the challengers would have had to wait until after they paid the tax to challenge the constitutionality of the regulation. For statutory interpretation purposes, the Court is bound by congressional intent, which is why the individual mandate was not viewed as a tax for purposes of interpreting the Anti-Injunction Act. As Chief Justice Roberts stated, “It is up to Congress whether to apply the Anti-Injunction Act to any particular statute, so it makes sense to be guided by Congress’s choice of label on that question. That choice does not, however, control whether the exaction is within Congress’s constitutional power to tax.”

Another statutory issue under the Affordable Care Act turned out to be whether the provision for federal subsidies to low-income individuals buying mandated insurance on an insurance exchange “established by the State” also included subsidies for individuals buying insurance on the “federal exchange” available to individuals in states where the State did not establish their own exchanges. Consistent with the purpose of the ACA to provide affordable health care, a 6-3 Court held in King v. Burwell that the Act did provide for subsidies to all individuals in every state.

2. Doctrine of Intergovernmental Tax Immunities

A. Federal Immunity from State Taxation

It has been clear since McCulloch v. Maryland, decided in 1819, that states may not directly tax the federal government or any of its instrumentalities. The Court has said in a number of cases that 13 See 132 S. Ct. at 2596 (Roberts, C.J., for the Court), citing 26 U.S.C.A. § 5000A(g)(2).

15 Id. at 2594. As Chief Justice Roberts noted in his opinion above, “The ‘question of the constitutionality of action taken by Congress does not depend on recitals of the power which it undertakes to exercise.’”Id. at 2598, citing Woods v. Cloyd W. Miller Co., 333 U.S. 138, 144 (1948).

activities of the United States remain free from state taxation or regulation unless Congress consents by declaring that its instrumentalities or property are subject to state regulation.\textsuperscript{18} For many decades the Court expanded \textit{McCulloch} by holding that states could not tax income from working for or contracting with the United States because that might increase the cost of federal functions.\textsuperscript{19}

In 1939, however, the Holmesian Court abandoned in \textit{Graves v. New York}\textsuperscript{20} the long-held theory that a tax on income was a tax on its source and, deferring to legislative judgments, held that states could tax the income of federal employees. The Court said that states could tax subjects that fell within the general application of non-discriminatory laws where no direct burden is laid on a federal instrumentality and there is only a remote influence on the exercise of government functions. Thus, states can now tax private parties with whom the United States does business unless the private party cannot realistically be viewed as a separate entity insofar as the activity being taxed is concerned.\textsuperscript{21} However, the Court has invalidated as discriminatory a state tax on retirement income which exempted retirement benefits paid by the state and its political subdivisions. Adopting a functional approach, the Court said this favored retired state and local employees over retired federal employees and, thus, discriminated against persons who had dealt with the federal government.\textsuperscript{22}

\textbf{B. State Immunity from Federal Taxation}

During the formalist era, the Court held in \textit{Pollack v. Farmer’s Loan}\textsuperscript{23} that any interest earned on a state bond was immune from federal taxation because it was a direct tax on the state and, thus, in

\begin{itemize}
    \item \textsuperscript{18} Van Brocklin v. Anderson, 117 U.S. 151 (1886) (Congress may permit taxation of federal property or authorize payments in lieu of taxation); Leslie Miller, Inc. v. Arkansas, 352 U.S. 187 (1956) (states may not bar unlicensed contractors from dealing with the federal government where federal law has its own criteria for identifying the lowest responsible bidder); Hancock v. Train, 426 U.S. 167 (1976) (no consent that state air pollution laws could apply to United States facilities).

    \item \textsuperscript{21} United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720 (1982) (upholding a state tax on gross income that a private contractor, a manager of government property, received from the federal government, even though title for goods purchased passed directly from the vendor to the federal government).

violation of the 10th Amendment. Similarly, the Court had earlier held that the United States could not tax the income of a state employee on income earned from the state.24

In deciding these cases, the Court would hold that while the federal government could not tax state “governmental” activities, it could tax “proprietary” activities. The attempt to distinguish between “governmental” and “proprietary” functions, however, proved elusive. As noted by Justice Blackmun in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority:

To say that the distinction between "governmental" and "proprietary" proved to be stable, however, would be something of an overstatement. In 1911, for example, the Court declared that the provision of a municipal water supply "is no part of the essential governmental functions of a State." Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107, 172. Twenty-six years later, without any intervening change in the applicable legal standards, the Court simply rejected its earlier position and decided that the provision of a municipal water supply was immune from federal taxation as an essential governmental function, even though municipal waterworks long had been operated for profit by private industry. Brush v. Commissioner, 300 U.S., at 370-373. At the same time that the Court was holding a municipal water supply to be immune from federal taxes, it had held that a state-run commuter rail system was not immune. Helvering v. Powers, 293 U.S. 214 (1934). Justice Black, in Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U.S. 405, 427 (1938), was moved to observe: "An implied constitutional distinction which taxes income of an officer of a state-operated transportation system and exempts income of the manager of a municipal water works system manifests the uncertainty created by the 'essential' and 'non-essential' test" (concurring opinion). It was this uncertainty and instability that led the Court shortly thereafter, in New York v. United States, 326 U.S. 572 (1946), unanimously to conclude that the distinction between "governmental" and "proprietary" functions was "untenable" and must be abandoned.25

In 1939, deferring to legislative judgments and adopting a functional approach, the Court held in Graves v. New York that the theory was no longer tenable that a tax on income is legally a tax on its source.26 After Graves, the Court gradually overruled the cases which immunized from federal taxation all income earned by dealings with a state. Today, Congress can tax state activities that earn revenue if it also lays a tax on similar private activities.27

In 1988, in South Carolina v. Baker,\(^{28}\) the Court overruled specifically the doctrine of Pollack that state bond interest is immune from a nondiscriminatory federal tax. Justice O'Connor, dissenting in South Carolina v. Baker, said that the Court had failed to enforce the constitutional safeguards of state autonomy and self-sufficiency that are found in the 10th Amendment and the Guarantee Clause, as well as in the principles of federalism implicit in the Constitution. In reply, Justice Brennan pointed out that the state had not alleged that it was deprived of any right to participate in the political process or that it was singled out in a way that left it politically isolated and powerless.

§ 7.2 Congressional Power Under the Spending Clause

1. The Basic Doctrine

During the formalist era, in 1936, the Court held in United States v. Butler\(^{29}\) that Congress could not raise and spend money in order to regulate indirectly any activity that it could not regulate directly. Like the similar formalist-era approach to the taxing power, only coercive uses of the spending power, and not incidental incentives created by spending, were unconstitutional. Like the formalist-era tax doctrine, this view has been limited in cases decided since 1937.

The first step in moving away from Butler occurred in 1937 in Charles C. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis.\(^{30}\) There, a 5-4 Court, narrowly limited Butler, and upheld an employer tax used to fund unemployment compensation schemes, with a 90% tax credit for funds contributed to a qualified state unemployment program. The Court said that spending money to relieve unemployment during the Great Depression promoted the general welfare. Rebating the tax only to "qualified" state programs created an incentive for state enactment of such programs, and was not coercive.

The second step was taken in Helvering v. Davis,\(^{31}\) also decided in 1937. In Helvering, the Court upheld paying old age benefits under the General Welfare Clause. The Court said that when money is spent to promote the general welfare, the concept of welfare or its opposite is shaped by Congress. If the concept is not arbitrary, the states must yield. The Court went further in 1976 in Buckley v.

Valeo\textsuperscript{32} saying it is for Congress to decide which expenditures will promote the public welfare and "[a]ny limitations on the exercise of that granted power must be found elsewhere in the Constitution." In these decisions, the Court adopted the views of Hamilton and Story, noted at § 5.1 n.6, that the General Welfare Clause is part of a general grant of power to tax and spend.

When combined with the Necessary and Proper Clause, the Spending Clause also provides the constitutional basis for federal laws dealing with bribery in the administration of a federal program. As the Court noted in \textit{Sabri v. United States},\textsuperscript{33} federal laws regarding bribery, such as 18 U.S.C. § 666, do not need to require that the bribe come from federal funds to be constitutional, only that the bribe take place in the context of a federal program, so that the federal law is connected to proper implementation of a program involving federal funds.

\textit{Sabri v. United States}

Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question is whether 18 U.S.C. § 666(a)(2), proscribing bribery of state, local, and tribal officials of entities that receive at least $10,000 in federal funds, is a valid exercise of congressional authority under Article I of the Constitution. We hold that it is.

Congress has authority under the Spending Clause to appropriate federal moneys to promote the general welfare, Art. I, § 8, cl. 1, and it has corresponding authority under the Necessary and Proper Clause, Art. I, § 8, cl. 18, to see to it that taxpayer dollars appropriated under that power are in fact spent for the general welfare, and not frittered away in graft or on projects undermined when funds are siphoned off or corrupt public officers are delict about demanding value for dollars. See generally McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (1819) (establishing review for means-ends rationality under the Necessary and Proper Clause). See also Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276 (1981) (same); Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965) (same). Congress does not have to sit by and accept the risk of operations thwarted by local and state improbity. See, e.g., McCulloch, supra, at 417 (power to “establish post-offices and

It is true, just as Sabri says, that not every bribe or kickback offered or paid to agents of governments covered by § 666(b) will be traceably skimmed from specific federal payments, or show up in the guise of a quid pro quo for some dereliction in spending a federal grant. Cf. Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 56-57 (1997) (The “expansive, unqualified” language of the statute “does not support the interpretation that federal funds must be affected to violate § 666(a)(1)(B)”). But this possibility portends no enforcement beyond the scope of federal interest, for the reason that corruption does not have to be that limited to affect the federal interest. Money is fungible, bribed officials are untrustworthy stewards of federal funds, and corrupt contractors do not deliver dollar-for-dollar value. Liquidity is not a financial term for nothing; money can be drained off here because a federal grant is pouring in there. And officials are not any the less threatening to the objects behind federal spending just because they may accept general retainers. See Westfall v. United States, 274 U.S. 256, 259 (1927) (majority opinion by Holmes, J.) (upholding federal law criminalizing fraud on a state bank member of federal system, even where federal funds not directly implicated). It is certainly enough that the statutes condition the offense on a threshold amount of federal dollars defining the federal interest, such as that provided here.

For those of us who accept help from legislative history, it is worth noting that the legislative record confirms that § 666(a)(2) is an instance of necessary and proper legislation. The design was generally to “protect the integrity of the vast sums of money distributed through Federal programs from theft, fraud, and undue influence by bribery,” see S. Rep. No. 98-225, p. 370 (1983), in contrast to prior federal law affording only two limited opportunities to prosecute such threats to the federal interest: 18 U.S.C. § 641, the federal theft statute, and § 201, the federal bribery law. Those laws had proven inadequate to the task. The former went only to outright theft of unadulterated federal funds, and prior to this Court's opinion in Dixson v. United States, 465 U.S. 482 (1984), which came after passage of § 666, the bribery statute had been interpreted by lower courts to bar prosecution of bribes directed at state and local officials. See, e.g., United States v. Del Toro, 513 F.2d 656, 661-663 (C.A.2 1975) (overturning federal bribery conviction); see generally Salinas, 522 U.S., at 58-59 (recounting the limitations of the pre-existing statutory framework). Thus we said that § 666 “was designed to extend federal bribery prohibitions to bribes offered to state and local officials employed by agencies receiving federal funds,” id., at 58, thereby filling the regulatory gaps. Congress's decision to enact § 666 only after other legislation had failed to protect federal interests is further indication that it was acting within the ambit of the Necessary and Proper Clause.
2. Indirect Regulation of States by Conditions in Federal Spending Programs

As the Court noted in Fullilove v. Klutznick, 34 “Congress has frequently employed the Spending Power to further broad policy objectives by conditioning receipt of federal moneys upon compliance by the recipient with federal statutory and administrative directives.” The only states-rights’ federalism with respect to spending are in two kinds of cases involving conditions placed by Congress on grants of money flowing to the states. The first kind of case is Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman. 35 In Pennhurst, the Court held that if Congress intends to impose a condition on the grant of federal money to the states, it must do so unambiguously so that the states voluntarily and knowingly accept the terms of the grant. The second kind of case is South Dakota v. Dole. 36 In Dole, the Court held that conditions on federal grants must be clear and unambiguous, but, if so, they are constitutional unless they are not rationally related to a federal interest in national projects, or if they create such powerful incentives that they are coercive, or if they are used to induce states to engage in unconstitutional activities.

Between 1937 and 2012, no congressional condition on spending was held to be unconstitutional. For example, in 1987 in South Dakota v. Dole, 37 excerpted below, the Court upheld congressional withholding of 5% of federal highway funds from any state in which the purchase or public possession of alcoholic beverages by any person under 21 was lawful. This condition put pressure on the states to outlaw drinking by persons under 21, a result that Congress could likely not achieve directly under the Commerce Clause because of the 21st Amendment. After repealing Prohibition in § 1 of the 21st Amendment, § 2 of that Amendment appears to give the states an exclusive power to bar the delivery or use of intoxicating liquors in their states, as discussed at § 14.4.4 nn.114-16. In Dole, Justice Rehnquist said the Court was not deciding whether the 21st Amendment would prohibit Congress from enacting a national minimum drinking age. The reason was that the conditional spending legislation was constitutional even if Congress could not directly regulate the drinking age. Congress can condition spending of funds on compliance with federal rules, subject to only a few limits on the conditional spending power. Similarly, Congress could likely condition certain highway funds on states adopting uniform standards for driver’s licenses as part of a program of national identity cards if Congress so wished.

In the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, Congress conditioned rather large federal educational grants to the states on the states adopting a panoply of educational testing requirements. As has been noted, federal funding to support elementary and secondary education amounts to 12.8% of total

federal outlays to the states, and equals 6.6% of all state expenditures on education.\textsuperscript{38} Nonetheless, if litigated, it is likely the Court would find such conditions are reasonably related to the federal interest in an educated citizenry, and do not represent a coercive use of the spending power. In a reported decision, the National Education Association and local school districts did not even challenge this aspect of the Act, but only whether the spending conditions were clear and unambiguous.\textsuperscript{39}

Some commentators have expressed concern that this broad spending power gives Congress too much power to affect matters of traditional state concern and undermines limits on federal power under the Commerce Clause, addressed at § 6.4; the 10th Amendment, addressed at § 8.1; the 11th Amendment, addressed at § 8.2; and Congress’ 14th Amendment enforcement power, addressed at § 7.4.2. However, that power is implicit in Court doctrine, and lower courts have similarly read \textit{Dole} as giving Congress virtually unreviewable power in this area.\textsuperscript{40}

In 2012, in \textit{National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius},\textsuperscript{41} excerpted below, the Court was confronted with whether under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 (Obamacare), the ability of the federal government to deny a state all Medicaid funding if a state chose not to join in Medicaid expansion constituted an unconstitutional coercive condition on spending. Medicaid has long been the largest federal program of grants to the states. In 2010, the Federal Government directed more than $552 billion in federal funds to the states, of which more than $233 billion, or 42%, went to pre-expansion Medicaid. Contrast that with the 12.8% of federal funding going to education which was at risk in the No Child Left Behind Act. Although no previous spending condition had been held coercive in the post-1937, New Deal era, seven Justices held that threatening to remove all Medicaid funding was a coercive threat, as it might involve 10%-40% of a state’s budget, depending on the state, and averaging 22% of state budgets generally.\textsuperscript{42}

\textsuperscript{42} \textit{Id.} at 2575, 2607 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Breyer & Kagan, JJ., as to Part IV); \textit{id.} at 2662-66 (joint opinion of Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas & Alito, JJ., dissenting). Only Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor disagreed. \textit{Id.} at 2641-42 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., as to Part V).
\end{flushright}
A different 5-Justice majority of Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan concluded that the threat to remove all funding could be severed from the Act, and the rest of the Act remain.\textsuperscript{43} The 4-Justice joint dissent would have held that this threat rendered the entire Medicaid expansion unconstitutional. That conclusion was easier for the joint dissent because of their view that the individual mandate was also unconstitutional, and thus trying to sever out both the individual mandate and the Medicaid expansion threat would have left the statute more of a mere shell. Thus, they ruled the entire Affordable Care Act unconstitutional.\textsuperscript{44} Once the mandate provision is constitutional under the Taxing power, discussed at § 7.1 nn.7-12, and excerpted at § 7.1.1, the majority’s analysis is consistent with the Court’s usual practice to sever out provisions if possible.

Under the Act, the federal government will pick up 100% of the costs of Medicaid expansion in the first three years, declining to 90% of the costs after that.\textsuperscript{45} Under the majority’s analysis in National Federation of Independent Business, states will be able to make the decision whether to participate in Medicaid expansion without having to worry that their existing Medicaid funds might be terminated if they do not participate. The decision will also likely increase the number of cases where states will challenge other federal government conditions as being coercive.\textsuperscript{46}

It remains to be seen whether any such challenges will be successful, or will the Court view the massive spending threat regarding Medicaid funding as \textit{sui generis}.\textsuperscript{47} We do know that no court has ever held that the threat in the No Child Left Behind Act to remove federal support for education

Petitioner South Dakota permits persons 19 years of age or older to purchase beer containing up to 3.2% alcohol. S.D. Codified Laws § 35-6-27 (1986). In 1984 Congress enacted 23 U.S.C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III), which directs the Secretary of Transportation to withhold a percentage of federal highway funds [Ed.: on the facts in this case 5%] otherwise allocable from States “in which the purchase or public possession . . . of any alcoholic beverage by a person who is less than twenty-one years of age is lawful.” The State sued in United States District Court seeking a declaratory judgment that § 158 violates the constitutional limitations on congressional exercise of the spending power and violates the Twenty-first Amendment to the United States Constitution. The District Court rejected the State's claims, and the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed. 791 F.2d 628 (1986).

The Constitution empowers Congress to “lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States.” Art. I, § 8, cl. 1. Incident to this power, Congress may attach conditions on the receipt of federal funds, and has repeatedly employed the power “to further broad policy objectives by conditioning receipt of federal moneys upon compliance by the recipient with federal statutory and administrative directives.” Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 474 (1980) (opinion of Burger, C.J.). The breadth of this power was made clear in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 66 (1936), where the Court, resolving a longstanding debate over the scope of the Spending Clause, determined that “the power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution.” Thus, objectives not thought to be within Article I's “enumerated legislative fields,” id., at 65, 56 S.Ct., at 319, may nevertheless be attained through the use of the spending power and the conditional grant of federal funds.

The spending power is of course not unlimited, Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 17 (1981), but is instead subject to several general restrictions articulated in our cases. The first of these limitations is derived from the language of the Constitution itself: the exercise of the spending power must be in pursuit of “the general welfare.” See Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 48

See generally id. at 612-29. As the author notes, “Examination of the financial terms on No Child Left Behind should lead to the conclusion that the law does not constitute dragooning under either the plurality’s analysis or the joint dissent’s.” Id. at 621. Further, the federal government routinely waived requirements of the No Child Left Behind Act to ensure that states would not be denied funding, thus making the program even less coercive in practice. Id. at 616.

In considering whether a particular expenditure is intended to serve general public purposes, courts should defer substantially to the judgment of Congress. Helvering v. Davis, supra, at 640, 645. [FN 2: The level of deference to the congressional decision is such that the Court has more recently questioned whether “general welfare” is a judicially enforceable restriction at all. See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 90-91 (1976) (per curiam)]. Second, we have required that if Congress desires to condition the States' receipt of federal funds, it “must do so unambiguously . . . , enabl[ing] the States to exercise their choice knowingly, cognizant of the consequences of their participation.” Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, supra, at 17. Third, our cases have suggested (without significant elaboration) that conditions on federal grants might be illegitimate if they are unrelated “to the federal interest in particular national projects or programs.” Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444, 461 (1978) (plurality opinion). See also Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, supra, 357 U.S., at 295 (“[T]he Federal Government may establish and impose reasonable conditions relevant to federal interest in the project and to the over-all objectives thereof”). Finally, we have noted that other constitutional provisions may provide an independent bar to the conditional grant of federal funds. Lawrence County v. Lead-Deadwood School Dist., 469 U.S. 256, 269-270 (1985); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 91 (1976) (per curiam); King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 333, n. 34 (1968).

South Dakota does not seriously claim that § 158 is inconsistent with any of the first three restrictions mentioned above. We can readily conclude that the provision is designed to serve the general welfare, especially in light of the fact that “the concept of welfare or the opposite is shaped by Congress . . . .” Helvering v. Davis, supra, at 645. Congress found that the differing drinking ages in the States created particular incentives for young persons to combine their desire to drink with their ability to drive, and that this interstate problem required a national solution. The means it chose to address this dangerous situation were reasonably calculated to advance the general welfare. The conditions upon which States receive the funds, moreover, could not be more clearly stated by Congress. See 23 U.S.C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III). And the State itself, rather than challenging the germaneness of the condition to federal purposes, admits that it “has never contended that the congressional action was . . . unrelated to a national concern in the absence of the Twenty-first Amendment.” Brief for Petitioner 52. Indeed, the condition imposed by Congress is directly related to one of the main purposes for which highway funds are expended – safe interstate travel. See 23 U.S.C. § 101(b). This goal of the interstate highway system had been frustrated by varying drinking ages among the States. A Presidential commission appointed to study alcohol-related accidents and fatalities on the Nation's highways concluded that the lack of uniformity in the States' drinking ages created “an incentive to drink and drive” because “young persons commut[e] to border States where the drinking age is lower.” Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving, Final Report 11 (1983). By enacting § 158, Congress conditioned the receipt of federal funds in a way reasonably calculated to address this particular impediment to a purpose for which the funds are expended.

[Regarding the fourth restriction, o]ur decisions have recognized that in some circumstances the financial inducement offered by Congress might be so coercive as to pass the point at which “pressure turns into compulsion.” Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, 301 U.S., at 590. Here, however, Congress has directed only that a State desiring to establish a minimum drinking age lower than 21 lose a relatively small percentage of certain federal highway funds. Petitioner contends that the coercive nature of this program is evident from the degree of success it has achieved. We cannot conclude, however, that a conditional grant of federal money of this sort is unconstitutional simply by reason of its success in achieving the congressional objective.

When we consider, for a moment, that all South Dakota would lose if she adheres to her chosen course as to a suitable minimum drinking age is 5% of the funds otherwise obtainable under specified highway grant programs, the argument as to coercion is shown to be more rhetoric than fact. As we said a half century ago in Steward Machine Co. v. Davis: “[E]very rebate from a tax when conditioned upon conduct is in some measure a temptation. But to hold that motive or temptation is equivalent to coercion is to plunge the law in endless difficulties. The outcome of such a doctrine is the acceptance of a philosophical determinism by which choice becomes impossible. Till now the law has been guided by a robust common sense which assumes the freedom of the will as a working hypothesis in the solution of its problems.” 301 U.S., at 589-590.

Here Congress has offered relatively mild encouragement to the States to enact higher minimum drinking ages than they would otherwise choose. But the enactment of such laws remains the prerogative of the States not merely in theory but in fact. Even if Congress might lack the power to impose a national minimum drinking age directly, we conclude that encouragement to state action found in § 158 is a valid use of the spending power. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

Justice O'CONNOR, dissenting.

[T]he Court's application of the requirement that the condition imposed be reasonably related to the purpose for which the funds are expended is cursory and unconvincing. We have repeatedly said that Congress may condition grants under the spending power only in ways reasonably related to the purpose of the federal program. Massachusetts v. United States, supra, 435 U.S., at 461; Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 295 (1958) (the United States may impose “reasonable conditions relevant to federal interest in the project and to the over-all objectives thereof”); Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, 301 U.S. at 590 (“We do not say that a tax is valid, when imposed by act of Congress, if it is laid upon the condition that a state may escape its operation through the adoption of a statute unrelated in subject matter to activities fairly within the scope of national policy and power”). In my view, establishment of a minimum drinking age of 21 is not sufficiently related to interstate highway construction to justify so conditioning funds appropriated for that purpose.

When Congress appropriates money to build a highway, it is entitled to insist that the highway be a safe one. But it is not entitled to insist as a condition of the use of highway funds that the State impose or change regulations in other areas of the State's social and economic life because of an attenuated or tangential relationship to highway use or safety. Indeed, if the rule were otherwise, the Congress could effectively regulate almost any area of a State's social, political, or economic life on the theory that use of the interstate transportation system is somehow enhanced. If, for example, the United States were to condition highway moneys upon moving the state capital, I suppose it might argue that interstate transportation is facilitated by locating local governments in places easily accessible to interstate highways – or, conversely, that highways might become overburdened if they had to carry traffic to and from the state capital. In my mind, such a relationship is hardly more attenuated than the one which the Court finds supports § 158. Cf. Tr. of Oral Arg. 39 (counsel for the United States conceding that to condition a grant upon adoption of a unicameral legislature would violate the “germaneness” requirement).

There is a clear place at which the Court can draw the line between permissible and impermissible conditions on federal grants. It is the line identified in the Brief for the National Conference of State Legislatures et al. [at 19-20] as Amici Curiae: “Congress has the power to spend for the general welfare, it has the power to legislate only for delegated purposes…. The appropriate inquiry, then, is whether the spending requirement or prohibition is a condition on a grant or whether it is regulation. The difference turns on whether the requirement specifies in some way how the money should be spent, so that Congress' intent in making the grant will be effectuated. Congress has no power under the Spending Clause to impose requirements on a grant that go beyond specifying how the money should be spent. A requirement that is not such a specification is not a condition, but a regulation, which is valid only if it falls within one of Congress' delegated regulatory powers.”

132 S. Ct. 2566 (2012)

Chief Justice ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court and delivered . . . an opinion with respect to Part IV, in which Justice BREYER and Justice KAGAN join.

IV

The States also contend that the Medicaid expansion exceeds Congress's authority under the Spending Clause. They claim that Congress is coercing the States to adopt the changes it wants by threatening to withhold all of a State's Medicaid grants, unless the State accepts the new expanded funding and complies with the conditions that come with it. This, they argue, violates the basic principle that the “Federal Government may not compel the States to enact or administer a federal regulatory program.” New York, 505 U.S., at 188.

There is no doubt that the Act dramatically increases state obligations under Medicaid. The current Medicaid program requires States to cover only certain discrete categories of needy individuals – pregnant women, children, needy families, the blind, the elderly, and the disabled. 42 U.S.C. § 1396a(a)(10). There is no mandatory coverage for most childless adults, and the States typically do not offer any such coverage. The States also enjoy considerable flexibility with respect to the coverage levels for parents of needy families. § 1396a(a)(10)(A)(ii). On average States cover only those unemployed parents who make less than 37 percent of the federal poverty level, and only those employed parents who make less than 63 percent of the poverty line. Kaiser Comm'n on Medicaid and the Uninsured, Performing Under Pressure 11, and fig. 11 (2012).

The Medicaid provisions of the Affordable Care Act, in contrast, require States to expand their Medicaid programs by 2014 to cover all individuals under the age of 65 with incomes below 133 percent of the federal poverty line. § 1396a(a)(10)(A)(i)(VIII). The Act also establishes a new “[e]ssential health benefits” package, which States must provide to all new Medicaid recipients – a level sufficient to satisfy a recipient's obligations under the individual mandate. §§ 1396a(k)(1), 1396u–7(b)(5), 18022(b). The Affordable Care Act provides that the Federal Government will pay 100 percent of the costs of covering these newly eligible individuals through 2016. § 1396d(y)(1).

In the following years, the federal payment level gradually decreases, to a minimum of 90 percent. Ibid. In light of the expansion in coverage mandated by the Act, the Federal Government estimates that its Medicaid spending will increase by approximately $100 billion per year, nearly 40 percent above current levels. Statement of Douglas W. Elmendorf, CBO’s Analysis of the Major Health Care Legislation Enacted in March 2010, p. 14, Table 2 (Mar. 30, 2011).

In South Dakota v. Dole, we considered a challenge to a federal law that threatened to withhold five percent of a State's federal highway funds if the State did not raise its drinking age to 21. The Court found that the condition was “directly related to one of the main purposes for which highway funds are expended – safe interstate travel.” 483 U.S., at 208. At the same time, the condition was not a restriction on how the highway funds – set aside for specific highway improvement and maintenance efforts – were to be used.

We accordingly asked whether “the financial inducement offered by Congress” was “so coercive as to pass the point at which ‘pressure turns into compulsion.’” Id., at 211 (quoting Steward Machine, supra, at 590). By “financial inducement” the Court meant the threat of losing five percent of highway funds; no new money was offered to the States to raise their drinking ages. We found that the inducement was not impermissibly coercive, because Congress was offering only “relatively mild encouragement to the States.” Dole, 483 U.S., at 211. We observed that “all South Dakota would lose if she adheres to her chosen course as to a suitable minimum drinking age is 5%” of her highway funds. Ibid. In fact, the federal funds at stake constituted less than half of one percent of South Dakota's budget at the time. See Nat. Assn. of State Budget Officers, The State Expenditure Report 59 (1987); South Dakota v. Dole, 791 F.2d 628, 630 (C.A.8 1986). In consequence, “we conclude[d] that [the] encouragement to state action [was] a valid use of the spending power.” Dole, 483 U.S., at 212. Whether to accept the drinking age change “remain[ed] the prerogative of the States not merely in theory but in fact.” Id., at 211-212.

In this case, the financial “inducement” Congress has chosen is much more than “relatively mild encouragement” – it is a gun to the head. Section 1396c of the Medicaid Act provides that if a State's Medicaid plan does not comply with the Act's requirements, the Secretary of Health and Human Services may declare that “further payments will not be made to the State,” 42 U.S.C. § 1396c. A State that opts out of the Affordable Care Act's expansion in health care coverage thus stands to lose not merely “a relatively small percentage” of its existing Medicaid funding, but all of it. Dole, supra, at 211. Medicaid spending accounts for over 20 percent of the average State's total budget, with federal funds covering 50 to 83 percent of those costs. See Nat. Assn. of State Budget Officers, Fiscal Year 2010 State Expenditure Report, p. 11, Table 5 (2011); 42 U.S.C. § 1396d(b). The Federal Government estimates that it will pay out approximately $3.3 trillion between 2010 and 2019 in order to cover the costs of pre-expansion Medicaid. Brief for United States 10, n.6. In addition, the States have developed intricate statutory and administrative regimes over the course of many decades to implement their objectives under existing Medicaid. It is easy to see how the Dole Court could conclude that the threatened loss of less than half of one percent of South Dakota's budget left that State with a “prerogative” to reject Congress's desired policy, “not merely in theory but in fact.” 483 U.S., at 211-212. The threatened loss of over 10 percent of a State's overall budget, in contrast, is economic dragooning that leaves the States with no real option but to acquiesce in the Medicaid expansion.

Nothing in our opinion precludes Congress from offering funds under the Affordable Care Act to expand the availability of health care, and requiring that States accepting such funds comply with the conditions on their use. What Congress is not free to do is to penalize States that choose not to participate in that new program by taking away their existing Medicaid funding. Section 1396c gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services the authority to do just that. It allows her to withhold all “further [Medicaid] payments . . . to the State” if she determines that the State is out of compliance with any Medicaid requirement, including those contained in the expansion. 42 U.S.C. § 1396c. In light of the Court's holding, the Secretary cannot apply § 1396c to withdraw existing Medicaid funds for failure to comply with the requirements set out in the expansion.

That fully remedies the constitutional violation we have identified. The chapter of the United States Code that contains § 1396c includes a severability clause confirming that we need go no further. That clause specifies that “[i]f any provision of this chapter, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the chapter, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.” § 1303. Today's holding does not affect the continued application of § 1396c to the existing Medicaid program. Nor does it affect the Secretary's ability to withdraw funds provided under the Affordable Care Act if a State that has chosen to participate in the expansion fails to comply with the requirements of that Act.

This is not to say, as the joint dissent suggests, that we are “rewriting the Medicaid Expansion.” Instead, we determine, first, that § 1396c is unconstitutional when applied to withdraw existing Medicaid funds from States that decline to comply with the expansion. We then follow Congress's explicit textual instruction to leave unaffected “the remainder of the chapter, and the application of [the challenged] provision to other persons or circumstances.” § 1303. When we invalidate an application of a statute because that application is unconstitutional, we are not “rewriting” the statute; we are merely enforcing the Constitution.

The question remains whether today's holding affects other provisions of the Affordable Care Act. In considering that question, “[w]e seek to determine what Congress would have intended in light of the Court's constitutional holding.” United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 246 (2005) (internal quotation marks omitted). Our “touchstone for any decision about remedy is legislative intent, for a court cannot use its remedial powers to circumvent the intent of the legislature.” Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New Eng., 546 U.S. 320, 330 (2006) (internal quotation marks omitted). The question here is whether Congress would have wanted the rest of the Act to stand, had it known that States would have a genuine choice whether to participate in the new Medicaid expansion. Unless it is “evident” that the answer is no, we must leave the rest of the Act intact. Champlin Refining Co. v. Corporation Comm'n of Okla., 286 U.S. 210, 234.
We are confident that Congress would have wanted to preserve the rest of the Act. It is fair to say that Congress assumed that every State would participate in the Medicaid expansion, given that States had no real choice but to do so. The States contend that Congress enacted the rest of the Act with such full participation in mind; they point out that Congress made Medicaid a means for satisfying the mandate, 26 U.S.C. § 5000A(f)(1)(A)(ii), and enacted no other plan for providing coverage to many low-income individuals. According to the States, this means that the entire Act must fall.

We disagree. The Court today limits the financial pressure the Secretary may apply to induce States to accept the terms of the Medicaid expansion. As a practical matter, that means States may now choose to reject the expansion; that is the whole point. But that does not mean all or even any will. Some States may indeed decline to participate, either because they are unsure they will be able to afford their share of the new funding obligations, or because they are unwilling to commit the administrative resources necessary to support the expansion. Other States, however, may voluntarily sign up, finding the idea of expanding Medicaid coverage attractive, particularly given the level of federal funding the Act offers at the outset.

We have no way of knowing how many States will accept the terms of the expansion, but we do not believe Congress would have wanted the whole Act to fall, simply because some may choose not to participate. The other reforms Congress enacted, after all, will remain “fully operative as a law,” Champlin, supra, at 234, and will still function in a way “consistent with Congress' basic objectives in enacting the statute,” Booker, supra, at 259. Confident that Congress would not have intended anything different, we conclude that the rest of the Act need not fall in light of our constitutional holding.

Justice GINSBURG, with whom Justice SOTOMAYOR joins, concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part, and dissenting in part.

The question posed by the 2010 Medicaid expansion, then, is essentially this: To cover a notably larger population, must Congress take the repeal/reenact route, or may it achieve the same result by amending existing law? The answer should be that Congress may expand by amendment the classes of needy persons entitled to Medicaid benefits. A ritualistic requirement that Congress repeal and reenact spending legislation in order to enlarge the population served by a federally funded program would advance no constitutional principle and would scarcely serve the interests of federalism. To the contrary, such a requirement would rigidify Congress' efforts to empower States by partnering with them in the implementation of federal programs.

The Chief Justice acknowledges that Congress may “condition the receipt of [federal] funds on the States' complying with restrictions on the use of those funds,” but nevertheless concludes that the 2010 expansion is unduly coercive. His conclusion rests on three premises, each of them essential to his theory. First, the Medicaid expansion is, in the Chief Justice's view, a new grant program, not an addition to the Medicaid program existing before the ACA's enactment. Congress, the Chief Justice maintains, has threatened States with the loss of funds from an old program in an effort to get them to adopt a new one. Second, the expansion was unforeseeable by the States when they first signed on to Medicaid. Third, the threatened loss of funding is so large that the States have no real choice but to participate in the Medicaid expansion. The Chief Justice therefore – for the first time ever – finds an exercise of Congress' spending power unconstitutionally coercive.

Medicaid, as amended by the ACA, however, is not two spending programs; it is a single program with a constant aim – to enable poor persons to receive basic health care when they need it. Given past expansions, plus express statutory warning that Congress may change the requirements participating States must meet, there can be no tenable claim that the ACA fails for lack of notice. Moreover, States have no entitlement to receive any Medicaid funds; they enjoy only the opportunity to accept funds on Congress' terms. Future Congresses are not bound by their predecessors' dispositions; they have authority to spend federal revenue as they see fit. The Federal Government, therefore, is not, as the Chief Justice charges, threatening States with the loss of "existing" funds from one spending program in order to induce them to opt into another program. Congress is simply requiring States to do what States have long been required to do to receive Medicaid funding: comply with the conditions Congress prescribes for participation.

A majority of the Court, however, buys the argument that prospective withholding of funds formerly available exceeds Congress' spending power. Given that holding, I entirely agree with the Chief Justice as to the appropriate remedy. It is to bar the withholding found impermissible – not, as the joint dissenters would have it, to scrap the expansion altogether. The dissenters' view that the ACA must fall in its entirety is a radical departure from the Court's normal course. When a constitutional infirmity mars a statute, the Court ordinarily removes the infirmity. It undertakes a salvage operation; it does not demolish the legislation. See, e.g., Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 504 (1985) (Court's normal course is to declare a statute invalid "to the extent that it reaches too far, but otherwise [to leave the statute] intact"). That course is plainly in order where, as in this case, Congress has expressly instructed courts to leave untouched every provision not found invalid. See 42 U.S.C. § 1303. Because the Chief Justice finds the withholding – not the granting – of federal funds incompatible with the Spending Clause, Congress' extension of Medicaid remains available to any State that affirms its willingness to participate.

One way in which Congress may spend to promote the general welfare is by making grants to the States. Monetary grants, so-called grants-in-aid, became more frequent during the 1930's, G. Stephens & N. Wikstrom, American Intergovernmental Relations – A Fragmented Federal Polity 83 (2007), and by 1950 they had reached $20 billion or 11.6% of state and local government expenditures from their own sources. By 1970 this number had grown to $123.7 billion or 29.1% of state and local government expenditures from their own sources. As of 2010, federal outlays to state and local governments came to over $608 billion or 37.5% of state and local government expenditures.
When federal legislation gives the States a real choice whether to accept or decline a federal aid package, the federal-state relationship is in the nature of a contractual relationship. See Barnes v. Gorman, 536 U.S. 181, 186 (2002); Pennhurst, 451 U.S., at 17. And just as a contract is voidable if coerced, “[t]he legitimacy of Congress' power to legislate under the spending power . . . rests on whether the State voluntarily and knowingly accepts the terms of the ‘contract.’” Ibid. (emphasis added). If a federal spending program coerces participation the States have not “exercise[d] their choice” – let alone made an “informed choice.” Id., at 17, 25.

Coercing States to accept conditions risks the destruction of the “unique role of the States in our system.” Davis, supra, at 685 (Kennedy, J., dissenting). “[T]he Constitution has never been understood to confer upon Congress the ability to require the States to govern according to Congress' instructions.” New York, 505 U.S., at 162. Congress may not “simply commande[er] the legislative processes of the States by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program.” Id., at 161 (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). Congress effectively engages in this impermissible compulsion when state participation in a federal spending program is coerced, so that the States' choice whether to enact or administer a federal regulatory program is rendered illusory.

Where all Congress has done is to “encourag[e] state regulation rather than compe[l] it, state governments remain responsive to the local electorate's preferences; state officials remain accountable to the people. [But] where the Federal Government compels States to regulate, the accountability of both state and federal officials is diminished.” New York, supra, at 168.

Whether federal spending legislation crosses the line from enticement to coercion is often difficult to determine, and courts should not conclude that legislation is unconstitutional on this ground unless the coercive nature of an offer is unmistakably clear. In this case, however, there can be no doubt. In structuring the ACA, Congress unambiguously signaled its belief that every State would have no real choice but to go along with the Medicaid Expansion. If the anticoercion rule does not apply in this case, then there is no such rule.

The dimensions of the Medicaid program lend strong support to the petitioner States' argument that refusing to accede to the conditions set out in the ACA is not a realistic option. Before the ACA's enactment, Medicaid funded medical care for pregnant women, families with dependents, children, the blind, the elderly, and the disabled. See 42 U.S.C. § 1396a(a)(10) (2006 ed., Supp. IV). The ACA greatly expands the program's reach, making new funds available to States that agree to extend coverage to all individuals who are under age 65 and have incomes below 133% of the federal poverty line. See § 1396a(a)(10)(A)(i)(VIII). Any State that refuses to expand its Medicaid programs in this way is threatened with a severe sanction: the loss of all its federal Medicaid funds. See § 1396c (2006 ed.)

Medicaid has long been the largest federal program of grants to the States. See Brief for Respondents in No. 11-400, at 37. In 2010, the Federal Government directed more than $552 billion in federal funds to the States. See Nat. Assn. of State Budget Officers, 2010 State Expenditure Report: Examining Fiscal 2009-2011 State Spending, p. 7 (2011) (NASBO Report). Of this, more than $233 billion went to pre-expansion Medicaid. See id., at 47. This amount equals nearly 22% of all state expenditures combined. See id., at 7.

The States devote a larger percentage of their budgets to Medicaid than to any other item. Id., at 5. Federal funds account for anywhere from 50% to 83% of each State's total Medicaid expenditures, see § 1396d(b) (2006 ed., Supp. IV); most States receive more than $1 billion in federal Medicaid funding; and a quarter receive more than $5 billion, NASBO Report 47. These federal dollars total nearly two thirds – 64.6% – of all Medicaid expenditures nationwide. Id., at 46.

Seven Members of the Court agree that the Medicaid Expansion, as enacted by Congress, is unconstitutional. See Part IV-A to IV-E, supra; Part IV-A (opinion of Roberts, C.J., joined by Breyer and Kagan, JJ.). Because the Medicaid Expansion is unconstitutional, the question of remedy arises. The most natural remedy would be to invalidate the Medicaid Expansion. However, the Government proposes – in two cursory sentences at the very end of its brief – preserving the Expansion. Under its proposal, States would receive the additional Medicaid funds if they expand eligibility, but States would keep their pre-existing Medicaid funds if they do not expand eligibility. We cannot accept the Government's suggestion.

The reality that States were given no real choice but to expand Medicaid was not an accident. Congress assumed States would have no choice, and the ACA depends on States' having no choice, because its Mandate requires low-income individuals to obtain insurance many of them can afford only through the Medicaid Expansion. Furthermore, a State's withdrawal might subject everyone in the State to much higher insurance premiums. That is because the Medicaid Expansion will no longer offset the cost to the insurance industry imposed by the ACA's insurance regulations and taxes, a point that is explained in more detail in the severability section below. To make the Medicaid Expansion optional despite the ACA's structure and design “would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. This is no part of our duty.” Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U.S. 82, 99 (1879).

The Court today decides to save a statute Congress did not write. It rules that what the statute declares to be a requirement with a penalty is instead an option subject to a tax. And it changes the intentionally coercive sanction of a total cut-off of Medicaid funds to a supposedly noncoercive cut-off of only the incremental funds that the Act makes available.

The Court's disposition, invented and atextual as it is, does not even have the merit of avoiding constitutional difficulties. It creates them. The holding that the Individual Mandate is a tax raises a difficult constitutional question (what is a direct tax?) that the Court resolves with inadequate deliberation. And the judgment on the Medicaid Expansion issue ushers in new federalism concerns and places an unaccustomed strain upon the Union. Those States that decline the Medicaid Expansion must subsidize, by the federal tax dollars taken from their citizens, vast grants to the States that accept the Medicaid Expansion. If that destabilizing political dynamic, so antagonistic to a harmonious Union, is to be introduced at all, it should be by Congress, not by the Judiciary.
The values that should have determined our course today are caution, minimalism, and the understanding that the Federal Government is one of limited powers. But the Court's ruling undermines those values at every turn. In the name of restraint, it overreaches. In the name of constitutional avoidance, it creates new constitutional questions. In the name of cooperative federalism, it undermines state sovereignty.

For the reasons here stated, we would find the Act invalid in its entirety. We respectfully dissent.

§ 7.3  Additional Legislative Powers in Article I, § 8

Since McCulloch v. Maryland, decided in 1819, it has been clear that federal instrumentalities are immune from state control in the performance of their duties. For example, in 1956, in Leslie Miller, Inc. v. Arkansas, the Court held that a state could not require a contractor to secure a state license before bidding on a federal job where the United States had its own specifications as to who was a responsible bidder. In Hancock v. Train, decided in 1976, the Court held that states cannot require federal instrumentalities to comply with state laws regarding air contamination. The Court noted that Congress can authorize state regulation of federal activities, but there must be a clear and unambiguous declaration by Congress. In this case, reflecting their more conservative Holmesian posture of deference to states, Justices Stewart and Rehnquist concluded that congressional intent to permit state enforcement of emissions regulations through a permit system was sufficiently clear to uphold the state regulatory scheme as applied to federal installations.

In 1995, the Court struck down in U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton state laws fixing term limits for members of Congress, whether done directly or by ballot-access procedures. Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens said the Constitution intended that neither Congress nor the states should possess the power to alter the exclusive qualifications set forth in constitutional text. This holding is consistent with the verbal maxim of expressio unius est exclusio alterius (expression of one thing excludes others); the Court’s holding in Marbury v. Madison that Congress could not add to the Court’s original jurisdiction, excerpted at § 1.3; and the Court’s holding in Powell v. McCormack, discussed at § 4.3.1(D) n.50, that Congress cannot add to the qualifications of members for Congress. Justice Kennedy also noted, “Nothing in the Constitution or Federalist Papers. . . supports the idea of state interference with the most basic relation between the National Government and its citizens, the selection of legislative representatives.”54

Four Justices in dissent concluded that the Constitution’s qualifications for office were merely minimum requirements. For the dissent, the principle of states’ rights ratified in the 10th Amendment meant that because the Constitution does not expressly prohibit the states from enacting term limits, it raises no bar to such action.55 The dissent was composed of the most conservative Justices on the Court, Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas, reflecting the conservative predisposition to defer to states, as well as Justice O’Connor, who often also strongly supported states’ rights.

Against this background regarding federal immunity from state regulation where Congress has the power to regulate, the remaining powers granted to Congress in Article I, § 8 are discussed below.

1. Fiscal Powers

   Under Article I, § 8, cls. 2, 4, 5 & 6, Congress has the power: “To borrow Money on the credit of the United States”; “To establish . . . uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States”; “To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures”; and “To provide for the Punishments of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States.” Article I, § 10, cl. 1 provides, “No State shall . . . coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; [or] make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts.” These provisions have been interpreted to give the federal government plenary power over the subjects of revenue, finance, and currency. That power is derived from the aggregate of all these congressional powers, also including the Necessary and Proper Clause.56

2. Naturalization & Regulation of Aliens

   Under Article I, § 8, cl. 4, Congress is granted the power to “establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization.” Naturalization is a privilege aliens may claim only on terms imposed by Congress.57 As part of exercising this power, Congress also has the power over the immigration of aliens into the United States as a “necessary and proper” adjunct to the naturalization power, and as a natural concomitant of powers inherent in national sovereignty.\textsuperscript{58} The Court has stated that over no other subject is Congress' power more complete.\textsuperscript{59} However, aliens are entitled to due process in the application of immigration and naturalization rules, as discussed at § 12.4.4 nn.69-72, since the Due Process Clause applies to any “person,” not only “citizens.”\textsuperscript{60} Aliens also have limited rights under the Equal Protection Clause, addressed at § 23.2.

3. Post Office, Copyright, and Patent Powers

Under Article I, § 8, cls. 7 & 8, Congress is granted the power “To establish Post Offices and post Roads” and “To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries.” Under these clauses, combined with the Necessary and Proper Clause, Congress can provide for criminal and civil penalties for, among other things, mail fraud, copyright infringement, and patent infringement.\textsuperscript{61} In Eldred v. Ashcroft,\textsuperscript{62} the Court addressed whether Congress extending to authors copyrights for 70 years after the author’s death, rather than 50 years, complied with the “limited Times” language of the Copyright Clause. The Court held that the 70-year provision was constitutional. The Court deferred greatly to the legislative and executive practice in extending copyright protection over the last 200 years, and also noted that the 70-year provision was consistent with European copyright law. Congress adopting a similar provision was thus “rationally related” to a legitimate interest in helping to create uniform copyright standards around the world. Additional cases have upheld broad congressional power under the Copyright Clause.\textsuperscript{63}

4. Power Over the Federal Judicial Branch

Under Article I, § 8, cl. 9, Congress is granted the power to “constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court.” Under this provision, while the creation of a Supreme Court of the United States is required by Article III of the Constitution, Congress is granted the power to decide whether to create lower federal courts, and, for cases falling under the jurisdictional grant of the federal courts in Article III, can determine the jurisdiction of such courts based on the text in Article III to make “such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.”

5. The Admiralty Power

Under Article I, § 8, cl. 10, Congress has the power to “define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations.” This field is thus under federal control, but Congress may be restricted under this clause by traditional concepts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.\(^{64}\) However, modern Commerce Clause power “with foreign nations, and among the several States” would likely sustain any regulations that Congress would wish to make.

6. Foreign Policy Powers

These powers are discussed in Chapter 11. Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the President has the power, with the approval of 2/3 of the Senate present in favor, to make treaties. The Senate can thus refuse to ratifies treaties if 2/3 approval is not obtained. Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2 the President "shall appoint Ambassadors, other public ministers and Consuls" but only “with the Advice and Consent of the Senate.” Congress can influence foreign affairs with its powers in Article I, § 8, cl. 3 to “regulate commerce with foreign Nations . . . and with the Indian Tribes”; in Article I, § 8, cl. 4 to “establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization”; and in Article I, § 8, cl. 10 to “define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations.”

7. The War Powers

These powers are discussed in Chapter 12. They include Article I, § 8, cl. 11-16: “To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water”; “To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a term longer than two Years”; “To provide and maintain a Navy”; “To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces”; “To provide for calling forth the Militia [today termed the state National Guards] to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions”; and “To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing like protection for “unfixed” live performances – that is, performances not intended to be memorialized in a “fixed recording” – contrary to “fixation” (“Writings and Discoveries”) and “durational” (“limited Times”) requirements of the Copyright Clause).

such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.”

8. The Property Power

Under Article I, § 8, cl. 17, Congress is granted power to exercise “exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cessation of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States,” what became the District of Columbia, and “like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful buildings.” Under Article IV, § 3, cl.2, Congress is also given the power to “dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States.” These clauses has been read as granting Congress plenary power over federal public lands, subject to the Bill of Rights or other constitutional limitations on government action, with the minor exception regarding non-fundamental Bill of Rights provisions recognized in The Insular Cases, discussed at § 11.3.3 n.17.

Despite this conclusion, at least one author has argued that arguments of text and specific historical intent support the view that Congress’ property power is more limited, and that the original understanding was that Congress would have the power under the Property Clause over the District of Columbia, and isolated buildings and forts necessary for federal purposes, but that other federal property, including territories, would be turned over to the states, that is “disposed of” in a timely manner, under Article IV, § 3, cl.2. The Supreme Court has never evidenced any support for this view, nor has this view been supported by federal legislative or executive practice.

As of 2004, the United States owned some land in every state, and approximately 29% of the total land in the United States, with the largest acreage being 69.1% of Alaska. The United States also owns significant parts of other states, including: Arizona, 48.1%; California, 45.3%; Colorado, 36.6%; Idaho, 50.2%; Montana, 29.9%; New Mexico, 41.8%; Nevada, 84.5%; Oregon, 53.1%; Utah, 57.4%; Washington, 30.3%; and Wyoming, 42.3%.67

§ 7.4 Congressional Powers Under the Civil War Amendments (13th, 14th, and 15th)

Each provision in the Civil War Amendments – the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments – has a section providing that “Congress shall have power to enforce” the amendment “by appropriate legislation.”

1. Doctrine Specific to the 13th Amendment

The 13th Amendment was first interpreted by the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-House Cases, decided in 1873. The Court said the obvious purpose of the 13th Amendment was to forbid "all shades and conditions of African slavery." Ten years later, a more extensive interpretation was given in The Civil Rights Cases. There the Court held that the Amendment nullified all state laws upholding slavery and gave Congress power to pass all laws necessary and proper to abolish all "badges and incidents of slavery." These badges and incidents, said the Court, are disabilities relating to fundamental rights that form the essence of civil freedom: the same rights as enjoyed by white citizens to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be a party, give evidence, and inherit, purchase, lease, sell and convey property. However, the Court held that Congress' power did not extend to adjusting "social rights," as by providing federal remedies for a refusal of service on racial grounds by the owner of an inn, a public conveyance, or a place of amusement.

The instrumentalist era saw substantial changes in 13th Amendment jurisprudence. These changes were based mostly on the instrumentalist Court's perception that the prior cases were wrongly decided from the perspective of instrumentalist social policy. For example, in 1968 the Court overruled prior doctrine to hold in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co. that 42 U.S.C. § 1982 bars all race discrimination, private as well as public, in the sale or rental of property, and that it was within Congress' power to enforce the 13th Amendment. Dissenting in Jones, Justice Harlan said that the statute's words suggested a right to equal status under law and, thus, a right enforceable only against state-sanctioned discrimination. The Court in Jones also abandoned its apparently exclusive claim in The Civil Rights Cases to define the "badges and incidents of slavery." The Court said that Congress has the power rationally to determine what are the badges and incidents of slavery, limited only by the “appropriate” test of McCulloch v. Maryland.

72 Id. at 443-44. See, e.g., United States v. Metcalf, 881 F.3d 641 (8th Cir. 2018) (Congressional hate crimes statute providing for up to 10 years in prison for willfully causing bodily injury based on “race, color, religion, or national origin” valid under Congress’ power to enforce the 13th Amendment as a “badge or incident” of slavery).
Building on Jones, in 1971 the Court overruled prior doctrine and held in Griffin v. Breckenridge\textsuperscript{73} that § 1985(3), an exercise of power under § 2 of the 13th Amendment, extended validly to private conspiratorial violence based on "racial, or perhaps otherwise class-based, invidious discriminatory animus." In 1976, the Court extended Jones in Runyon v. McCrary\textsuperscript{74} to § 1981 and the right to make and enforce contracts. As with race discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause, addressed at § 20.4, discriminatory effects are not enough to trigger violations of these statutes. Instead, in the absence of facial discrimination, proof of intent to discriminate is required.\textsuperscript{75}

The modern natural law Court has not reversed or limited this line of instrumentalist precedents. But neither has it used them to expand federal protections. For example, in Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic,\textsuperscript{76} the Court passed up a chance to expand the Griffin v. Breckenridge concept of recovery for a "class-based invidious discriminatory animus." Instead, the Court held that § 1985(3) did not provide a federal action for conspiracy to obstruct access to abortion clinics. The Court said that the opposition to abortion was not "class-based invidiously discriminatory animus" because it did not focus on women by reason of their sex. Given this conclusion, the Court did not need to address whether § 1985(3) is limited to “racial animus” or “perhaps otherwise class-based, invidious discriminatory animus,” as suggested in Breckenridge.

In 1987, in Saint Francis College v. Al-Khazraji,\textsuperscript{77} the Court confined § 1981 to "racial" discrimination and did not extend that section to discrimination based on national origin or religion. The Court did hold, however, that "race" is not limited by technical scientific understanding, but rather by congressional intent regarding the meaning of “race.” Given congressional understandings in the 19th century, claims for racial discrimination could thus be stated by an Arab or Jew, even though today they would be classified as part of the “Caucasian” race, given “popular understanding that there are three major human races – Caucasoid, Mongoloid, and Negroid.” The Court said, "Congress intended to protect from discrimination identifiable classes of persons who are subjected to intentional discrimination because of their ancestry or ethnic characteristics," although this does not include discrimination based “solely on the place or nation of his origin.” The Court applied the same reasoning to interpret § 1982 in Shaare Tefila Congregation v. Cobb.\textsuperscript{78}

The failure of the Court to cut back on some of the instrumentalist precedents reflects the natural law predisposition to follow precedent unless some special reason calls for the precedent to be overruled. For example, in 1989, the Court unanimously reaffirmed Runyon v. McCrory in Patterson v. McLean Credit Union. Justice Kennedy's opinion stressed stare decisis, saying the case had not been undermined by subsequent decisions or legislation, had not proved unworkable, and did not frustrate the objectives of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Focusing on whether the case represented a substantially unjust result, Justice Kennedy stated, "Whether Runyon's interpretation of Section 1981 as prohibiting racial discrimination in the making and enforcement of private contracts is right or wrong as an original matter, it is certain that it is not inconsistent with the prevailing sense of justice in this country. To the contrary, Runyon is entirely consistent with our society's deep commitment to the eradication of discrimination based on a person's race or the color of his or her skin."

Despite following the core holding of Runyon, the Court’s opinion ultimately concluded that while § 1981's language regarding “making and enforcing” contracts bans discrimination in hiring and in promotion if the promotion would practically speaking represent an “opportunity to enter into a new contract with the employer,” its language does not apply to acts of racial harassment committed in connection with the “performance” of an employment contract. Thus, unlike the instrumentalist Justices in Runyon, who viewed complaints about racially discriminatory “performance” either as reflecting rights to non-discrimination reserved in the “making” of the contract or “enforcing” the contract for such performance, the majority refused to expand federal remedies for discrimination.

2. Doctrine Relevant to the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments

As with § 2 of the 13th Amendment, § 5 of the 14th Amendment and § 2 of the 15th Amendment have language stating that “Congress shall have power to enforce” the amendment “by appropriate legislation.” The two main points of contention in interpreting this language have been what the word “enforce” means, and what the word “appropriate” means. Regarding “enforce,” the question is whether Congress has the power to define for itself what action violates the Civil War Amendments and then provide remedies for that action, or is Congress limited to providing remedial schemes for violations found by the Court. Regarding “appropriate,” the question is what should be the test to determine appropriate congressional action.

Because the Civil War Amendments were ratified between 1865 and 1870, it is not surprising that there were no decisions in the natural law era on congressional enforcement power. Of course, the Court had held in 1803 in Marbury v. Madison that it is a judicial function to say what the law is. This suggests that perhaps only the Court can determine violations of the Civil War Amendments, and that Congress is limited only to providing remedies for Court-determined infractions.

On the other hand, the Radical Republican Congress that spearheaded the Civil War Amendments were suspicious of a Supreme Court that, as of 1865, still included 4 Justices – Justices Wayne, Nelson, Catron, and Grier – who had voted with the majority in 1857 in Dred Scott v. Sandford, and a fifth Justice, Justice Clifford, confirmed in 1858 after being nominated by President Buchanan, also perceived as a Southern sympathizer. This suggests that the enforcement provisions of the Civil War Amendments were an attempt by Congress to reserve some ultimate interpretive power for itself as to the meaning of the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments.81

The range of civil rights legislation passed by Congress between 1866 and 1871 also suggests that Congress had this broader vision of the power granted to it under the Civil War Amendments. Between 1866 and 1871, Congress passed a number of civil rights statutes, now codified at 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981-1986.82 Further, Congress provided some statutory protection to enforce the 15th Amendment's provisions regarding banning the denial of voting rights on account of race in the Enforcement Act of 1870. This Act was an attempt to regulate the violence and intimidation by the Ku Klux Klan regarding voting by blacks in 1868 and 1870.83

Regarding the meaning of term “appropriate” legislation, which appears in the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments, the Court had stated in 1819 in McCulloch v. Maryland,84 “Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly

By 1865, Congress had added a 10th seat to the Court, to give Lincoln another appointment, bringing to 5 the number of Lincoln nominees on the Court in 1865. Once Lincoln was assassinated, Congress reduced the number of Justices to 7, to prevent President Johnson from having any nominations, and then increased the size to 9 once Grant became President. The Court size has remained at 9 ever since, as codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1.

adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional.” As applied to the Necessary and Proper Clause of Article I, § 8, cl. 18, this language has been read to give Congress great latitude to determine “appropriate” legislation. This suggests that, as with the Necessary and Proper Clause in Article I, § 8, great latitude should be given to Congress in determining “appropriate” legislation under the Civil War Amendments.

During the formalist era the Court adopted a limited view regarding Congress’ enforcement powers. For example, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which banned discrimination in places of public accommodation. That Act was struck down in 1883 in The Civil Rights Cases as violating the Court’s understanding of the state action limits of the 14th Amendment. One author has remarked, “The Justices . . . pervert[ed] the plain intent of the Fourteenth Amendment – and the Fifteenth Amendment too . . . . Through the 1860's and 1870's, Congress had passed a series of laws designed to put teeth into the otherwise empty words of the post-war Amendments . . . . [T]he Court imperiously and impatiently swept aside almost all of these so-called Civil Rights Acts, either by flatly branding them – unconstitutional – no matter that the Constitution had been amended precisely to achieve what these laws were aimed to achieve – or by using legalistic chop-logic to ‘interpret’ them out of effective existence.” Congressional attempts to enforce the 15th Amendment's voting provisions in the face of Ku Klux Klan activity seeking to minimize black turnout were also substantially frustrated.

The assumption during the Holmesian era also seemed to be that only the Court could determine whether a violation of the Civil War Amendments had occurred. Congress was limited to providing remedies for Court-determined infractions. Under this reasoning, when the Court held in Lassiter v. Northampton County Board that a literacy test for voting was fair on its face, and was not used in a racially discriminatory fashion, and thus did not violate the 15th Amendment, there could be no Civil War Amendment basis for contrary congressional action.

During the instrumentalist era, in cases such as Katzenbach v. Morgan, excerpted below, the Court embraced the view, consistent with the practices of the Radical Republican Congresses in passing various civil rights law between 1866-1875, that Congress had independent power to determine for itself violations of the Civil War Amendments. As has been noted, “The Framers saw Congress, and not the federal courts, as the primary protector of the rights of their citizens. Congress' rights-generating power, and not that of the federal courts, was central to the original meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.90 The Court also held in Katzenbach that “appropriate” legislation would be tested only by the minimal “plainly adapted to that end” standard of review of McCulloch v. Maryland.91

Both of these conclusions have been limited by decisions during the modern natural law era. While still being faithful to the core holdings of the instrumentalist-era cases, the modern Court has moved in cases such as City of Boerne v. Flores,92 excerpted below, to reinstate the view that congressional power under the Civil War Amendments is remedial only, and has created a test for determining “appropriate” legislation that focuses on the “congruence and proportionality” of the congressional action given the mischief to be remedied. This “congruence and proportionality” test is a higher burden for Congress to meet than the “plainly adapted to that end” test of McCulloch v. Maryland."

Katzenbach v. Morgan

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases concern the constitutionality of § 4(e) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. That law, in the respects pertinent in these cases, provides that no person who has successfully completed the sixth primary grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the language of instruction was other than English shall be denied the right to vote in any election because of his inability to read or write English.

The Attorney General of the State of New York argues that an exercise of congressional power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment that prohibits the enforcement of a state law can only be sustained if the judicial branch determines that the state law is prohibited by the provisions of the Amendment that Congress sought to enforce. More specifically, he urges that § 4(e) cannot be sustained as appropriate legislation to enforce the Equal Protection Clause unless the judiciary decides – even with the guidance of a congressional judgment — that the application of the English literacy requirement prohibited by § 4(e) is forbidden by the Equal Protection Clause itself. We disagree. Neither the language nor history of § 5 supports such a construction. As was said with regard to § 5 in Ex parte Com. of Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 345 [(1879)]: “It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective.” A construction of § 5 that would require a judicial determination that the enforcement of the state law precluded by Congress violated the Amendment, as a condition of sustaining the congressional enactment, would depreciate both congressional resourcefulness and congressional responsibility for implementing the Amendment. It would confine the legislative power in this context to the insignificant role of abrogating only those state laws that the judicial branch was prepared to adjudge unconstitutional, or of merely informing the judgment of the judiciary by particularizing the “majestic generalities” of § 1 of the Amendment. See Fay v. People of State of New York, 332 U.S. 261, 282-284 [(1947)].

Thus our task in this case is not to determine whether the New York English literacy requirement as applied to deny the right to vote to a person who successfully completed the sixth grade in a Puerto Rican school violates the Equal Protection Clause. Accordingly, our decision in Lassiter v. Northampton County Bd. of Election, 360 U.S. 45 [(1955)], sustaining the North Carolina English literacy requirement as not in all circumstances prohibited by the first sections of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, is inapposite. Lassiter did not present the question before us here: Without regard to whether the judiciary would find that the Equal Protection Clause itself nullifies New York's English literacy requirement as so applied, could Congress prohibit the enforcement of the state law by legislating under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment? In answering this question, our task is limited to determining whether such legislation is, as required by § 5, appropriate legislation to enforce the Equal Protection Clause.

By including § 5 the draftsmen sought to grant to Congress, by a specific provision applicable to the Fourteenth Amendment, the same broad powers expressed in the Necessary and Proper Clause, Art. I, s 8, cl. 18. The classic formulation of the reach of those powers was established by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421: “Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional.”

Section 4(e) may be readily seen as “plainly adapted” to furthering these aims of the Equal Protection Clause. The practical effect of § 4(e) is to prohibit New York from denying the right to vote to large segments of its Puerto Rican community. Congress has thus prohibited the State from denying to that community the right that is “preservative of all rights.” Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 370. This enhanced political power will be helpful in gaining nondiscriminatory treatment in public services for the entire Puerto Rican community. Section 4(e) thereby enables the Puerto Rican minority better to obtain “perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws.” It was well within congressional authority to say that this need of the Puerto Rican minority for the vote warranted federal intrusion upon any state interests served by the English literacy requirement. It was for Congress, as the branch that made this judgment, to assess and weigh the various conflicting considerations – the risk or pervasiveness of the discrimination in governmental services, the effectiveness of eliminating the state restriction on the right to vote as a means of dealing with the evil, the adequacy or availability of alternative remedies, and the nature and significance of the state interests that would be affected by the nullification of the English literacy requirement as applied to residents who have successfully completed the sixth grade in a Puerto Rican school. It is not for us to review the congressional resolution of these factors. It is enough that we be able to perceive a basis upon which the Congress might resolve the conflict as it did. There plainly was such a basis to support § 4(e) in the application in question in this case. Any contrary conclusion would require us to be blind to the realities familiar to the legislators.

Justice HARLAN, whom Mr. Justice STEWART joins, dissenting.

Worthy as its purposes may be thought by many, I do not see how § 4(e) of the Voting Rights Act sacrifice of fundamentals in the American constitutional system – the separation between the legislative and judicial function and the boundaries between federal and state political authority.

When recognized state violations of federal constitutional standards have occurred, Congress is of course empowered by § 5 to take appropriate remedial measures to redress and prevent the wrongs.
See Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 310. But it is a judicial question whether the condition with which Congress has thus sought to deal is in truth an infringement of the Constitution, something that is the necessary prerequisite to bringing the § 5 power into play at all.

Section 4(e), however, presents a significantly different type of congressional enactment. The question here is not whether the statute is appropriate remedial legislation to cure an established violation of a constitutional command, but whether there has in fact been an infringement of that constitutional command, that is, whether a particular state practice or, as here, a statute is so arbitrary or irrational as to offend the command of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. That question is one for the judicial branch ultimately to determine. Were the rule otherwise, Congress would be able to qualify this Court's constitutional decisions under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments let alone those under other provisions of the Constitution, by resorting to congressional power under the Necessary and Proper Clause. In view of this Court's holding in Lassiter, supra, that an English literacy test is a permissible exercise of state supervision over its franchise, I do not think it is open to Congress to limit the effect of that decision as it has undertaken to do by § 4(e). In effect the Court reads § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment as giving Congress the power to define the substantive scope of the Amendment. If that indeed be the true reach of § 5, then I do not see why Congress should not be able as well to exercise its § 5 “discretion” by enacting statutes so as in effect to dilute equal protection and due process decisions of this Court. In all such cases there is room for reasonable men to differ as to whether or not a denial of equal protection or due process has occurred, and the final decision is one of judgment.
Until today this judgment has always been one for the judiciary to resolve.

______________________________________________
Boerne v. Flores
521 U.S. 507 (1997)

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[The] RFRA [Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993] prohibits “[g]overnment” from “substantially burden[ing]” a person's exercise of religion even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability unless the government can demonstrate the burden “(1) is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest.” [42 U.S.C.] § 2000bb-1. The Act's mandate applies to any “branch, department, agency, instrumentality, and official (or other person acting under color of law) of the United States,” as well as to any “State, or . . . subdivision of a State.” § 2000bb-2(1). The Act's universal coverage is confirmed in § 2000bb-3(a), under which RFRA “applies to all Federal and State law, and the implementation of that law, whether statutory or otherwise, and whether adopted before or after [RFRA's enactment].” In accordance with RFRA's usage of the term, we shall use “state law” to include local and municipal ordinances.

Congress enacted RFRA in direct response to the Court's decision in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990). There we considered a Free Exercise Clause claim brought by members of the Native American Church who were denied unemployment benefits when they lost their jobs because they had used peyote. Their practice was to ingest peyote for sacramental purposes, and they challenged an Oregon statute of general applicability which made use of the drug criminal. In evaluating the claim, we declined to apply the balancing test set forth in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), under which we would have asked whether Oregon's prohibition substantially burdened a religious practice and, if it did, whether the burden was justified by a compelling government interest. We stated: “[G]overnment's ability to enforce generally applicable prohibitions of socially harmful conduct . . . cannot depend on measuring the effects of a governmental action on a religious objector's spiritual development. To make an individual's obligation to obey such a law contingent upon the law's coincidence with his religious beliefs, except where the State's interest is ‘compelling’ . . . contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense.” 494 U.S., at 885 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

Four Members of the Court disagreed. They argued the law placed a substantial burden on the Native American Church members so that it could be upheld only if the law served a compelling state interest and was narrowly tailored to achieve that end. Id., at 894. Justice O'Connor concluded Oregon had satisfied the test, while Justice Blackmun, joined by Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall, could see no compelling interest justifying the law's application to the members.

These points of constitutional interpretation were debated by Members of Congress in hearings and floor debates. Many criticized the Court's reasoning, and this disagreement resulted in the passage of RFRA.
The parties disagree over whether RFRA is a proper exercise of Congress's § 5 power "to enforce" by "appropriate legislation" the constitutional guarantee that no State shall deprive any person of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law" nor deny any person "equal protection of the laws."

In defense of the Act, respondent the Archbishop contends, with support from the United States, that RFRA is permissible enforcement legislation. Congress, it is said, is only protecting by legislation one of the liberties guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, the free exercise of religion, beyond what is necessary under Smith. It is said the congressional decision to dispense with proof of deliberate or overt discrimination and instead concentrate on a law's effects accords with the settled understanding that § 5 includes the power to enact legislation designed to prevent, as well as remedy, constitutional violations. It is further contended that Congress's § 5 power is not limited to remedial or preventive legislation.

Congress' power under § 5, however, extends only to "enforcing" the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court has described this power as "remedial," South Carolina v. Katzenbach, [383 U.S. 301 (1966)], at 326. The design of the Amendment and the text of § 5 are inconsistent with the suggestion that Congress has the power to decree the substance of the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions on the States. Legislation which alters the meaning of the Free Exercise Clause cannot be said to be enforcing the Clause. Congress does not enforce a constitutional right by changing what the right is. It has been given the power "to enforce," not the power to determine what constitutes a constitutional violation. Were it not so, what Congress would be enforcing would no longer be, in any meaningful sense, the "provisions of [the Fourteenth Amendment]."

While the line between measures that remedy or prevent unconstitutional actions and measures that make a substantive change in the governing law is not easy to discern, and Congress must have wide latitude in determining where it lies, the distinction exists and must be observed. There must be a congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end. Lacking such a connection, legislation may become substantive in operation and effect. History and our case law support drawing the distinction, one apparent from the text of the Amendment.

There is language in our opinion in Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966), which could be interpreted as acknowledging a power in Congress to enact legislation that expands the rights contained in § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. This is not a necessary interpretation, however, or even the best one. In Morgan, the Court considered the constitutionality of § 4(e) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which provided that no person who had successfully completed the sixth primary grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the language of instruction was other than English could be denied the right to vote because of an inability to read or write English. New York's Constitution, on the other hand, required voters to be able to read and write English. The Court provided two related rationales for its conclusion that § 4(e) could “be viewed as a measure to secure for the Puerto Rican community residing in New York nondiscriminatory treatment by government.” Id., at 652. Under the first rationale, Congress could prohibit New York from denying the right to vote to large segments of its Puerto Rican community, in order to give Puerto Ricans “enhanced political power” that would be “helpful in gaining nondiscriminatory treatment in public services for the entire Puerto Rican community.” Ibid. Section 4(e) thus could be justified as a remedial measure to deal with “discrimination in governmental services.” Id., at 653. The second rationale, an alternative holding, did not address discrimination in the provision of public services but “discrimination in establishing voter qualifications.” Id., at 654. The Court perceived a factual basis on which Congress could have concluded that New York's literacy requirement “constituted an invidious discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause.” Id., at 656. Both rationales for upholding § 4(e) rested on unconstitutional discrimination by New York and Congress' reasonable attempt to combat it. As Justice Stewart explained in Oregon v. Mitchell, [400 U.S. 112 (1970)], at 296, interpreting Morgan to give Congress the power to interpret the Constitution “would require an enormous extension of that decision's rationale.”

If Congress could define its own powers by altering the Fourteenth Amendment's meaning, no longer would the Constitution be “superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means.” It would be “on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, . . . alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.” Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, at 177. Under this approach, it is difficult to conceive of a principle that would limit congressional power. See Van Alstyne, The Failure of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, 46 Duke L.J. 291, 292-303 (1996). Shifting legislative majorities could change the Constitution and effectively circumvent the difficult and detailed amendment process contained in Article V.

RFRA cannot be considered remedial, preventive legislation, if those terms are to have any meaning. RFRA is so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it cannot be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior. It appears, instead, to attempt a substantive change in constitutional protections. Preventive measures prohibiting certain types of laws may be appropriate when there is reason to believe that many of the laws affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional. See City of Rome, 446 U.S., at 177 (since “jurisdictions with a demonstrable history of intentional racial discrimination . . . create the risk of purposeful discrimination,” Congress could “prohibit changes that have a discriminatory impact” in those jurisdictions). Remedial legislation under § 5 “should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the [Fourteenth] [A]mendment was intended to provide against.” Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S., at 13.

RFRA is not so confined. . . .

It is for Congress in the first instance to “determin[e] whether and what legislation is needed to secure the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment,” and its conclusions are entitled to much deference. Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S., at 651. Congress' discretion is not unlimited, however, and the courts retain the power, as they have since Marbury v. Madison, to determine if Congress has exceeded its authority under the Constitution. Broad as the power of Congress is under the Enforcement Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, RFRA contradicts vital principles necessary to maintain separation of powers and the federal balance. The judgment of the Court of Appeals sustaining the Act's constitutionality is reversed.

Justice STEVENS, concurring.

In my opinion, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) is a “law respecting an establishment of religion” that violates the First Amendment to the Constitution. [Ed.: Given this view, it was unnecessary for Justice Stevens to address the § 5 issue addressed by the majority.]

Justice O'CONNOR, with whom Justice BREYER joins except as to the first paragraph of Part I, dissenting.

I dissent from the Court's disposition of this case. I agree with the Court that the issue before us is whether the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) is a proper exercise of Congress' power to enforce § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. But as a yardstick for measuring the constitutionality of RFRA, the Court uses its holding in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), the decision that prompted Congress to enact RFRA as a means of more rigorously enforcing the Free Exercise Clause. I remain of the view that Smith was wrongly decided, and I would use this case to reexamine the Court's holding there. Therefore, I would direct the parties to brief the question whether Smith represents the correct understanding of the Free Exercise Clause and set the case for reargument. If the Court were to correct the misinterpretation of the Free Exercise Clause set forth in Smith, it would simultaneously put our First Amendment jurisprudence back on course and allay the legitimate concerns of a majority in Congress who believed that Smith improperly restricted religious liberty. We would then be in a position to review RFRA in light of a proper interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause.

I agree with much of the reasoning set forth in Part III-A of the Court's opinion. Indeed, if I agreed with the Court's standard in Smith, I would join the opinion. As the Court's careful and thorough historical analysis shows, Congress lacks the “power to decree the substance of the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions on the States.” (emphasis added). Rather, its power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment extends only to enforcing the Amendment's provisions. In short, Congress lacks the ability independently to define or expand the scope of constitutional rights by statute. Accordingly, whether Congress has exceeded its § 5 powers turns on whether there is a “congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end.”

Justice SOUTER, dissenting.

To decide whether the Fourteenth Amendment gives Congress sufficient power to enact the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, the Court measures the legislation against the free-exercise standard of Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S.
872 (1990). For the reasons stated in my opinion in Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 564-577 (1993) (opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment), I have serious doubts about the precedential value of the Smith rule and its entitlement to adherence. These doubts are intensified today by the historical arguments going to the original understanding of the Free Exercise Clause presented in Justice O'Connor's dissent, which raises very substantial issues about the soundness of the Smith rule. But without briefing and argument on the merits of that rule (which this Court has never had in any case, including Smith itself, see Lukumi, 508 U.S., at 571-572), I am not now prepared to join Justice O'Connor in rejecting it or the majority in assuming it to be correct. In order to provide full adversarial consideration, this case should be set down for reargument permitting plenary reexamination of the issue. Since the Court declines to follow that course, our free-exercise law remains marked by an “intolerable tension,” id., at 574, and the constitutionality of the Act of Congress to enforce the free-exercise right cannot now be soundly decided. I would therefore dismiss the writ of certiorari as improvidently granted, and I accordingly dissent from the Court's disposition of this case.

Justice BREYER, dissenting.

I agree with Justice O'Connor that the Court should direct the parties to brief the question whether Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), was correctly decided, and set this case for reargument. I do not, however, find it necessary to consider the question whether, assuming Smith is correct, § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment would authorize Congress to enact the legislation before us. Thus, while I agree with some of the views expressed in the first paragraph of Part I of Justice O'Connor's dissent, I do not necessarily agree with all of them. I therefore join Justice O'Connor's dissent, with the exception of the first paragraph of Part I.

In Hankins v. Lyght, the Second Circuit upheld on Commerce Clause grounds the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, as applied to federal laws, rather than state laws struck down in Boerne v. Flores under § 5 of the 14th Amendment. In Gonzales v. O Centro Espirita Beneficente Uniao do Vegetal, the Supreme Court similarly applied the RFRA’s compelling interest test to strike down the failure under the federal Controlled Substance Act to grant an exception for sacramental use of hallucinogenic tea. The decision was unanimous, with Justice Alito not participating in the consideration or decision of the case.

§ 8.4 Additional Textual Limits on Federal Legislative Power ........................ 394

§ 8.1 10th Amendment Limits on Federal Legislative Power

1. Historical Overview of 10th Amendment Doctrine

   A. The Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

   The text of the 10th Amendment provides, “The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.” As stated in United States v. Darby, “The amendment states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered. . . . From the beginning and for many years the amendment has been construed as not depriving the national government of authority to resort to all means for the exercise of a granted power which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the permitted end.”

   On this understanding, the 10th Amendment was originally intended and understood to mean that states are free to legislate in areas not covered by prohibitions or the Supremacy Clause. However, the 10th Amendment did not create any state immunity from federal action or create any areas of exclusively state power. As stated in Darby, “There is nothing in the history of its adoption to suggest that it was more than declaratory of the relationship between the national and state governments as it had been established by the Constitution before the amendment or that its purpose was other than to allay fears that the new national government might seek to exercise powers not granted, and that the states might not be able to exercise fully their reserved powers.”

   A similar understanding of the 10th Amendment appeared in Livingston v. Van Ingen, decided by a New York court in 1812. There the judge said that a grant of power to Congress does not, without more, take any power away from the states, but that the 10th Amendment does not limit federal power either. In Houston v. Moore, in 1820, the Court reaffirmed this position in an opinion by Justice Story, noting also that if Congress legislates, any conflicting state laws must give way under the Supremacy Clause, a conclusion reaffirmed four years later in 1824 in Gibbons v. Ogden. Despite this view, one could take the position that the 10th Amendment at least cautions the Court that states’ rights considerations should be taken into account in interpreting the other provisions of the Constitution. This was the position of Thomas Jefferson and other states’ rights supporters.

Beginning with the Taney Court in 1836, the Court’s language in cases implicitly raising 10th Amendment issues did focus more on the power of the states, rather than the power of Congress. For example, in 1837, the Court held in Mayor, Alderman and Commonalty of City of New York v. Miln that states have a field of exclusive power in their internal police. In 1851, the Court said in Cooley v. Board of Wardens that some subjects of regulation might be exclusively for the states. In Lane County v. Oregon, decided in 1869, the Court went further, saying, "In many articles of the Constitution, the independence of the states within their spheres is distinctly recognized. To them nearly all of the interior regulation is given and certainly all that is not expressly given to Congress." In Texas v. White, also decided in 1869, the Court stated, “The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States.”

B. The Formalist Era: 1873-1937

Cases during the formalist era rarely raised the 10th Amendment explicitly. The formalist Court’s doctrine regarding the Commerce Clause, addressed at § 6.1; the Taxing Power, discussed at § 7.1.1 nn. 4-6; and Spending Power, discussed at § 7.2.1 nn.29-32, sufficiently limited federal power that typically no resort to the 10th Amendment was needed. Instead, the 10th Amendment served as a reminder of state sovereignty rights, those rights protected directly by Court decisions under the Commerce Clause, Taxing Clause, Spending Clause, or other similar formalist-era doctrines, like the formalist approach to the 11th Amendment doctrine of state sovereign immunity, discussed at § 8.2.1(B) nn.51-53.

Despite this approach towards the 10th Amendment, a moderate formalist majority did note in 1936 in United States v. Butler\(^\text{10}\) that Congress' taxing power may be adopted as a means, consistent with the Necessary and Proper Clause, to carry into operation another enumerated power. This suggested a willingness to broaden the powers that Congress could be held to have under the various provisions in the Constitution. However, certain subjects, such as intrastate commerce, which included agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, were at that time still thought to be exclusively for the states, as addressed at § 6.1.

C. The Holmesian Era: 1937-1954

Cases after 1937 recognized such great federal commerce power that by 1941, in United States v. Darby,\(^\text{11}\) Justice Stone could say for the Court that the 10th Amendment merely states a “truism” that all is retained by the states that has not been surrendered. There is nothing in its history, he said, to suggest that it was “more than declaratory of the relationships between the national and state governments that had been established by the Constitution before the Amendment.”

The Holmesian-era Court applied this doctrine in cases like Case v. Bowles,\(^\text{12}\) which involved the federal Emergency Price Control Act applied to a sale of timber by the state of Washington. The Court thus appeared to return to the original understanding with respect to the powers of Congress and the 10th Amendment. This approach reflected the liberal Holmesian predisposition of President Roosevelt’s appointments to the Supreme Court to defer to the national government, as opposed to the conservative Holmesian predisposition to defer more to state governments, as discussed at § 8.1.1(E) n.30.

During the first part of the instrumentalist era, the Court followed Darby in holding that the 10th Amendment merely states a truism, with congressional power found under the instrumentalist approach to the Commerce Clause.\(^\text{,}^\text{,}\) Thus, in 1964, the Court held that Federal Employers’ Liability Act could be applied to a state-owned railroad in Parden v. Terminal Ry., of Alabama State Docks Department.\(^\text{13}\) In 1968, the Court upheld the wage and hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act as applied to employees of public schools and hospitals in Maryland v. Wirtz.\(^\text{14}\)

In 1975, in Fry v. United States, the Economic Stabilization Act was applied to limit wage increases of state employees. In Fry, however, Justice Marshall's majority opinion included a footnote, which stated, "The [10th] Amendment expressly declares the constitutional policy that Congress may not exercise power in a fashion that impairs the States' integrity or their ability to function effectively in a federal system." One year later, in 1976, Justice Rehnquist seized on Marshall's footnote in Fry, and was able to assemble a 5-Justice majority to overrule Maryland v. Wirtz, distinguish Fry, and hold that the minimum wage and maximum hours provisions of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act could not be applied to state and local employees.

In a departure from the usual instrumentalist approach of this era, a 5-4 Court held in National League of Cities v. Usery that the 10th Amendment prohibits Congress, when exercising its Commerce Clause power, from directly displacing a state's freedom to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions. Joining conservative Holmesian Justice Rehnquist's opinion unreservedly were conservative formalist Chief Justice Burger, conservative Holmesian Justice Stewart, and moderate conservative natural law Justice Powell, who was always a strong supporter of states' rights, a product perhaps of his Southern up-bringing in Virginia.

There were four dissents in National League. Liberal instrumentalist Justices Brennan and Marshall, along with liberal Holmesian Justice White, said the majority had returned to the early 1930s formalist-era jurisprudence by using the 10th Amendment as a cover for invalidating a congressional judgment with which they disagreed. Moderate liberal instrumentalist Justice Stevens also dissented, saying that he could not find a principled limitation on federal power that would not also invalidate federal regulation of state activities he considered unquestionably permissible.

The critical fifth vote in National League belonged to Justice Blackmun. Justice Blackmun is perhaps the best example of a contemporary judge who began his service on the Court during the 1970s deciding cases more as a moderate natural law judge, but whose decisions in the 1980s and 1990s reflected more of a liberal instrumentalist approach. In National League, Justice Blackmun balanced the demands of federal versus state power, creating an area for state sovereignty, but noted that federal power should not be outlawed "in areas such as environmental protection, where the federal interest is demonstrably greater and where state facility compliance with imposed federal standards would be essential." Reflecting Justice Blackmun's balancing approach, several later cases limited the potential impact of National League.

Further, the National League doctrine was never held to limit Congress' power to spend for the General Welfare. Nor was congressional power to enforce the 14th Amendment limited by the 10th Amendment.

In 1985, nine years after National League, at the end of the instrumentalist era, Justice Blackmun abandoned his balancing approach in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, excerpted below. In Garcia, he joined with liberal instrumentalists Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, and liberal Holmesian Justice White, to overrule National League in favor of a strong pro-federal power decision. Justice Blackmun said in his opinion for the Court that it was unworkable to seek limits on Congress' power in terms of particular governmental functions, whether "traditional," "integral," "ordinary," or "necessary." Such distinctions merely invite judges to decide on what state policies they favor or dislike. Blackmun noted that any 10th Amendment limits on Congress' Commerce Clause power are in the procedural safeguards inherent in the structure and political processes of the federal system, including the lobbying ability of groups like the National Governors' Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National League of Cities, International City/County Management Association, and the Council of State Governments.

Justice Powell dissented in Garcia, joined by Chief Justice Burger, and Justices Rehnquist and O'Connor. Justice Powell said that the Court was improperly withdrawing from expected difficulties in drawing lines, was ignoring the essence of federalism which required federal respect for legitimate state interests, and was mistaken in its evaluation of the strength of state involvement in federal processes. Justice Rehnquist wrote separately to emphasize that his opinion in National League did not call for a balancing of federal and state interests, and he predicted that one day it would again command a majority on the Court. In an attempt to save something of National League, Justice Scalia later said in South Carolina v. Baker that Blackmun's opinion in Garcia had noted constitutional structure as the source of some limits on federal action affecting states.

Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority
469 U.S. 528 (1985)

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

We revisit in these cases an issue raised in National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976). In that litigation, this Court, by a sharply divided vote, ruled that the Commerce Clause does not empower Congress to enforce the minimum-wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) against the States "in areas of traditional governmental functions." Id., at 852.

In the present cases, a Federal District Court concluded that municipal ownership and operation of a mass-transit system is a traditional governmental function and thus, under National League of Cities, is exempt from the obligations imposed by the FLSA. Faced with the identical question, three Federal Courts of Appeals and one state appellate court have reached the opposite conclusion.

Our examination of this "function" standard applied in these and other cases over the last eight years now persuades us that the attempt to draw the boundaries of state regulatory immunity in terms of "traditional governmental function" is not only unworkable but is also inconsistent with established principles of federalism and, indeed, with those very federalism principles on which National League of Cities purported to rest. That case, accordingly, is overruled.

The prerequisites for governmental immunity under National League of Cities were summarized by this Court in Hodel. Under that summary, four conditions must be satisfied before a state activity may be deemed immune from a particular federal regulation under the Commerce Clause. First, it is said that the federal statute at issue must regulate "the States as States." Second, the statute must "address matters that are indisputably [attributes] of state sovereignty." Third, state compliance with the federal obligation must "directly impair [the States'] ability 'to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions.'" Finally, the relation of state and federal interests must not be such that "the nature of the federal interest . . . justifies state submission." 452 U.S., at 287-288, and n.29, quoting National League of Cities, 426 U.S., at 845, 852, 854.

26 Id. at 557-60 (Powell, J., joined by Burger, C.J., and Rehnquist & O'Connor, JJ., dissenting); id. at 579-80 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

The controversy in the present cases has focused on the third Hodel requirement – that the challenged federal statute trench on "traditional governmental functions." The District Court voiced a common concern: "Despite the abundance of adjectives, identifying which particular state functions are immune remains difficult." 557 F. Supp., at 447. Just how troublesome the task has been is revealed by the results reached in other federal cases.

Thus far, this Court itself has made little headway in defining the scope of the governmental functions deemed protected under National League of Cities. In that case the Court set forth examples of protected and unprotected functions, see 426 U.S., at 851, 854, n.18, but provided no explanation of how those examples were identified. The only other case in which the Court has had occasion to address the problem is Long Island. We there observed: "The determination of whether a federal law impairs a state's authority with respect to 'areas of traditional [state] functions' may at times be a difficult one." 455 U.S., at 684, quoting National League of Cities, 426 U.S., at 852. The accuracy of that statement is demonstrated by this Court's own difficulties in Long Island in developing a workable standard for "traditional governmental functions." We relied in large part there on "the historical reality that the operation of railroads is not among the functions traditionally performed by state and local governments," but we simultaneously disavowed "a static historical view of state functions generally immune from federal regulation." 455 U.S., at 686 (first emphasis added; second emphasis in original). We held that the inquiry into a particular function's "traditional" nature was merely a means of determining whether the federal statute at issue unduly handicaps "basic state prerogatives," id., at 686-687, but we did not offer an explanation of what makes one state function a "basic prerogative" and another function not basic. Finally, having disclaimed a rigid reliance on the historical pedigree of state involvement in a particular area, we nonetheless found it appropriate to emphasize the extended historical record of federal involvement in the field of rail transportation. Id., at 687-689.

Many constitutional standards involve "[undoubted] . . . gray areas," Fry v. United States, 421 U.S. 542, 558 (1975) (dissenting opinion), and, despite the difficulties that this Court and other courts have encountered so far, it normally might be fair to venture the assumption that case-by-case development would lead to a workable standard for determining whether a particular governmental function should be immune from federal regulation under the Commerce Clause. A further cautionary note is sounded, however, by the Court's experience in the related field of state immunity from federal taxation.

If these tax-immunity cases had any common thread, it was in the attempt to distinguish between "governmental" and "proprietary" functions. [Ed.: Addressed in this Coursebook at § 7.2.2(B) n.25] It was this uncertainty and instability that led the Court shortly thereafter, in New York v. United States, 326 U.S. 572 (1946), unanimously to conclude that the distinction between "governmental" and "proprietary" functions was "unteenable" and must be abandoned. See id., at 583 (opinion of Frankfurter, J., joined by Rutledge, J.); id., at 586 (Stone, C. J., concurring, joined by Reed, Murphy, and Burton, JJ.); id., at 590-596 (Douglas, J., dissenting, joined by Black, J.).

The distinction the Court discarded as unworkable in the field of tax immunity has proved no more fruitful in the field of regulatory immunity under the Commerce Clause. Neither do any of the alternative standards that might be employed to distinguish between protected and unprotected governmental functions appear manageable. We rejected the possibility of making immunity turn on a purely historical standard of "tradition" in Long Island, and properly so. The most obvious defect of a historical approach to state immunity is that it prevents a court from accommodating changes in the historical functions of States, changes that have resulted in a number of once-private functions like education being assumed by the States and their subdivisions. At the same time, the only apparent virtue of a rigorous historical standard, namely, its promise of a reasonably objective measure for state immunity, is illusory. Reliance on history as an organizing principle results in line-drawing of the most arbitrary sort; the genesis of state governmental functions stretches over a historical continuum from before the Revolution to the present, and courts would have to decide by fiat precisely how longstanding a pattern of state involvement had to be for federal regulatory authority to be defeated.

A nonhistorical standard for selecting immune governmental functions is likely to be just as unworkable as is a historical standard. The goal of identifying "uniquely" governmental functions, for example, has been rejected by the Court in the field of government tort liability in part because the notion of a "uniquely" governmental function is unmanageable. See Indian Towing Co. v. United States, 350 U.S. 61, 64-68 (1955); see also Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 433 (1978) (dissenting opinion). Another possibility would be to confine immunity to "necessary" governmental services, that is, services that would be provided inadequately or not at all unless the government provided them. Cf. Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S., at 172. The set of services that fits into this category, however, may well be negligible. . . . It also is open to question how well equipped courts are to make this kind of determination about the workings of economic markets.

We believe, however, that there is a more fundamental problem at work here . . . . The problem is that neither the governmental/proprietary distinction nor any other that purports to separate out important governmental functions can be faithful to the role of federalism in a democratic society. The essence of our federal system is that within the realm of authority left open to them under the Constitution, the States must be equally free to engage in any activity that their citizens choose for the common weal, no matter how unorthodox or unnecessary anyone else – including the judiciary – deems state involvement to be. Any rule of state immunity that looks to the "traditional," "integral," or "necessary" nature of governmental functions inevitably invites an unelected federal judiciary to make decisions about which state policies it favors and which ones it dislikes. "The science of government . . . is the science of experiment," Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, 226 (1821), and the States cannot serve as laboratories for social and economic experiment, see New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting), if they must pay an added price when they meet the changing needs of their citizenry by taking up functions that an earlier day and a different society left in private hands. In the words of Justice Black: "There is not, and there cannot be, any unchanging line of demarcation between essential and non-essential governmental functions. Many governmental functions of today have at some time in the past been nongovernmental. The genius of our government provides that, within the sphere of constitutional action, the people – acting not through the courts but through their elected legislative representatives – have the power to determine as conditions demand, what services and functions the public welfare requires." Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U.S., at 427 (concurring opinion).
We therefore now reject, as unsound in principle and unworkable in practice, a rule of state immunity from federal regulation that turns on a judicial appraisal of whether a particular governmental function is "integral" or "traditional." Any such rule leads to inconsistent results at the same time that it diserves principles of democratic self-governance, and it breeds inconsistency precisely because it is divorced from those principles.

The States unquestionably do "[retain] a significant measure of sovereign authority." EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S., at 269 (Powell, J., dissenting). They do so, however, only to the extent that the Constitution has not divested them of their original powers and transferred those powers to the Federal Government. In the words of James Madison to the Members of the First Congress: "Interference with the power of the States was no constitutional criterion of the power of Congress. If the power was not given, Congress could not exercise it; if given, they might exercise it, although it should interfere with the laws, or even the Constitution of the States." 2 Annals of Cong. 1897 (1791).

When we look for the States' "residuary and inviolable sovereignty," The Federalist No. 39, p. 285 (B. Wright ed. 1961) (J. Madison), in the shape of the constitutional scheme rather than in predetermined notions of sovereign power, a different measure of state sovereignty emerges. Apart from the limitation on federal authority inherent in the delegated nature of Congress' Article I powers, the principal means chosen by the Framers to ensure the role of the States in the federal system lies in the structure of the Federal Government itself. It is no novelty to observe that the composition of the Federal Government was designed in large part to protect the States from overreaching by Congress. The Framers thus gave the States a role in the selection both of the Executive and the Legislative Branches of the Federal Government. The States were vested with indirect influence over the House of Representatives and the Presidency by their control of electoral qualifications and their role in Presidential elections. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 2, and Art. II, § 1. They were given more direct influence in the Senate, where each State received equal representation and each Senator was to be selected by the legislature of his State. Art. I, § 3. The significance attached to the States' equal representation in the Senate is underscored by the prohibition of any constitutional amendment divesting a State of equal representation without the State's consent. Art. V.

The effectiveness of the federal political process in preserving the States' interests is apparent even today in the course of federal legislation. On the one hand, the States have been able to direct a substantial proportion of federal revenues into their own treasuries in the form of general and program-specific grants in aid. The federal role in assisting state and local governments is a longstanding one; Congress provided federal land grants to finance state governments from the beginning of the Republic, and direct cash grants were awarded as early as 1887 under the Hatch Act. In the past quarter century alone, federal grants to States and localities have grown from $ 7 billion to $ 96 billion. As a result, federal grants now account for about one-fifth of state and local government expenditures. The States have obtained federal funding for such services as police and fire protection, education, public health and hospitals, parks and recreation, and sanitation. Moreover, at the same time that the States have exercised their influence to obtain federal support, they have been able to exempt themselves from a wide variety of obligations imposed by Congress under the Commerce Clause. For example, the Federal Power Act, the National Labor Relations Act, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, the Occupational Safety and Health Act, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, and the Sherman Act all contain express or implied exemptions for States and their subdivisions.

We realize that changes in the structure of the Federal Government have taken place since 1789, not the least of which has been the substitution of popular election of Senators by the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment in 1913, and that these changes may work to alter the influence of the States in the federal political process. Nonetheless, against this background, we are convinced that the fundamental limitation that the constitutional scheme imposes on the Commerce Clause to protect the "States as States" is one of process rather than one of result. Any substantive restraint on the exercise of Commerce Clause powers must find its justification in the procedural nature of this basic limitation, and it must be tailored to compensate for possible failings in the national political process rather than to dictate a "sacred province of state autonomy." EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S., at 236.

We do not lightly overrule recent precedent. We have not hesitated, however, when it has become apparent that a prior decision has departed from a proper understanding of congressional power under the Commerce Clause. See United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117 (1941). Due respect for the reach of congressional power within the federal system mandates that we do so now.

Justice POWELL, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice REHNQUIST, and Justice O'CONNOR join, dissenting.

Today's opinion does not explain how the States' role in the electoral process guarantees that particular exercises of the Commerce Clause power will not infringe on residual state sovereignty. Members of Congress are elected from the various States, but once in office they are Members of the Federal Government. Although the States participate in the Electoral College, this is hardly a reason to view the President as a representative of the States' interest against federal encroachment. We noted recently "[the] hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power. . . ." INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983). The Court offers no reason to think that this pressure will not operate when Congress seeks to invoke its powers under the Commerce Clause, notwithstanding the electoral role of the States.

More troubling than the logical infirmities in the Court's reasoning is the result of its holding, i.e., that federal political officials, invoking the Commerce Clause, are the sole judges of the limits of their own power. This result is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our constitutional system. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 78 (Hamilton). At least since Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803), it has been the settled province of the federal judiciary "to say what the law is" with respect to the constitutionality of Acts of Congress.
In our federal system, the States have a major role that cannot be pre-empted by the National Government. As contemporaneous writings and the debates at the ratifying conventions make clear, the States' ratification of the Constitution was predicated on this understanding of federalism. Indeed, the Tenth Amendment was adopted specifically to ensure that the important role promised the States by the proponents of the Constitution was realized.

Much of the initial opposition to the Constitution was rooted in the fear that the National Government would be too powerful and eventually would eliminate the States as viable political entities. This concern was voiced repeatedly until proponents of the Constitution made assurances that a Bill of Rights, including a provision explicitly reserving powers in the States, would be among the first business of the new Congress. Samuel Adams argued, for example, that if the several States were to be joined in "one entire Nation, under one Legislature, the Powers of which shall extend to every Subject of Legislation, and its Laws be supreme & controul the whole, the Idea of Sovereignty in these States must be lost." Letter from Samuel Adams to Richard Henry Lee (Dec. 3, 1787), reprinted in Anti-Federalists versus Federalists 159 (J. Lewis ed. 1967). Likewise, George Mason feared that "the general government being paramount to, and in every respect more powerful than the state governments, the latter must give way to the former." Address in the Ratifying Convention of Virginia (June 4-12, 1788), reprinted in Anti-Federalists versus Federalists, supra, at 208-209.

Antifederalists raised these concerns in almost every state ratifying convention. See generally 1-4 Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution (J. Elliot 2d. ed. 1876). As a result, eight States voted for the Constitution only after proposing amendments to be adopted after ratification. All eight of these included among their recommendations some version of what later became the Tenth Amendment. Ibid. So strong was the concern that the proposed Constitution was seriously defective without a specific bill of rights, including a provision reserving powers to the States, that in order to secure the votes for ratification, the Federalists eventually conceded that such provisions were necessary. See 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 505 and passim (1971). It was thus generally agreed that consideration of a bill of rights would be among the first business of the new Congress. See generally 1 Annals of Cong. 432-437 (1789) (remarks of James Madison). Accordingly, the 10 Amendments that we know as the Bill of Rights were proposed and adopted early in the first session of the First Congress. 2 Schwartz, The Bill of Rights, supra, at 983-1167.

The Court maintains that the standard approved in National League of Cities "disserves principles of democratic self-governance." In reaching this conclusion, the Court looks myopically only to persons elected to positions in the Federal Government. It disregards entirely the far more effective role of democratic self-government at the state and local levels. One must compare realistically the operation of the state and local governments with that of the Federal Government. Federal legislation is drafted primarily by the staffs of the congressional committees. In view of the hundreds of bills introduced at each session of Congress and the complexity of many of them, it is virtually impossible for even the most conscientious legislators to be truly familiar with many of the statutes enacted. Federal departments and agencies customarily are authorized to write regulations. Often these are more important than the text of the statutes. As is true of the original legislation, these are drafted largely by staff personnel. The administration and enforcement of federal laws and regulations necessarily are largely in the hands of staff and civil service employees. These employees may have little or no knowledge of the States and localities that will be affected by the statutes and regulations for which they are responsible. In any case, they hardly are as accessible and responsive as those who occupy analogous positions in state and local governments.

In drawing this contrast, I imply no criticism of these federal employees or the officials who are ultimately in charge. The great majority are conscientious and faithful to their duties. My point is simply that members of the immense federal bureaucracy are not elected, know less about the services traditionally rendered by States and localities, and are inevitably less responsive to recipients of such services, than are state legislatures, city councils, boards of supervisors, and state and local commissions, boards, and agencies. It is at these state and local levels – not in Washington as the Court so mistakenly thinks – that "democratic self-government" is best exemplified.

. . . In overruling National League of Cities, today's opinion apparently authorizes federal control, under the auspices of the Commerce Clause, over the terms and conditions of employment of all state and local employees.

The Court emphasizes that municipal operation of an intracity mass transit system is relatively new in the life of our country. It nevertheless is a classic example of the type of service traditionally provided by local government. It is local by definition. It is indistinguishable in principle from the traditional services of providing and maintaining streets, public lighting, traffic control, water, and sewerage systems. Services of this kind are precisely those with which citizens are more "familiarly and minutely conversant." The Federalist No. 46, p. 316 (J. Cooke ed. 1961). State and local officials of course must be intimately familiar with these services and sensitive to their quality as well as cost. Such officials also know that their constituents and the press respond to the adequacy, fair distribution, and cost of these services. It is this kind of state and local control and accountability that the Framers understood would insure the vitality and preservation of the federal system that the Constitution explicitly requires. See National League of Cities, 426 U.S., at 847-852.

As I view the Court's decision today as rejecting the basic precepts of our federal system and limiting the constitutional role of judicial review, I dissent.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

I join both Justice Powell's and Justice O'Connor's thoughtful dissents. Justice Powell's reference to the "balancing test" approved in National League of Cities is not identical with the language in that case, which recognized that Congress could not act under its commerce power to infringe on certain fundamental aspects of state sovereignty that are essential to "the States' separate and independent existence." Nor is either test, or Justice O'Connor's suggested approach, precisely congruent with Justice Blackmun's views in 1976, when he spoke of a balancing approach which did not outlaw federal power in areas "where the federal interest is demonstrably greater." But under any one of these approaches the judgment in these cases should be affirmed, and I do not think it incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of a majority of this Court.
Subsequent to Garcia, states were able to get some modifications of the overtime provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Instead of always having to pay time-and-a-half for overtime, states can grant their employees one-and-a-half hours of “compensation time” of work to make up for overtime hours worked, as long as the employee has agreed to this arrangement, up to a maximum of 240 hours (480 for public safety employees).

This is useful for states, as sometimes their workers typically work more than 40 hours when the legislature is in session, but less than 40 hours when they are not.

E. The Modern Natural Law Era: 1986-Today

Despite the 10th Amendment doctrine of Garcia, state rights have been indirectly enhanced after Garcia in two ways. First, in Gregory v. Ashcroft, Justice O’Connor set forth policy reasons why the 10th Amendment reflected a desire for states to have substantial reserved authority: to assure government sensitivity to diverse needs, increase opportunity for citizen involvement in democratic processes, allow for innovation and experimentation in government, make government more responsive, and check abuses of governmental power. Based on this analysis, the Court held in Gregory v. Ashcroft that Congress needs to make a clear statement in federal statutes for those statutes to apply also to states in their sovereign capacity. This opinion was joined unreservedly by conservative Holmesian Chief Justice Rehnquist, conservative formalist Justice Scalia, and the natural law Justices Kennedy and Souter.

States’ rights under the 10th Amendment have also been enhanced after Garcia by cases that have limited Congress’ power to abrogate state 11th Amendment immunity and impose remedies on states either under Article I, § 8 or § 5 of the 14th Amendment. This doctrine is addressed at § 8.2.3.

During our Nation’s history, the two major political parties have disagreed over issues of federalism. In the period before the Civil War, the major federalism issues involved slavery and tariff policy. The Federalist Party, and its later incarnation in the Whig Party and the Republican Party, favored broader federal power over these matters. The Democratic Party of Jefferson and Jackson was more in favor of states’ rights. During this period, Federalist judges, like Chief Justice Marshall, favored broader federal power, while Democratic judges, like Chief Justice Taney, favored states’ rights.

After the Civil War resolved these issues in favor of federal power, federalism issues turned to matters of federal regulation of both economic and civil rights matters. Since the Civil War, conservatives in both the Republican and Democratic parties have resisted such federal economic and civil rights legislation, as part of a conservative pro-business and pro-traditional freedom to discriminate basis, and thus have emphasized states’ rights on these issues; liberals in both the Republican and Democratic parties have embraced federal power to legislate on these matters, resulting in support throughout the 20th and 21st centuries for a liberal, progressive agenda.

Since the 1960s, the Republican Party has become more conservative as a party, and the Democratic Party has become more liberal. This has happened in part because many conservative Democrats, particularly in the South, have gradually switched parties and become Republican, following the Democratic Party under President Lyndon Johnson becoming associated with federal legislation like the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and Nixon’s “Southern Strategy” of the 1960s and 1970s in response. As the Republican Party has become more conservative as a party, some moderate Republicans, particularly in Northern States, have begun to vote more often Democratic. Thus, in recent Presidential elections, Democratic candidates have tended to win most of the Northern and Pacific states that formed the base of President Abraham Lincoln’s election as a Republican in 1860, while Republican candidates have tended to win Southern and Western States that were the base of the Democratic Party in 1860 and thereafter. In modern times, conservative judges, typically Republicans, more often have favored states’ rights than liberal judges, typically Democrats, who have favored federal power.30

2. The 10th Amendment Principle of “No Commandeering”

Based upon the natural law style of interpretation’s great respect for precedent, it is likely that Garcia is still good law today, with only conservative formalist Justices (Scalia, Thomas, and Alito) and conservative Holmesian Justice (Chief Justice Roberts) being willing to vote to overrule its holding and reinstate some version of the approach of National League of Cities. However, modern natural law Justices have carved out some meaning for the 10th Amendment independent of Garcia by banning federal commandeering of state legislative, executive, or administrative agencies.

In New York v. United States,31 Justice O'Connor wrote for a 6-3 Court, including Justices Kennedy and Souter, that "Congress may not simply 'commandeer the legislative processes of the States by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program.'" This doctrine is based upon the “dual theory of sovereignty.” As explained by Justice Kennedy in U.S. Term Limits, Inc v. Thornton,32 the genius of our founding generation was to split sovereignty in the United States system into two parts: states and federal government. As Chief Justice Marshall had noted in McCulloch v. Maryland,\(^3\) excerpted at § 5.3, the founding generation established dual systems of government – states and federal government – each deriving its authority independently from the people. The Constitution, after all, was adopted by “We, the People,” not “We, the States.” Further the Constitution was ratified in special state conventions elected specially by the people for that purpose, not ratified by the existing state legislatures. Thus, in our system, there are two sovereign entities, the federal government and the states, which are linked by the Constitution’s Supremacy Clause of Article VI, § 2. Under this dual theory of sovereignty, the federal government can regulate both individuals and states where constitutional power exists under the United States Constitution. However, the federal government cannot tell the states in any manner how they should regulate their own people because that would be infringing on the states’ reserved sovereign power. The rule in New York was phrased a categorical barrier, not a balancing test depending on the extent of the commandeering or the importance of the federal government’s interest involved.

Reflecting the liberal predisposition to favor federal regulation, Justice White, dissented with Justices Blackmun and Stevens. He stated, “An incursion on state sovereignty hardly seems more constitutionally acceptable if the federal statute that ‘commands’ specific action also applies to private parties. The alleged diminution in state authority over its own affairs is not any less because the federal mandate restricts the activities of private parties.”\(^3\) This quote, however, misses the point of New York that there is a difference between the federal government regulating the states directly, and telling the states how they have to regulate their own people.

The theory of New York v. United States that there is a difference between commanding a state to do something under Garcia, and commandeering a state by telling it how to regulate its own citizens, was extended in Printz v. United States,\(^3\) excerpted below. There, a 5-4 Court held that Congress could not require state officials to conduct a federally required background check on persons who had applied to purchase a gun. The holding has broad applications, being used by state officials following Gonzales v. Raich, excerpted at § 6.4, for the proposition that local law enforcement officers do not have to enforce any federal law, such as federal marijuana laws, and can acquiesce in medical marijuana use authorized under state laws.

Based upon history and practice, the Court suggested strongly in dicta in Printz that Congress can commandeer state judges to enforce the United States Constitution. This is based on the view that the framers and ratifiers’ expectations, given no federal court system under the Articles of Confederation, and congressional discretion to create lower federal courts in Art. I, § 8, cl. 9, was that state courts would be the primary initial enforcers of federal constitutional and statutory rights.\(^3\)

The Printz majority was made up of the same Justices who formed the majority in New York v. United States, minus Justice Souter. In his dissent in Printz, Justice Souter noted that while he agreed with Justices O’Connor and Kennedy regarding Congress’ lack of an ability to commandeer the state legislative process in New York, Justice Souter read The Federalist Papers, particularly language in Hamilton’s No. 27, to suggest that just as the framers and ratifiers assumed state judges could be commandeered for federal purposes, they assumed state executive officers could be commandeered. The majority in Printz disagreed, viewing the passages as only requiring state officials not to obstruct the operation of federal law, and permitting auxiliary aid, if they wished. The majority seems to have the better of this debate reading these passages against the backdrop of the “dual theory of sovereignty” and the lack of federal legislative or executive practice attempting to “commandeer” state executive or legislative officials for most of the Nation’s history.

Reflecting their moderate liberal instrumentalist approach, Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer also dissented in Printz. They limited their dissent to questioning the rationale of New York as applied to state judicial or executive officers, thus inducing Justice Souter to join their dissent. In a later case it is likely that Justices like Justice Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer might be willing to question the entire “commandeering” doctrine in New York and Printz, just as Justice Stevens, along with Justices White and Blackmun, had questioned that rationale in New York.

The Court has made it clear that New York and Printz apply only where Congress attempts to “use” or “commandeer” state officials for federal purposes. These cases pose no 10th Amendment limit on Congress’ power to regulate states or individuals directly. Thus, in Reno v. Condon, excerpted below, a federal act barring unconsented disclosure of driver’s license information was applied to states and private parties. Since the federal statute regulated state workers at the state Department of Motor Vehicles, and did not tell those workers how to regulate their own citizens, the act was constitutional. If the federal government attempted to tell states how to regulate their own citizens, such as requiring driver’s licenses to contain certain information or be done in a standardized manner, that would likely be viewed as commandeering, although Congress could use its conditional Spending Clause power, addressed at § 7.2.2, to induce states to adopt such uniform licenses.

Under Condon, the federal government presumably could tell local law enforcement officials to forward any information they have collected on their own regarding terrorist activity, as that would be regulating the officers directly, while the federal government could not require the local law enforcement officials to aid the federal government in collecting such information. In a case decided before Condon, in City of New York v. United States, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals refused to hold unconstitutional two federal statutes that preempted a city executive order prohibiting city officials from voluntarily providing federal authorities with information about the immigration status of aliens. Since the federal statutes did intrude on the city’s management, they should be ruled unconstitutional under Printz. The case involved a facial challenge to the federal statutes. In the absence of any showing of injury by the city of New York, the Second Circuit upheld the statute. The court “invited the city to inform us” of their “legitimate municipal functions” that might be impaired by the federal statute. The court specifically noted that had such justification been provided, it would have been a different case and “we offer no opinion on that question.”

In each of these cases, states, or cities, were parties to the litigation. In some cases, states, or cities, might choose not to challenge such federal regulation. They may want to conserve resources, they may not find the legislation sufficiently intrusive to warrant a constitutional challenge, or they may elect to enforce such regulations either to avoid antagonizing the federal government or because they approve of the legislation but do not want to face the political ramifications of enacting the statutory scheme themselves. Under any of these scenarios, private parties affected by the federal regulation may still wish to challenge the regulation in court. Cases have not made clear whether private parties have standing to challenge these laws when states decline to do so.

The Court made it clear in Printz that states can choose to aid the federal government in enforcement if states so wish, as was done under an Act of 1882 with respect to immigration matters, or in 1917 with respect to aspects of the draft during World War I. Thus, the better approach would seem to be to deny private parties any right to raise these issues in the absence of any official state complaint. One author has noted, “Courts generally have recognized that a political subdivision of a state has standing to raise a Tenth Amendment claim. At that point, however, some courts have drawn the line, ruling that private plaintiffs not affiliated with the government may not raise such a challenge. Other courts have extended standing to private plaintiffs begrudgingly, or have assumed such standing while questioning whether it constitutionally can exist. A third set has affirmatively recognized that private parties have standing to raise these claims.”

Printz v. United States
521 U.S. 898 (1997)

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented in these cases is whether certain interim provisions of the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act, Pub. L. 103-159, 107 Stat. 1536, commanding state and local law enforcement officers to conduct background checks on prospective handgun purchasers and to perform certain related tasks, violate the Constitution.

governing the distribution of firearms. It prohibits firearms dealers from transferring handguns to any person under 21, not resident in the dealer's State, or prohibited by state or local law from purchasing or possessing firearms, § 922(b). It also forbids possession of a firearm by, and transfer of a firearm to, convicted felons, fugitives from justice, unlawful users of controlled substances, persons adjudicated as mentally defective or committed to mental institutions, aliens unlawfully present in the United States, persons dishonorably discharged from the Armed Forces, persons who have renounced their citizenship, and persons who have been subjected to certain restraining orders or been convicted of a misdemeanor offense involving domestic violence. §§ 922(d) and (g).

In 1993, Congress amended the GCA by enacting the Brady Act. The Act requires the Attorney General to establish a national instant background check system by November 30, 1998, Pub. L. immediately puts in place certain interim provisions until that system becomes operative. Under the interim provisions, a firearms dealer who proposes to transfer a handgun must first: (1) receive from the transferee a statement (the Brady Form), § 922(s)(1)(A)(i)(I), containing the name, address and date of birth of the proposed transferee along with a sworn statement that the transferee is not among any of the classes of prohibited purchasers, § 922(s)(3); (2) verify the identity of the transferee by examining an identification document, § 922(s)(1)(A)(i)(II); and (3) provide the "chief law enforcement officer" (CLEO) of the transferee's residence with notice of the contents (and a copy) of the Brady Form, §§ 922(s)(1)(A)(i)(III) and (IV). With some exceptions, the dealer must then wait five business days before consummating the sale, unless the CLEO earlier notifies the dealer that he has no reason to believe the transfer would be illegal. § 922(s)(1)(A)(ii).

From the description set forth above, it is apparent that the Brady Act purports to direct state law enforcement officers to participate, albeit only temporarily, in the administration of a federally enacted regulatory scheme. Regulated firearms dealers are required to forward Brady Forms not to a federal officer or employee, but to the CLEOs, whose obligation to accept those forms is implicit in the duty imposed upon them to make "reasonable efforts" within five days to determine whether the sales reflected in the forms are lawful. While the CLEOs are subjected to no federal requirement that they prevent the sales determined to be unlawful (it is perhaps assumed that their state-law duties will require prevention or apprehension), they are empowered to grant, in effect, waivers of the federally prescribed 5-day waiting period for handgun purchases by notifying the gun dealers that they have no reason to believe the transactions would be illegal.

The petitioners here object to being pressed into federal service, and contend that congressional action compelling state officers to execute federal laws is unconstitutional.

Because there is no constitutional text speaking to this precise question, the answer to the CLEOs' challenge must be sought in historical understanding and practice, in the structure of the Constitution, and in the jurisprudence of this Court.
Petitioners contend that compelled enlistment of state executive officers for the administration of federal programs is, until very recent years at least, unprecedented. The Government contends, to the contrary, that "the earliest Congresses enacted statutes that required the participation of state officials in the implementation of federal laws," Brief for United States 28. The Government's contention demands our careful consideration, since early congressional enactments "provide 'contemporaneous and weighty evidence' of the Constitution's meaning," Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 723-724 (1986) (quoting Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 790 (1983)). Indeed, such "contemporaneous legislative exposition of the Constitution . . ., acquiesced in for a long term of years, fixes the construction to be given its provisions." Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 175 (1926) (citing numerous cases).

The Government observes that statutes enacted by the first Congresses required state courts to record applications for citizenship, Act of Mar. 26, 1790, ch. 3, § 1, 1 Stat. 103, to transmit abstracts of citizenship applications and other naturalization records to the Secretary of State, Act of June 18, 1798, ch. 54, § 2, 1 Stat. 567, and to register aliens seeking naturalization and issue certificates of registry, Act of Apr. 14, 1802, ch. 28, § 2, 2 Stat. 154-155. It may well be, however, that these requirements applied only in States that authorized their courts to conduct naturalization proceedings. See Act of Mar. 26, 1790, ch. 3, § 1, 1 Stat. 103; Holmgren v. United States, 217 U.S. 509, 516-517 (1910) (explaining that the Act of March 26, 1790 "conferred authority upon state courts to admit aliens to citizenship" and refraining from addressing the question "whether the States can be required to enforce such naturalization laws against their consent"); United States v. Jones, 109 U.S. 513, 519-520 (1883) (stating that these obligations were imposed "with the consent of the States" and "could not be enforced against the consent of the States"). Other statutes of that era apparently or at least arguably required state courts to perform functions unrelated to naturalization, such as resolving controversies between a captain and the crew of his ship concerning the seaworthiness of the vessel, Act of July 20, 1790, ch. 29, § 3, 1 Stat. 132, hearing the claims of slave owners who had apprehended fugitive slaves and issuing certificates authorizing the slave's forced removal to the State from which he had fled, Act of Feb. 12, 1793, ch. 7, § 3, 1 Stat. 302-305, taking proof of the claims of Canadian refugees who had assisted the United States during the Revolutionary War, Act of Apr. 7, 1798, ch. 26, § 3, 1 Stat. 548, and ordering the deportation of alien enemies in times of war, Act of July 6, 1798, ch. 66, § 2, 1 Stat. 577-578.

These early laws establish, at most, that the Constitution was originally understood to permit imposition of an obligation on state judges to enforce federal prescriptions, insofar as those prescriptions related to matters appropriate for the judicial power. That assumption was perhaps implicit in one of the provisions of the Constitution, and was explicit in another. In accord with the so-called Madisonian Compromise, Article III, § 1, established only a Supreme Court, and made the creation of lower federal courts optional with the Congress – even though it was obvious that the Supreme Court alone could not hear all federal cases throughout the United States. See C. Warren, The Making of the Constitution 325-327 (1928). And the Supremacy Clause, Art. VI, cl. 2, announced that "the Laws of the United States . . . shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby." It is understandable why courts should have been viewed distinctively in this regard; unlike legislatures and executives, they applied the law of other sovereigns all the time. The principle underlying so-called "transitory" causes of action was that laws which operated elsewhere created obligations in justice that courts of the forum state would enforce. See, e.g., McKenna v. Fisk, 42 U.S. 241 (1843). The Constitution itself, in the Full Faith and Credit Clause, Art. IV, § 1, generally required such enforcement with respect to obligations

For these reasons, we do not think the early statutes imposing obligations on state courts imply a power of Congress to impress the state executive into its service. Indeed, it can be argued that the numerousness of these statutes, contrasted with the utter lack of statutes imposing obligations on the States' executive (notwithstanding the attractiveness of that course to Congress), suggests an assumed absence of such power. The only early federal law the Government has brought to our attention that imposed duties on state executive officers is the Extradition Act of 1793, which required the "executive authority" of a State to cause the arrest and delivery of a fugitive from justice upon the request of the executive authority of the State from which the fugitive had fled. See Act of Feb. 12, 1793, ch. 7, § 1, 1 Stat. 302. That was in direct implementation, however, of the Extradition Clause of the Constitution itself, see Art. IV, § 2.

It is interesting to observe that Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, commenting upon the same issue of why state officials are required by oath to support the Constitution, uses the same "essential agency" language as Madison did in Federalist No. 44, and goes on to give more numerous examples of state executive agency than Madison did; all of them, however, involve not state administration of federal law, but merely the implementation of duties imposed on state officers by the Constitution itself: "The executive authority of the several states may be often called upon to exert Powers or allow Rights given by the Constitution, as in filling vacancies in the senate during the recess of the legislature; in issuing writs of election to fill vacancies in the house of representatives; in officering the militia, and giving effect to laws for calling them; and in the surrender of fugitives from justice." 2 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 577 (1851).

The Government points to a number of federal statutes enacted within the past few decades that require the participation of state or local officials in implementing federal regulatory schemes. Some of these are connected to federal funding measures, and can perhaps be more accurately described as conditions upon the grant of federal funding than as mandates to the States; others, which require only the provision of information to the Federal Government, do not involve the precise issue before us here, which is the forced participation of the States' executive in the actual administration of a federal program.

It is incontestible that the Constitution established a system of "dual sovereignty." Gregory v. surrendered many of their powers to the new Federal Government, they retained "a residuary and inviolable sovereignty," The Federalist No. 39, at 245 (J. Madison). This is reflected throughout the Constitution's text, Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U.S. 71 (1869); Texas v. White, 74 U.S. 700 (1869), including (to mention only a few examples) the prohibition on any involuntary reduction or combination of a State's territory, Art. IV, § 3; the Judicial Power Clause, Art. III, § 2, and the Privileges and Immunities Clause, Art. IV, § 2, which speak of the "Citizens" of the States; the amendment provision, Article V, which requires the votes of three-fourths of the States to amend the Constitution; and the Guarantee Clause, Art. IV, § 4, which "presupposes the continued existence of the states and . . . those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights," Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U.S. 405, 414-415 (1938).

Residual state sovereignty was also implicit, of course, in the Constitution's conferral upon Congress of not all governmental powers, but only discrete, enumerated ones, Art. I, § 8, which implication was rendered express by the Tenth Amendment's assertion that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The Framers' experience under the Articles of Confederation had persuaded them that using the States as the instruments of federal governance was both ineffectual and provocative of federal-state conflict. See The Federalist No. 15. Preservation of the States as independent political entities being the price of union, and "the practicality of making laws, with coercive sanctions, for the States as political bodies" having been, in Madison's words, "exploded on all hands," 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, p. 9 (M. Farrand ed. 1911), the Framers rejected the concept of a central government that would act upon and through the States, and instead designed a system in which the state and federal governments would exercise concurrent authority over the people – who were, in Hamilton's words, "the only proper objects of government," The Federalist No. 15, at 109. We have set forth the historical record in more detail elsewhere, see New York v. United States, 505 U.S. at 161-166, and need not repeat it here. It suffices to repeat the conclusion: "The Framers explicitly chose a Constitution that confers upon Congress the power to regulate individuals, not States." Id., at 166. The great innovation of this design was that "our citizens would have two political capacities, one state and one federal, each protected from incursion by the other"– "a legal system unprecedented in form and design, establishing two orders of government, each with its own direct relationship, its own privity, its own set of mutual rights and obligations to the people who sustain it and are governed by it." U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 838 (1995) (Kennedy, J., concurring). The Constitution thus contemplates that a State's government will represent and remain accountable to its own citizens. See New York, supra, at 168-169; United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995) (Kennedy, J., concurring). Cf. Edgar v. MITE Corp., 457 U.S. 624, 644 (1982) ("the State has no legitimate interest in protecting nonresidents"). As Madison expressed it: "The local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject, within their respective spheres, to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them, within its own sphere." The Federalist No. 39, at 245.

Finally, and most conclusively in the present litigation, we turn to the prior jurisprudence of this Court. Federal commandeering of state governments is such a novel phenomenon that this Court's first experience with it did not occur until the 1970's, when the Environmental Protection Agency promulgated regulations requiring States to prescribe auto emissions testing, monitoring and retrofit programs, and to designate preferential bus and carpool lanes. The Courts of Appeals for the Fourth and Ninth Circuits invalidated the regulations on statutory grounds in order to avoid what they perceived to be grave constitutional issues, see Maryland v. EPA, 530 F.2d 215, 226 (CA4 1975); Brown v. EPA, 521 F.2d 827, 838-842 (CA9 1975); and the District of Columbia Circuit invalidated the regulations on both constitutional and statutory grounds, see District of Columbia v. Train, 521 F.2d 971, 994 (CADC 1975). After we granted certiorari to review the statutory and constitutional validity of the regulations, the Government declined even to defend them, and instead rescinded some and conceded the invalidity of those that remained.

Although we had no occasion to pass upon the subject in Brown, later opinions of ours have made clear that the Federal Government may not compel the States to implement, by legislation or executive action, federal regulatory programs. In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264 (1981), and FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742 (1982), we sustained statutes against constitutional challenge only after assuring ourselves that they did not require the States to enforce federal law. In Hodel we cited the lower court cases in EPA v. Brown, supra, but concluded that the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act did not present the problem they raised because it merely made compliance with federal standards a precondition to continued state regulation in an otherwise pre-empted field, Hodel, supra, at 288. In FERC, we construed the most troubling provisions of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978, to contain only the "command" that state agencies "consider" federal standards, and again only as a precondition to continued state regulation of an otherwise pre-empted field. We warned that "this Court never has sanctioned explicitly a federal command to the States to promulgate and enforce laws and regulations," id., at 761-762.

When we were at last confronted squarely with a federal statute that unambiguously required the States to enact or administer a federal regulatory program, our decision should have come as no surprise. At issue in New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992), were the so-called "take title" provisions of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985, which required States either to enact legislation providing for the disposal of radioactive waste generated within their borders, or to take title to, and possession of the waste – effectively requiring the States either to legislate pursuant to Congress's directions, or to implement an administrative solution. 505 U.S. 144 at 175-176. We concluded that Congress could constitutionally require the States to do neither. Id., at 176. "The Federal Government," we held, "may not compel the States to enact or administer a federal regulatory program." Id., at 188.

The Government also maintains that requiring state officers to perform discrete, ministerial tasks specified by Congress does not violate the principle of New York because it does not diminish the accountability of state or federal officials. This argument fails even on its own terms. By forcing state governments to absorb the financial burden of implementing a federal regulatory program, Members of Congress can take credit for "solving" problems without having to ask their constituents to pay for the solutions with higher federal taxes. And even when the States are not forced to absorb the costs of implementing a federal program, they are still put in the position of taking the blame for its burdensomeness and for its defects. See Merritt, Three Faces of Federalism: Finding a Formula for the Future, 47 Vand. L. Rev. 1563, 1580, n.65 (1994). Under the present law, for example, it will be the CLEO and not some federal official who stands between the gun purchaser and immediate possession of his gun. And it will likely be the CLEO, not some federal official, who will be blamed for any error (even one in the designated federal database) that causes a purchaser to be mistakenly rejected.
We held in \textit{New York} that Congress cannot compel the States to enact or enforce a federal regulatory program. Today we hold that Congress cannot circumvent that prohibition by conscripting the State's officers directly. The Federal Government may neither issue directives requiring the States to address particular problems, nor command the States' officers, or those of their political subdivisions, to administer or enforce a federal regulatory program. It matters not whether policymaking is involved, and no case-by-case weighing of the burdens or benefits is necessary; such commands are fundamentally incompatible with our constitutional system of dual sovereignty. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit is reversed.

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring.

Our precedent and our Nation's historical practices support the Court's holding today. The Brady Act violates the Tenth Amendment to the extent it forces States and local law enforcement officers to perform background checks on prospective handgun owners and to accept Brady Forms from firearms dealers. See \textit{ante}, at 23. Our holding, of course, does not spell the end of the objectives of the Brady Act. States and chief law enforcement officers may voluntarily continue to participate in the federal program. Moreover, the directives to the States are merely interim provisions scheduled to terminate November 30, 1998. Note following 18 U.S.C. § 922. Congress is also free to amend the interim program to provide for its continuance on a contractual basis with the States if it wishes, as it does with a number of other federal programs. See, e.g., 23 U.S.C. § 402 (conditioning States' receipt of federal funds for highway safety program on compliance with federal requirements).

In addition, the Court appropriately refrains from deciding whether other purely ministerial reporting requirements imposed by Congress on state and local authorities pursuant to its Commerce Clause powers are similarly invalid. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 5779(a) (requiring state and local law enforcement agencies to report cases of missing children to the Department of Justice). The provisions invalidated here, however, which directly compel state officials to administer a federal regulatory program, utterly fail to adhere to the design and structure of our constitutional scheme.

The text of the Constitution provides a sufficient basis for a correct disposition of this case.

Article I, § 8, grants the Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. Putting to one side the revisionist views expressed by Justice Thomas in his concurring opinion in \textit{United States v. Lopez}, 514 U.S. 549, 584 (1995), there can be no question that that provision adequately supports the regulation of commerce in handguns effected by the Brady Act. Moreover, the additional grant of authority in that section of the Constitution "to make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers" is surely adequate to support the temporary enlistment of local police officers in the process of identifying persons who should not be entrusted with the possession of handguns. In short, the affirmative delegation of power in Article I provides ample authority for the congressional enactment.
Unlike the First Amendment, which prohibits the enactment of a category of laws that would otherwise be authorized by Article I, the Tenth Amendment imposes no restriction on the exercise of delegated powers. Using language that plainly refers only to powers that are "not" delegated to Congress, it provides: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." U.S. Const., Amdt. 10.

The Amendment confirms the principle that the powers of the Federal Government are limited to those affirmatively granted by the Constitution, but it does not purport to limit the scope or the effectiveness of the exercise of powers that are delegated to Congress. See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 156 (1992) ("in a case . . . involving the division of authority between federal and state governments, the two inquiries are mirror images of each other"). Thus, the Amendment provides no support for a rule that immunizes local officials from obligations that might be imposed on ordinary citizens. Indeed, it would be more reasonable to infer that federal law may impose greater duties on state officials than on private citizens because another provision of the Constitution requires that "all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution." U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 3.

Indeed, the historical materials strongly suggest that the Founders intended to enhance the capacity of the federal government by empowering it – as a part of the new authority to make demands directly on individual citizen – to act through local officials. Hamilton made clear that the new Constitution, "by extending the authority of the federal head to the individual citizens of the several States, will enable the government to employ the ordinary magistracy of each, in the execution of its laws." The Federalist No. 27, at 180. Hamilton's meaning was unambiguous; the federal government was to have the power to demand that local officials implement national policy programs. As he went on to explain: "It is easy to perceive that this will tend to destroy, in the common apprehension, all distinction between the sources from which [the state and federal governments] might proceed; and will give the federal government the same advantage for securing a due obedience to its authority which is enjoyed by the government of each State." Ibid.

The Court's evaluation of the historical evidence, furthermore, fails to acknowledge the important difference between policy decisions that may have been influenced by respect for state sovereignty concerns, and decisions that are compelled by the Constitution. Thus, for example, the decision by Congress to give President Wilson the authority to utilize the services of state officers in implementing the World War I draft, see Act of May 18, 1917, ch. 15, § 6, 40 Stat. 80-81, surely indicates that the national legislature saw no constitutional impediment to the enlistment of state assistance during a federal emergency. The fact that the President was able to implement the program by respectfully "requesting" state action, rather than bluntly commanding it, is evidence that he was an effective statesman, but surely does not indicate that he doubted either his or Congress' power to use mandatory language if necessary. If there were merit to the Court's appraisal of this incident, one would assume that there would have been some contemporary comment on the supposed constitutional concern that hypothetically might have motivated the President's choice of language.
The Court's "structural" arguments are not sufficient to rebut that presumption. The fact that the Framers intended to preserve the sovereignty of the several States simply does not speak to the question whether individual state employees may be required to perform federal obligations, such as registering young adults for the draft, 40 Stat. 80-81, creating state emergency response commissions designed to manage the release of hazardous substances, 42 U.S.C. §§ 11001, 11003, collecting and reporting data on underground storage tanks that may pose an environmental hazard, § 699a, and reporting traffic fatalities, 23 U.S.C. § 402(a), and missing children, 42 U.S.C. § 5779(a), to a federal agency.

As we explained in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985): "The principal means chosen by the Framers to ensure the role of the States in the federal system lies in the structure of the Federal Government itself. It is no novelty to observe that the composition of the Federal Government was designed in large part to protect the States from overreaching by Congress." Id., at 550-551. Given the fact that the Members of Congress are elected by the people of the several States, with each State receiving an equivalent number of Senators in order to ensure that even the smallest States have a powerful voice in the legislature, it is quite unrealistic to assume that they will ignore the sovereignty concerns of their constituents. It is far more reasonable to presume that their decisions to impose modest burdens on state officials from time to time reflect a considered judgment that the people in each of the States will benefit therefrom.

Far more important than the concerns that the Court musters in support of its new rule is the fact that the Framers entrusted Congress with the task of creating a working structure of intergovernmental relationships around the framework that the Constitution authorized. Neither explicitly nor implicitly did the Framers issue any command that forbids Congress from imposing federal duties on private citizens or on local officials. As a general matter, Congress has followed the sound policy of authorizing federal agencies and federal agents to administer federal programs. That general practice, however, does not negate the existence of power to rely on state officials in occasional situations in which such reliance is in the national interest. Rather, the occasional exceptions confirm the wisdom of Justice Holmes' reminder that "the machinery of government would not work if it were not allowed a little play in its joints." Bain Peanut Co. of Tex. v. Pinson, 282 U.S. 499, 501 (1931).

The provision of the Brady Act that crosses the Court's newly defined constitutional threshold is more comparable to a statute requiring local police officers to report the identity of missing children to the Crime Control Center of the Department of Justice than to an offensive federal command to a sovereign state. If Congress believes that such a statute will benefit the people of the Nation, and serve the interests of cooperative federalism better than an enlarged federal bureaucracy, we should respect both its policy judgment and its appraisal of its constitutional power.

Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.
JUSTICE SOUTER, dissenting.

In deciding these cases, which I have found closer than I had anticipated, it is The Federalist that finally determines my position. I believe that the most straightforward reading of No. 27 is authority for the Government's position here, and that this reading is both supported by No. 44 and consistent with Nos. 36 and 45.

Hamilton in No. 27 first notes that because the new Constitution would authorize the National Government to bind individuals directly through national law, it could "employ the ordinary magistracy of each [State] in the execution of its laws." The Federalist No. 27, p. 174 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton). Were he to stop here, he would not necessarily be speaking of anything beyond the possibility of cooperative arrangements by agreement. But he then addresses the combined effect of the proposed Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 2, and state officers's oath requirement, U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 3, and he states that "the Legislatures, Courts and Magistrates of the respective members will be incorporated into the operations of the national government, as far as its just and constitutional authority extends; and will be rendered auxiliary to the enforcement of its laws." The Federalist No. 27, at 174-175 (emphasis in original). The natural reading of this language is not merely that the officers of the various branches of state governments may be employed in the performance of national functions; Hamilton says that the state governmental machinery "will be incorporated" into the Nation's operation, and because the "auxiliary" status of the state officials will occur because they are "bound by the sanctity of an oath," id., at 175, I take him to mean that their auxiliary functions will be the products of their obligations thus undertaken to support federal law, not of their own, or the States', unfettered choices.

I would add to the reasons Justice Stevens sets forth the fact that the United States is not the only nation that seeks to reconcile the practical need for a central authority with the democratic virtues of more local control. At least some other countries, facing the same basic problem, have found that local control is better maintained through application of a principle that is the direct opposite of the principle the majority derives from the silence of our Constitution. The federal systems of Switzerland, Germany, and the European Union, for example, all provide that constituent states, not federal bureaucracies, will themselves implement many of the laws, rules, regulations, or decrees enacted by the central "federal" body. Lenaerts, Constitutionalism and the Many Faces of Federalism, 38 Am. J. Comp. L. 205, 237 (1990); D. Currie, The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany 66, 84 (1994); Mackenzie-Stuart, Foreward, Comparative Constitutional Federalism: Europe and America ix (M. Tushnet ed. 1990); Kimber, A Comparison of Environmental Federalism in the United States and the European Union, 54 Md. L. Rev. 1658, 1675-1677 (1995). They do so in part because they believe that such a system interferes less, not more, with the independent authority of the "state," member nation, or other subsidiary government, and helps to safeguard individual liberty as well. See Council of European Communities, European Council in Edinburgh, 11-12 December 1992, Conclusions of the Presidency 20-21 (1993); D. Lasok & K. Bridge, Law and Institutions of the European Union 114 (1994); Currie, supra, at 68, 81-84, 100-101; Frowein, Integration and the Federal Experience in Germany and Switzerland, 1 Integration Through Law 573, 586-587 (M. Cappelletti, M. Seccombe, & J. Weiler eds. 1986).

Of course, we are interpreting our own Constitution, not those of other nations, and there may be relevant political and structural differences between their systems and our own. Cf. The Federalist No. 20, pp. 134-138 C. Rossiter ed. 1961) (J. Madison and A. Hamilton) (rejecting certain aspects of European federalism). But their experience may nonetheless cast an empirical light on the consequences of different solutions to a common legal problem – in this case the problem of reconciling central authority with the need to preserve the liberty-enhancing autonomy of a smaller constituent governmental entity. Cf. id., No. 42, p. 268 (J. Madison) (looking to experiences of European countries); id., No. 43, pp. 275, 276 (J. Madison) (same). And that experience here offers empirical confirmation of the implied answer to a question Justice Stevens asks: Why, or how, would what the majority sees as a constitutional alternative – the creation of a new federal gun-law bureaucracy, or the expansion of an existing federal bureaucracy – better promote either state sovereignty or individual liberty? See ante, at 7-8, 23 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

Reno v. Condon

The DPPA regulates the disclosure and resale of personal information contained in the records of state DMVs. State DMVs require drivers and automobile owners to provide personal information, which may include a person's name, address, telephone number, vehicle description, Social Security number, medical information, and photograph, as a condition of obtaining a driver's license or registering an automobile. Congress found that many States, in turn, sell this personal information to individuals and businesses. See, e.g., 139 Cong. Rec. 29466, 29468, 29469 (1993); 140 Cong. Rec. 7929(1994) (remarks of Rep. Goss). These sales generate significant revenues for the States. See Travis v. Reno, 163 F.3d 1000, 1002 (CA7 1998) (noting that the Wisconsin Department of Transportation receives approximately $ 8 million each year from the sale of motor vehicle information).

The DPPA establishes a regulatory scheme that restricts the States' ability to disclose a driver's personal information without the driver's consent. The DPPA generally prohibits any state DMV, or officer, employee, or contractor thereof, from "knowingly disclosing or otherwise making available to any person or entity personal information about any individual obtained by the department in connection with a motor vehicle record." 18 U.S.C. § 2721(a).
The DPPA's ban on disclosure of personal information does not apply if drivers have consented to the release of their data.

The DPPA's prohibition of nonconsensual disclosures is also subject to a number of statutory exceptions. For example, the DPPA requires disclosure of personal information "for use in connection with matters of motor vehicle or driver safety and theft, motor vehicle emissions, motor vehicle product alterations, recalls, or advisories, performance monitoring of motor vehicles and dealers by motor vehicle manufacturers, and removal of non-owner records from the original owner records of motor vehicle manufacturers to carry out the purposes of titles I and IV of the Anti Car Theft Act of 1992, the Automobile Information Disclosure Act, the Clean Air Act, and chapters 301, 305, and 321-331 of title 49." 18 U.S.C. § 2721(b) (1994 ed., Supp. III) (citations omitted). The DPPA permits DMVs to disclose personal information from motor vehicle records for a number of purposes.

The DPPA's provisions do not apply solely to States. The Act also regulates the resale and redisclosure of drivers' personal information by private persons who have obtained that information from a state DMV.

The DPPA establishes several penalties to be imposed on States and private actors that fail to comply with its requirements. The Act makes it unlawful for any "person" knowingly to obtain or disclose any record for a use that is not permitted under its provisions, or to make a false representation in order to obtain personal information from a motor vehicle record. §§ 2722(a) and (b). Any person who knowingly violates the DPPA may be subject to a criminal fine, §§ 2723(a), 2725(2). Additionally, any person who knowingly obtains, discloses, or uses information from a state motor vehicle record for a use other than those specifically permitted by the DPPA may be subject to liability in a civil action brought by the driver to whom the information pertains. § 2724. While the DPPA defines "person" to exclude States and state agencies, § 2725(2), a state agency that maintains a "policy or practice of substantial noncompliance" with the Act maybe subject to a civil penalty imposed by the United States Attorney General of not more than $ 5,000 per day of substantial noncompliance. § 2723(b).

South Carolina law conflicts with the DPPA's provisions. Under that law, the information contained in the State's DMV records is available to any person or entity that fills out a form listing the requester's name and address and stating that the information will not be used for telephone solicitation. S. C. Code Ann. §§ 56-3-510 to 56-3-540 (Supp. 1998). South Carolina's DMV retains a copy of all requests for information from the State's motor vehicle records, and it is required to release copies of all requests relating to a person upon that person's written petition. § 56-3-520. State law authorizes the South Carolina DMV to charge a fee for releasing motor vehicle information, and it requires the DMV to allow drivers to prohibit the use of their motor vehicle information for certain commercial activities. §§ 56-3-530, 56-3-540.

The United States asserts that the DPPA is a proper exercise of Congress' authority to regulate interstate commerce under the Commerce Clause, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3. 2 The United States bases its Commerce Clause argument on the fact that the personal, identifying information that the DPPA regulates is a "thing in interstate commerce," and that the sale or release of that information in interstate commerce is therefore a proper subject of congressional regulation. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 558-559 (1995). We agree with the United States' contention.

[Alternatively] South Carolina contends that the DPPA violates the Tenth Amendment because it "thrusts upon the States all of the day-to-day responsibility for administering its complex provisions," Brief for Respondents 10, and thereby makes "state officials the unwilling implementors of federal policy," id. at 11. South Carolina emphasizes that the DPPA requires the State's employees to learn and apply the Act's substantive restrictions, which are summarized above, and notes that these activities will consume the employees' time and thus the State's resources. South Carolina further notes that the DPPA's penalty provisions hang over the States as a potential punishment should they fail to comply with the Act.

We agree with South Carolina's assertion that the DPPA's provisions will require time and effort on the part of state employees, but reject the State's argument that the DPPA violates the principles laid down in either New York or Printz. We think, instead, that this case is governed by our decision in South Carolina v. Baker, 485 U.S. 505 (1988). In Baker, we upheld a statute that prohibited States from issuing unregistered bonds because the law "regulated state activities," rather than "seeking to control or influence the manner in which States regulate private parties." Id. at 514-515. We further noted: "The NGA [National Governor's Association] nonetheless contends that § 310 has commandeered the state legislative and administrative process because many state legislatures had to amend a substantial number of statutes in order to issue bonds in registered form and because state officials had to devote substantial effort to determine how best to implement a registered bond system. Such 'commandeering' is, however, an inevitable consequence of regulating a state activity. Any federal regulation demands compliance. That a State wishing to engage in certain activity must take administrative and sometimes legislative action to comply with federal standards regulating that activity is a commonplace that presents no constitutional defect." Ibid.

Like the statute at issue in Baker, the DPPA does not require the States in their sovereign capacity to regulate their own citizens. The DPPA regulates the States as the owners of databases. It does not require the South Carolina Legislature to enact any laws or regulations, and it does not require state officials to assist in the enforcement of federal statutes regulating private individuals.

In Murphy v. NCAA, 138 S. Ct. 1461 (2018), the Supreme Court struck down the entire Professional and Amateur Sports Protection Act (PASPA) as "commandeering" because part of the statute dictated what a state legislature may or may not do by prohibiting states from repealing their bans on sports gambling. Had Congress merely said that States or private parties must refrain from operating sports gambling schemes that would have been constitutional. However, such a statute might have imposed budgetary costs on the federal government to enforce such a ban, and PASPA was passed in part based on assurances it would impose "no cost" on the federal government. That may explain why Congress passed the statute they did. Three Justices argued that part of PASPA did directly regulate private individuals, and that part of the statute should have been allowed to stand. Id. at 1489 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., and in part by Breyer, J., dissenting).
§ 8.2 11th Amendment Limits on Federal Legislative Power

1. Historical Development of 11th Amendment Doctrine

A. The Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

On February 19, 1793, the Supreme Court held in Chisholm v. Georgia\(^{41}\) that federal jurisdiction extended to actions against a state by a citizen of another state, based upon the literal language of Article III, § 2, cl. 1 of the Constitution, which provides for jurisdiction in cases “between a State and Citizens of another State.” The concern that federal courts would have such jurisdiction, particularly in cases involving individuals suing states for debts owed to them by states, as for monies borrowed to help finance the Revolutionary War, had been raised during the ratifying debates at a number of state conventions. The concern was muted, to an extent, by Hamilton in The Federalist Papers, published initially during the New York ratifying convention, and by statements of Madison and Marshall at the Virginia ratifying convention, that background principles of state sovereignty would prevent such suits from being brought without the state’s consent in these class of cases. Cases involving state debts were a particularly sensitive issue, since a number of states, including New York, had traditions that the legislatures in those states determined whether debts were owed and should be paid, not courts.\(^ {42}\) The Chisholm Court chose to follow the literal text of Article III, concluding that state sovereignty was limited in the new Nation. Even the lone dissent by Justice Iredell did not rest on the state having a constitutional immunity from suit, but only on the ground that Congress had not yet clearly authorized such suits by statute.\(^ {43}\)

Opposition in a number of states to the Chisholm opinion led to quick introduction in Congress of a draft for the 11th Amendment. Congress formally took up the issue the following year and approved the 11th Amendment in January, 1794, with state ratification by more than 3/4 of the states by 1795, although President Adams did not issue a proclamation declaring the Amendment ratified until 1798.\(^ {44}\) The 11th Amendment provides: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State."

By its literal text, the 11th Amendment does not apply to actions in federal courts against a state by its own citizens. One reason for this may have been that, at the time, there was no federal question jurisdiction to hear cases in federal court. Thus, the main source of federal court jurisdiction, absent admiralty and maritime cases, involved diversity jurisdiction, which the literal text of the 11th Amendment addressed. Regarding such cases, the Court had to address whether the 11th Amendment applied only to cases where a state was a named party to the litigation, or did it also apply to actions against state officials acting on behalf of the state, and thus affecting the state. In Osborn v. Bank of the United States, the Court held in 1824 that the 11th Amendment by its terms only applies where the state is a named party. As Chief Justice Marshall noted in Osborn, unlike the language in the Constitution granting jurisdiction for cases “affecting Ambassadors [or] other public Ministers and Consuls,” the constitutional text to which the 11th Amendment responds refers only to those cases “in which a State shall be a Party,” suggesting its reach is only to cases where the state is a named party on the record, not where the state is merely “affected” by the litigation.

Because of the lack of federal question jurisdiction, the only cases where a state sovereignty issue would likely be raised before 1875, other than diversity jurisdiction, would be admiralty and maritime cases, cases where the United States was a party, state versus state cases, and the Court’s appellate jurisdiction over state cases involving federal issues. The 11th Amendment, by its literal terms and in court precedents, has never been interpreted to apply to actions by the United States against a state, or in state versus state lawsuits. Actions in admiralty or maritime jurisdiction, such as United States v. Peters, or actions as part of the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction, such as Osborn, noted above, were typically brought against state officials, not the state directly, and thus the 11th Amendment was held to provide no barrier to suit. Indeed, even where the state was a party on the record of the case, the Marshall Court held in Cohens v. Virginia that the 11th Amendment was no barrier to exercise of the Court’s appellate jurisdiction, since the 11th Amendment text only applies to cases “commenced or prosecuted” in the federal courts. Thus, it does not apply to cases initially tried in state courts that reach the Supreme Court through the Court’s appellate jurisdiction.

In addition, “because of the paucity of federal legislation prior to the Civil War, occasions for conflicts in the state courts between state and federal law were few.” Indeed, reflecting the uncontroversial nature of the 11th Amendment before the Civil War, the Constitution for the Confederate States of America, which adopted the United States Constitution with appropriate modifications, such as enshrining slavery, but having a reduced Commerce Clause, merely reproduced the 11th Amendment language without modification, despite the states’ rights bias of Southerners prior to the Civil War. In the few 11th Amendment cases after the Civil War, but before federal question jurisdiction became available in 1875, the Court followed the pre-Civil War precedents, which limited the 11th Amendment to diversity cases, and permitted cases against state officials, even where the state was the real party in interest.50

B. The Formalist Era: 1873-1937

Once federal question jurisdiction became available in 1875, as discussed at § 2.1.4 nn.12-14, the potential for a greater number of cases against states in federal court increased. In one set of cases, the formalist-era court limited the principle of Osborn by refusing to apply it, in cases such as Louisiana v. Jumel, Haygood v. Southern, and In re Ayers,51 to cases where a state official was the named party in the lawsuit, but the state was the real party to the contract. Over the dissent, among others, of Justice Harlan, who followed the traditional natural law decisionmaking style, the majority of the Court dismissed the lawsuits based on the 11th Amendment, admitting that the decisions were in conflict with Osborn. In 1890, in Hans v. Louisiana,52 the Court held that the 11th Amendment bars actions in federal courts against a state by its own citizens, despite the literal language of the 11th Amendment only focusing on diversity jurisdiction. The Court based its decision on its view that the specific intent of the framers and ratifiers of the 11th Amendment was to provide a wide range of state sovereign immunity.53 The Hans doctrine is also consistent with the conservative predisposition, discussed at § 8.1.1(E) n.30, shared by formalist-era Courts, in favor of states’ rights.

C. Modern 11th Amendment Doctrine: 1937-Present

Subsequent to Hans, the Supreme Court held that the principle of sovereign immunity applied to suits against states brought in federal courts by federal corporations, foreign nations, Indian tribes, or suits in admiralty.54 The Court also held that the 11th Amendment applies to actions involving states, even if a federal court might otherwise apply the doctrine of pendent jurisdiction.55 The 11th Amendment also applies to actions brought in administrative proceedings, as well as court cases.56

54 See id. at 728, and cases cited therein.

In addition, in Alden v. Maine, excerpted at § 8.3, the Court held that the principles of sovereign immunity which underlie the 11th Amendment require that states cannot be sued by individuals in state courts for violating federal law, as well as barring suits in federal courts.

2. Limits on 11th Amendment Immunity

One issue that has been much litigated is the question of what limits to place upon 11th Amendment immunity. In general, conservative formalists and conservative Holmesians, favoring states’ rights, have tended to read the 11th Amendment state sovereignty immunity principle broadly. Liberal Holmesians and liberal instrumentalists have tended to try to limit the 11th Amendment in order to provide broad federal protection of individual rights. The natural law approach responds to the two competing tensions: the structural “dual theory of sovereignty” supports a broader view of the 11th Amendment, while the actual text of the 11th Amendment supports a narrower view.

Certain principles are clear. By unequivocal expression or conduct, such as removing a case to federal court after the state has waived sovereign immunity in its own state courts, a state has waived 11th Amendment immunity and consented to be sued in federal court. Whether such removal waives aspects of state sovereign immunity if the state had not consented to be sued in its own state courts is not clear.\(^{57}\) Congress can make waiver of the immunity a condition of participating in a federal program or acting in any area that Congress can control. Additionally, an attorneys’ fee in a civil rights case is ancillary and not barred by the 11th Amendment.58 During the deference-to-government Holmesian era, in 1945, the Court held that states could litigate a case on the merits, and yet not waive the immunity defense, but hold it in reserve. That doctrine was rejected in the modern natural law era in Lapides v. Board of Regents of the University System of Georgia.59

\(^{57}\) See Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S. Ct. 1651 (2011) (state’s acceptance of federal funds did not waive state immunity when the federal statute only authorized “appropriate relief” against the states and this did not constitute unequivocal consent to be sued for money damages); Vas-Cath, Inc. v. Curators of the University of Missouri, 473 F.3d 1376 (Fed. Cir. 2007) (state university waived immunity by voluntarily participating in federal administrative forum); Lapides v. Benzing v. Texas, 410 F.3d 236 (5th Cir. 2005) (state always waives immunity from suit in federal courts when it removes a case to federal court, whether or not it consented to suit in state court, although state may still argue it did not waive immunity from liability for damages); Stewart v. North Carolina, 393 F.3d 484 (4th Cir. 2005) (sovereign immunity not waived when state removes suit to a federal court that it had not consented to in state court).

The modern Court has reaffirmed Chief Justice Marshall’s view that because the 11th Amendment refers to cases “commenced or prosecuted” in the federal courts, it does not apply to cases initially tried in state courts that reach the Supreme Court through the Court’s appellate jurisdiction.60 Regarding admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, while in theory the 11th Amendment can be invoked in such cases given Court precedents after Hans, the Court has limited this principle by holding, for example, that the 11th Amendment does not bar an in rem action for a wreckage, nor an in rem action where the state is not in possession of the property, since in those cases the action is not in personam against the state, but in rem for the property. Regular 11th Amendment principles apply for in personam admiralty actions.61 Based in part on bankruptcy proceedings typically being viewed as in rem actions for monies in the estate, 11th Amendment immunity was held in 2006 not to apply in bankruptcy proceedings, despite a plurality of the Court’s conclusion, in 1989, that the federal bankruptcy act does not clearly express an intent to abrogate 11th Amendment immunity.62

Based on its literal text, a formalist-era Court held in Lincoln County v. Luning63 that the 11th Amendment immunity, whatever its breadth, only applies to the state as such. It does not apply to counties, cities, or other municipalities within the state. While that doctrine has been reaffirmed many times, the Court has held in modern times, reflecting a non-formalist, practical approach, that where there is sufficient involvement of the state in local action, so that the relief would run in essence against the state, then 11th Amendment immunity applies.64

This aspect of 11th Amendment doctrine is in conflict with holdings under the 14th Amendment Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses, where “State” binds counties, cities, or municipalities under the view they are creatures of the state Constitutions. This doctrine has led to a confusing line of cases trying to determine if local agencies, boards, or officials are properly to be viewed as state actors, to which 11th Amendment immunity would apply, or county, city, municipality, or other kind of non-state actors, to which 11th Amendment immunity does not apply. In making these decisions, the Court asks, as in McMillian v. Monroe County,65 whether the particular individual is making a final policy decision on behalf of the local entity, or making a policy decision on behalf of the state.

In reaching this decision, state law is relevant, although the decision is ultimately one of federal law.

The decisions in these cases tend to be very fact specific, so that, for example, local sheriffs can be viewed as state policymakers in some states for some actions, as for enforcing state laws, but not in other states, or for other actions.66 State universities are usually held to be state actors,67 although there are cases based on state statutes granting the state university substantial independence from state control where the state university was held not entitled to 11th Amendment immunity.68 The Court has held that the St. Louis Board of Police Commissioners was not a state policy body, based on their independent decisionmaking, even though the state Governor appointed a majority of its members.69 The Court has noted that “the question of whether a money judgment against a state instrumentality or official would be enforceable against the State is of considerable importance to any evaluation of the relationship between the State and the entity or individual being sued.”70 But that is just one factor, with nature of state control over decisionmaking, the manner of appointment (state/local election or appointment), and how state law characterizes the position, also relevant.\footnote{See John R. Pagan, Eleventh Amendment Analysis, 39 Ark. L. Rev. 447, 461-62 (1986). See also Ali v. Carnegie Institute of Washington, 2017 WL 1349280 (Fed. Cir. 2017) (patent suit dismissed; one of two existing patent holders a professor at public University of Massachusetts, who is indispensable party having sovereign immunity, even though other professor at private Carnegie Institute); Pennsylvania Higher Educ. Assistance Agency v. Pele, 628 Fed. App’x 870 (4th Cir. 2017) (higher education student loan association is not an arm of the state for purposes of state immunity); United States v. University of Massachusetts, Worcester, 812 F.3d 35 (1st Cir. 2016) (student loan association is arm of the state); United States ex rel. Lesinski v. South Florida Water Management Dist., 739 F.3d 598 (11th Cir. 2014) (local water district is arm of the state); Lake v. Skelton, 840 F.3d 1334 (11th Cir. 2016) (2-1 panel held county sheriff is arm of the state in lawsuit over religious rights and dietary matters, since duty to feed inmates is “directly assigned by the state.”).}

67 See, e.g., Xechem International, Inc. v. University of Texas M.D. Anderson Cancer Center, 382 F.3d 1324 (Fed. Cir. 2004); Clay v. Texas Women’s Univ., 728 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1984); Shawer v. Indiana Univ. of Penn., 602 F.2d 1161 (3d Cir. 1979). So are State Bar Associations. See Hirsh v. Justices of the Supreme Court, 67 F.3d 708 (9th Cir. 2014) (State Bar of California arm of the state and thus entitled to state immunity when sued by disappointed Bar examination test-taker).

An important limit on the 11th Amendment is the principle of Osborn, stated in 1824, that state officials can be sued, even though states cannot. This principle, as limited in 1887 by In re Ayers, which held that 11th Amendment immunity exists if the state is the real party in interest, was restated by the post-Hans formalist-era Court in 1908 in Ex parte Young.\footnote{209 U.S. 123 (1908).} There, the Court held that federal courts may enjoin unconstitutional acts by state officials who are connected with enforcing a statute invalid on its face or as applied. The Court said local officials were "stripped" of their public character when so acting. Under Ex parte Young, state officials may be ordered to pay benefits that would have been denied by an invalid state law, and may be ordered to comply with a consent decree entered into by state officials, as held in Frew ex rel. Frew v. Hawkins.\footnote{540 U.S. 431, 437-42 (2004). The Court held in Virginia Office for Protection and Advocacy v. Stewart, 131 S. Ct. 1632, 1638 (2011), that the Ex parte Young exception applies not only when the state official is sued by a private citizen, but is sued by an independent state agency official. Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justice Alito dissented, stating, “This is a matter for the State to sort out, not a federal judge.” Id. at 1650-51 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Alito, J., dissenting).} However, Ex parte Young is limited by principles of executive official qualified immunity, discussed at § 10.4.3(A), and by Edelman v. Jordan,\footnote{415 U.S. 651 (1974).} where the Court held that, in an action against state officials, retroactive relief from state is not allowed, e.g., payment of state funds for past violations.

3. Congressional Power to Abrogate State Immunity

Another limit on the 11th Amendment was discussed in 1976 in Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer.\footnote{427 U.S. 445 (1976).} In Fitzpatrick, the Court held that by "unmistakably clear language" Congress may use its § 5 enforcement power in the 14th Amendment to provide for private remedies, including damage awards against a state that would otherwise be barred by Edelman v. Jordan, for persons injured by state violations of the 14th Amendment. This is so because the 14th Amendment, ratified after the 11th Amendment, was held to trump any 11th Amendment immunity. Because the intent must be “unmistakably clear,” the evidence must appear in the text of the statute, not legislative history.\(^{76}\) Applying this test of “unmistakably clear language,” the Court has held that 42 U.S.C. § 1983 does not manifest an intent to authorize retrospective relief.\(^{77}\)

In 1989, the Court extended Fitzpatrick's “clear language” exception to cases involving not merely congressional power to act under the 14th Amendment, but cases under the Constitution’s original Commerce Clause. In Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co.,\(^{78}\) the Court held 5-4 that Congress can create federal court actions against states for damages acting under the Commerce Clause. Reflecting an instrumentalist approach, Justice Brennan, with Justices Marshall, Blackmun and Stevens forming a plurality, wrote that Congress could authorize law suits in federal court against states on federal question grounds. Justice Brennan's reasoning was that when the states ratified the Constitution they consented to suits against them in federal courts based on congressionally created causes of action. The 11th Amendment did not deprive Congress of this power because it merely made clear that Article III itself did not automatically sweep away all aspects of state sovereign immunity. Justice Brennan said that Hans v. Louisiana was not to the contrary since Hans did not specifically deal with Congress' authority under either the 14th Amendment or the Commerce Clause. This result was supported by the fifth vote of liberal Holmesian Justice White, who wrote a concurring opinion which said he disagreed with much of Brennan's reasoning. Without providing his own reasoning, Justice White nonetheless joined in the result of the plurality opinion.\(^{79}\) This is consistent with the liberal Holmesian tendency, discussed at § 9.1.1 n.14, to defer to congressional exercises of power.

By 1996, instrumentalist Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun had left the Court, as had Justice White. The dissenters in Union Gas, joined by newly appointed formalist Justice Thomas, voted to overrule Union Gas in Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida,\(^{80}\) excerpted below. For the Court, Chief Justice Rehnquist said that none of the policies underlying stare decisis required continued adherence to Union Gas. It was always of questionable precedent value, largely because a majority had expressed disagreement with the rationale of the plurality. The result and rationale departed from established understanding of the 11th Amendment and undermined the accepted function of Article III, since never before had the Court suggested that the bounds of Article III could be expanded by Congress operating under any constitutional provision except the 14th Amendment. Justice Rehnquist also noted that the Governor of Florida could not be sued for prospective injunctive relief under the doctrine of Ex parte Young because Congress here had prescribed a detailed remedial scheme for enforcement of a statutorily created right. It would be inappropriate for the court to supplement that scheme with one created by the judiciary, citing Schweiker v. Chilicky.

Justice Stevens, dissenting, said the 11th Amendment applies only to suits premised on diversity jurisdiction. He read Hans to hold only that federal courts should decline to entertain suits against unconsenting states as a matter of federal common law. He was concerned that the majority's opinion would prevent Congress from providing a federal forum for a broad range of actions against states. Justice Souter, dissenting, with Justices Ginsburg and Breyer, also took issue with the holding in Hans that because a state could plead sovereign immunity against a noncitizen suing under federal question jurisdiction, a state must enjoy the same protection in a suit by one of its own citizens. Beyond that, he contended that Hans had misread statements in The Federalist Papers and, in any event, Hans did not consider whether Congress could abrogate the state's sovereign immunity by statute, since Hans involved a case concerning whether the state of Louisiana's action violated the Contract Clause. Justice Souter then explored historical materials to show that those framers who expected common-law immunity to survive ratification were focused on diversity jurisdiction, not immunity of a state against the general federal question jurisdiction of the national courts.

Since 1996, a majority of the Justices have adhered to Seminole Tribe. Indeed, the practical impact of Seminole Tribe has been extended by several cases that have limited Congress’ power to abrogate state sovereign immunity by use of Congress’ § 5 power to enforce the 14th Amendment. Under Boerne v. Flores, excerpted at § 7.4, Congress’ power under § 5 is limited to cases where the Court would find a violation of equal protection or due process. Isolated violations by a state of federal law passed pursuant to Article I, § 8 does not constitute such a violation; only where there is a “pattern or practice” of state violations is there a credible argument that the state is denying persons equal protection of the laws by their violations of federal laws. Thus, in many cases, states will have 11th Amendment immunity and cannot be sued by individuals for violations of federal law valid under Article I, § 8 and the 10th Amendment as interpreted in Garcia.

A number of 5-4 decisions have been reached with respect to federal statutes that purported to subject states, including state universities and university researchers, to federal court jurisdiction in damage actions for infringement of patents or trademarks, under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, or under the Americans with Disabilities Act. 85 In two recent cases, however, Congress’ power to abrogate state sovereign immunity under the 14th Amendment did prevail because a bare majority of the court found such a “pattern or practice” to exist. This occurred in Nevada Dep’t of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 86 a case dealing with the family leave provisions of the Family and Medical Leave Act, and in Tennessee v. Lane, 87 excerpted below, dealing with the American with Disabilities Act regulating access of disabled persons to state courthouses. Despite Hibbs, a 5-4 Court held in Coleman v. Court of Appeals of Maryland 88 that there was not a sufficient pattern of state discrimination under the self-care provision of the Family and Medical Leave Act, as opposed to the family leave provision in Hibbs, and thus Congress could not use its enforcement power to authorize money damage lawsuits against the states under the Act’s self-care provisions.

Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida

Chief Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Indian Gaming Regulatory Act provides that an Indian tribe may conduct certain gaming activities only in conformance with a valid compact between the tribe and the State in which the gaming activities are located. 102 Stat. 2475, 25 U.S.C. § 2710(d)(1)(c). The Act, passed by Congress under the Indian Commerce Clause, U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3, imposes upon the States a duty to negotiate in good faith with an Indian tribe toward the formation of a compact, § 2710(d)(3)(A), and authorizes a tribe to bring suit in federal court against a State in order to compel performance of that duty, § 2710(d)(7). We hold notwithstanding Congress’ clear intent to abrogate the States’ sovereign immunity, the Indian Commerce Clause does not grant Congress that power, and therefore § 2710(d)(7) cannot grant jurisdiction over a State that does not consent to be sued. We further hold that the doctrine of Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908), may not be used to enforce § 2710(d)(3) against a state official.

88 132 S. Ct. 1327 (2012); id. at 1339 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Breyer, J., and joined by Sotomayor & Kagan, JJ., except as to footnote 1, dissenting).
The Eleventh Amendment provides: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State."

Although the text of the Amendment would appear to restrict only the Article III diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts, "we have understood the Eleventh Amendment to stand not so much for what it says, but for the presupposition . . . which it confirms." Blatchford v. Native Village of Noatak, 501 U.S. 775, 779 (1991). That presupposition, first observed over a century ago in Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890), has two parts: first, that each State is a sovereign entity in our federal system; and second, that "it is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent," id., at 13 (emphasis deleted), quoting The Federalist No. 81, p. 487 C. Rossiter ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton). For over a century we have reaffirmed that federal jurisdiction over suits against unconsenting States was not contemplated by the Constitution when establishing the judicial power of the United States. Hans, [134 U.S. 1 (1890)], at 15.

In order to determine whether Congress has abrogated the States' sovereign immunity, we ask two questions: first, whether Congress has "unequivocally expressed its intent to abrogate the immunity," Green v. Mansour, 474 U.S. 64, 68 (1985); and second, whether Congress has acted "pursuant to a valid exercise of power," id. The Court then noted that "we agree with the parties, with the Eleventh Circuit in the decision below, 11 F.3d at 1024, and with virtually every other court that has confronted the question that Congress has in § 2710(d)(7) provided an "unmistakably clear" statement of its intent to abrogate" state sovereign immunity under this Act.

Our inquiry into whether Congress has the power to abrogate unilaterally the States' immunity from suit is narrowly focused on one question: Was the Act in question passed pursuant to a constitutional provision granting Congress the power to abrogate.pursuant to a constitutional provision granting Congress the power to abrogate? See, e.g., Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 452-456 (1976). Previously, in conducting that inquiry, we have found authority to abrogate under only two provisions of the Constitution. In Fitzpatrick, we recognized that the Fourteenth Amendment, by expanding federal power at the expense of state autonomy, had fundamentally altered the balance of state and federal power struck by the Constitution. Id., at 455. We noted that § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment contained prohibitions expressly directed at the States and that § 5 of the Amendment expressly provided that "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." See id., at 453 (internal quotation marks omitted). We held that through the Fourteenth Amendment, federal power extended to intrude upon the province of the Eleventh Amendment and therefore that § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment allowed Congress to abrogate the immunity from suit guaranteed by that Amendment.

In only one other case has congressional abrogation of the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity been upheld. In Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1 (1989), a plurality of the Court found that the Interstate Commerce Clause, Art. I, § 8, cl. 3, granted Congress the power to abrogate state sovereign immunity, stating that the power to regulate interstate commerce would be "incomplete without the authority to render States liable in damages." 491 U.S. at 19-20. Justice White added the fifth vote necessary to the result in that case, but wrote separately in order to express that he "[d] not agree with much of [the plurality's] reasoning." Id., at 57 (opinion concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part).

The Court in Union Gas reached a result without an expressed rationale agreed upon by a majority of the Court. We have already seen that Justice Brennan's opinion received the support of only three other Justices. See Union Gas, 491 U.S. at 5 (Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., joined Justice Brennan). Of the other five, Justice White, who provided the fifth vote for the result, wrote separately in order to indicate his disagreement with the plurality's rationale, id., at 57 (opinion concurring in judgment and dissenting in part), and four Justices joined together in a dissent that rejected the plurality's rationale, id., at 35-45 (Scalia, J., dissenting, joined by Rehnquist, C J., and O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ.). Since it was issued, Union Gas has created confusion among the lower courts that have sought to understand and apply the deeply fractured decision. See, e.g., Chavez v. Arte Publico Press, supra, at 543-545 ("Justice White's concurrence must be taken on its face to disavow" the plurality's theory); 11 F.3d at 10271 (Justice White's "vague concurrence renders the continuing validity of Union Gas in doubt").

The plurality's rationale also deviated sharply from our established federalism jurisprudence and essentially eviscerated our decision in Hans. See Union Gas, supra, at 36 ("If Hans means only that federal-question suits for money damages against the States cannot be brought in federal court unless Congress clearly says so, it means nothing at all") (Scalia, J., dissenting). It was well established in 1989 when Union Gas was decided that the Eleventh Amendment stood for the constitutional principle that state sovereign immunity limited the federal courts' jurisdiction under Article III. The text of the Amendment itself is clear enough on this point: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit . . . ." And our decisions since Hans had been equally clear that the Eleventh Amendment reflects "the fundamental principle of sovereign immunity [that] limits the grant of judicial authority in Art. III," Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 97-98 (1984); see Union Gas, supra, at 38, ("The entire judicial power granted by the Constitution does not embrace authority to entertain a suit brought by private parties against a State without consent given . . . ") (Scalia, J., dissenting) (quoting Ex parte New York, 256 U.S. 490, 497 (1921)).

In overruling Union Gas today, we reconfirm that the background principle of state sovereign immunity embodied in the Eleventh Amendment is not so ephemeral as to dissipate when the subject of the suit is an area, like the regulation of Indian commerce, that is under the exclusive control of the Federal Government. Even when the Constitution vests in Congress complete law-making authority over a particular area, the Eleventh Amendment prevents congressional authorization of suits by private parties against unconsenting States. The Eleventh Amendment restricts the judicial power under Article III, and Article I cannot be used to circumvent the constitutional limitations placed upon federal jurisdiction. Petitioner's suit against the State of Florida must be dismissed for a lack of jurisdiction.

Where Congress has created a remedial scheme for the enforcement of a particular federal right, we have, in suits against federal officers, refused to supplement that scheme with one created by the judiciary. Schweiker v. Chilicky, 487 U.S. 412, 423 (1988) ("When the design of a Government program suggests that Congress has provided what it considers adequate remedial mechanisms for constitutional violations that may occur in the course of its administration, we have not created additional . . . remedies"). Here, of course, the question is not whether a remedy should be created, but instead is whether the Eleventh Amendment bar should be lifted, as it was in Ex parte Young, in order to allow a suit against a state officer. Nevertheless, we think that the same general principle applies: Therefore where Congress has prescribed a detailed remedial scheme for the enforcement against a State of a statutorily created right, a court should hesitate before casting aside those limitations and permitting an action against a state officer based upon Ex parte Young.

Here, Congress intended § 2710(d)(3) to be enforced against the State in an action brought under § 2710(d)(7); the intricate procedures set forth in that provision show that Congress intended therein not only to define, but also to limit significantly, the duty imposed by § 2710(d)(3). For example, where the court finds that the State has failed to negotiate in good faith, the only remedy prescribed is an order directing the State and the Indian tribe to conclude a compact within 60 days. And if the parties disregard the court's order and fail to conclude a compact within the 60-day period, the only sanction is that each party then must submit a proposed compact to a mediator who selects the one which best embodies the terms of the Act. Finally, if the State fails to accept the compact selected by the mediator, the only sanction against it is that the mediator shall notify the Secretary of the Interior who then must prescribe regulations governing class III gaming on the tribal lands at issue. By contrast with this quite modest set of sanctions, an action brought against a state official under Ex parte Young would expose that official to the full remedial powers of a federal court, including, presumably, contempt sanctions. If § 2710(d)(3) could be enforced in a suit under Ex parte Young, § 2710(d)(7) would have been superfluous; it is difficult to see why an Indian tribe would suffer through the intricate scheme of § 2710(d)(7) when more complete and more immediate relief would be available under Ex parte Young.

2710(d)(7) stands in contrast to the statutes cited by the dissent as examples where lower courts have found that Congress implicitly authorized suit under Ex parte Young. Compare 28 U.S.C. § 2254(e) (federal court authorized to issue an "order directed to an appropriate State official"); 42 U.S.C. § 11001 (1988 ed.) (requiring "the Governor" of a State to perform certain actions and holding "the Governor" responsible for nonperformance); 33 U.S.C. § 1365(a) (authorizing a suit against "any person" who is alleged to be in violation of relevant water pollution laws). Similarly the duty imposed by the Act – to "negotiate . . . in good faith to enter into" a compact with another sovereign – stands distinct in that it is not of the sort likely to be performed by an individual state executive officer or even a group of officers. Cf. State ex rel. Stephan v. Finney, 836 P.2d 1169 (Kan. 1992) (Governor of Kansas may negotiate but may not enter into compact without grant of power from legislature).

The Eleventh Amendment prohibits Congress from making the State of Florida capable of being sued in federal court. The narrow exception to the Eleventh Amendment provided by the Ex parte Young doctrine cannot be used to enforce § 2710(d)(3) because Congress enacted a remedial scheme, § 2710(d)(7), specifically designed for the enforcement of that right. The Eleventh Circuit's dismissal of petitioner's suit is hereby affirmed.

This case is about power – the power of the Congress of the United States to create a private federal cause of action against a State, or its Governor, for the violation of a federal right. In Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793), the entire Court – including Justice Iredell whose dissent provided the blueprint for the Eleventh Amendment – assumed that Congress had such power. In Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890) – a case the Court purports to follow today – the Court again assumed that Congress had such power. In Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 (1976), and Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1, 24 (1989) (Stevens, J., concurring), the Court squarely held that Congress has such power. In a series of cases beginning with Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 238-239 (1985), the Court formulated a special "clear statement rule" to determine whether specific Acts of Congress contained an effective exercise of that power. Nevertheless, in a sharp break with the past, today the Court holds that with the narrow and illogical exception of statutes enacted pursuant to the Enforcement Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress has no such power.

The importance of the majority's decision to overrule the Court's holding in Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. cannot be overstated. The majority's opinion does not simply preclude Congress from establishing the rather curious statutory scheme under which Indian tribes may seek the aid of a federal court to secure a State's good-faith negotiations over gaming regulations. Rather, it prevents Congress from providing a federal forum for a broad range of actions against States, from those sounding in copyright and patent law, to those concerning bankruptcy, environmental law, and the regulation of our vast national economy.

There may be room for debate over whether, in light of the Eleventh Amendment, Congress has the power to ensure that such a cause of action may be enforced in federal court by a citizen of another State or a foreign citizen. There can be no serious debate, however, over whether Congress has the power to ensure that such a cause of action may be brought by a citizen of the State being sued. Congress' authority in that regard is clear.

For these reasons, as well as those set forth in Justice Souter's opinion, I respectfully dissent.

Justice SOUTER, with whom Justice GINSBURG and Justice BREYER join, dissenting.

In holding the State of Florida immune to suit under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, the Court today holds for the first time since the founding of the Republic that Congress has no authority to subject a State to the jurisdiction of a federal court at the behest of an individual asserting a federal right. Although the Court invokes the Eleventh Amendment as authority for this proposition, the only sense in which that amendment might be claimed as pertinent here was tolerantly phrased by Justice Stevens in his concurring opinion in Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1, 23 (1989). There, he explained how it has come about that we have two Eleventh Amendments, the one ratified in 1795, the other (so-called) invented by the Court nearly a century later in Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890). Justice Stevens saw in that second Eleventh Amendment no bar to the exercise of congressional authority under the Commerce Clause in providing for suits on a federal question by individuals against a State, and I can only say that after my own canvass of the matter I believe he was entirely correct in that view, for reasons given below. His position, of course, was also the holding in Union Gas, which the Court now overrules and repudiates.

It is useful to separate three questions: (1) whether the States enjoyed sovereign immunity if sued in their own courts in the period prior to ratification of the National Constitution; (2) if so, whether after ratification the States were entitled to claim some such immunity when sued in a federal court exercising jurisdiction either because the suit was between a State and a nonstate litigant who was not its citizen, or because the issue in the case raised a federal question; and (3) whether any state sovereign immunity recognized in federal court may be abrogated by Congress.

The answer to the first question is not clear, although some of the Framers assumed that States did enjoy immunity in their own courts. The second question was not debated at the time of ratification, except as to citizen-state diversity jurisdiction; there was no unanimity, but in due course the Court in Chisholm v. Georgia 2 U.S. 419 (1793), answered that a state defendant enjoyed no such immunity. As to federal-question jurisdiction, state sovereign immunity seems not to have been debated prior to ratification, the silence probably showing a general understanding at the time that the States would have no immunity in such cases.

The adoption of the Eleventh Amendment soon changed the result in Chisholm, not by mentioning sovereign immunity, but by eliminating citizen-state diversity jurisdiction over cases with state defendants. I will explain why the Eleventh Amendment did not affect federal-question jurisdiction, a notion that needs to be understood for the light it casts on the soundness of Hans's holding that States did enjoy sovereign immunity in federal-question suits. The Hans Court erroneously assumed that a State could plead sovereign immunity against a noncitizen suing under federal-question jurisdiction, and for that reason held that a State must enjoy the same protection in a suit by one of its citizens. The error of Hans's reasoning is underscored by its clear inconsistency with the Founders' hostility to the implicit reception of common-law doctrine as federal law, and with the Founders' conception of sovereign power as divided between the States and the National Government for the sake of very practical objectives.

The Court's answer today to the third question is likewise at odds with the Founders' view that common law, when it was received into the new American legal system, was always subject to legislative amendment. In ignoring the reasons for this pervasive understanding at the time of the ratification, and in holding that a nontextual common-law rule limits a clear grant of congressional power under Article I, the Court follows a course that has brought it to grief before in our history, and promises to do so again.

Beyond this third question that elicits today's holding, there is one further issue. To reach the Court's result, it must not only hold the Hans doctrine to be outside the reach of Congress, but must also displace the doctrine of Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908), that an officer of the Government may be ordered prospectively to follow federal law, in cases in which the Government may not itself be sued directly. None of its reasons for displacing Young's jurisdictional doctrine withstand scrutiny.
Ex parte Young restored the old simplicity by complementing In re Ayers with the principle that state officers never have authority to violate the Constitution or federal law, so that any illegal action is stripped of state character and rendered an illegal individual act. Suits against these officials are consequently barred by neither the Eleventh Amendment nor Hans immunity. The officer's action "is simply an illegal act upon the part of a state official in attempting by the use of the name of the State to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional . . . . The State has no power to impart to him any immunity from responsibility to the supreme authority of the United States." Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. at 159-160.

The decision in Ex parte Young, and the historic doctrine it embodies, thus plays a foundational role in American constitutionalism, and while the doctrine is sometimes called a "fiction," the long history of its felt necessity shows it to be something much more estimable, as we may see by considering the facts of the case. "Young was really and truly about to damage the interest of plaintiffs. Whether what he was about to do amounted to a legal injury depended on the authority of his employer, the state. If the state could constitutionally authorize the act then the loss suffered by plaintiffs was not a wrong for which the law provided a remedy . . . . If the state could not constitutionally authorize the act then Young was not acting by its authority." Orth, Judicial Power of the United States, at 133. The doctrine we call Ex parte Young is nothing short of "indispensable to the establishment of constitutional government and the rule of law." C. Wright, Law of Federal Courts 292 (4th ed. 1983). See also Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction, at 393.

Tennessee v. Lane

Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA or Act), 104 Stat. 337, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12131-12165, provides that "no qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination by any such entity." § 12132. The question presented in this case is whether Title II exceeds Congress' power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In August 1998, respondents George Lane and Beverly Jones filed this action against the State of Tennessee and a number of Tennessee counties, alleging past and ongoing violations of Title II. Respondents, both of whom are paraplegics who use wheelchairs for mobility, claimed that they were denied access to, and the services of, the state court system by reason of their disabilities. Lane alleged that he was compelled to appear to answer a set of criminal charges on the second floor of a county courthouse that had no elevator. At his first appearance, Lane crawled up two flights of stairs to get to the courtroom. When Lane returned to the courthouse for a hearing, he refused to crawl again or to be carried by officers to the courtroom; he consequently was arrested and jailed for failure to appear. Jones, a certified court reporter, alleged that she has not been able to gain access to a number of county courthouses, and, as a result, has lost both work and an opportunity to participate in the judicial process. Respondents sought damages and equitable relief.

It is not difficult to perceive the harm that Title II is designed to address. Congress enacted Title II against a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights. For example, “[a]s of 1979, most States . . . categorically disqualified ‘idiots' from voting, without regard to individual capacity.” [FN5 Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 464, and n.14 (1985) (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part) (citing Note, Mental Disability and the Right to Vote, 88 Yale L.J. 1644 (1979)).] The majority of these laws remain on the books, and have been the subject of legal challenge as recently as 2001. Similarly, a number of States have prohibited and continue to prohibit persons with disabilities from engaging in activities such as marrying and serving as jurors. [Citations omitted] The historical experience that Title II reflects is also documented in this Court's cases, which have identified unconstitutional treatment of disabled persons by state agencies in a variety of settings, including unjustified commitment, e.g., Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972); the abuse and neglect of persons committed to state mental health hospitals, Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982); and irrational discrimination in zoning decisions, Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432 (1985). The decisions of other courts, too, document a pattern of unequal treatment in the administration of a wide range of public services, programs, and activities, including the penal system, public education, and voting. [Citations omitted].

With respect to the particular services at issue in this case, Congress learned that many individuals, in many States across the country, were being excluded from courthouses and court proceedings by reason of their disabilities. A report before Congress showed that some 76% of public services and programs housed in state-owned buildings were inaccessible to and unusable by persons with disabilities, even taking into account the possibility that the services and programs might be restructured or relocated to other parts of the buildings. U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Accommodating the Spectrum of Individual Abilities 39 (1983). Congress itself heard testimony from persons with disabilities who described the physical inaccessibility of local courthouses. Oversight Hearing on H.R. 4498 before the House Subcommittee on Select Education of the Committee on Education and Labor, 100th Cong., 2d Sess., 40-41, 48 (1988). And its appointed task force heard numerous examples of the exclusion of persons with disabilities from state judicial services and programs, including exclusion of persons with visual impairments and hearing impairments from jury service, failure of state and local governments to provide interpretive services for the hearing impaired, failure to permit the testimony of adults with developmental disabilities in abuse cases, and failure to make courtrooms accessible to witnesses with physical disabilities. Government's Lodging in Garrett, O.T.2000, No. 99-1240. See also Task Force on the Rights and Empowerment of Americans with Disabilities, From ADA to Empowerment (Oct. 12, 1990).

The conclusion that Congress drew from this body of evidence is set forth in the text of the ADA itself: “[D]iscrimination against individuals with disabilities persists in such critical areas as . . . education, transportation, communication, recreation, institutionalization, health services, voting, and access to public services.” 42 U.S.C. § 12101(a)(3) (emphasis added). This finding, together with the extensive record of disability discrimination that underlies it, makes clear beyond peradventure that inadequate provision of public services and access to public facilities was an appropriate subject for prophylactic legislation.

Chief Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice KENNEDY and Justice THOMAS join, dissenting.

With respect to the due process “access to the courts” rights on which the Court ultimately relies, Congress' failure to identify a pattern of actual constitutional violations by the States is even more striking. Indeed, there is nothing in the legislative record or statutory findings to indicate that disabled persons were systematically denied the right to be present at criminal trials, denied the meaningful opportunity to be heard in civil cases, unconstitutionally excluded from jury service, or denied the right to attend criminal trial. [FN4 Certainly, respondents Lane and Jones were not denied these constitutional rights. The majority admits that Lane was able to attend the initial hearing of his criminal trial. Lane was arrested for failing to appear at his second hearing only after he refused assistance from officers dispatched by the court to help him to the courtroom. The court conducted a preliminary hearing in the first-floor library to accommodate Lane's disability, App. to Pet. for Cert. 16, and later offered to move all further proceedings in the case to a handicapped-accessible courthouse in a nearby town. In light of these facts, it can hardly be said that the State violated Lane's right to be present at his trial; indeed, it made affirmative attempts to secure that right.]

Lacking any real evidence that Congress was responding to actual due process violations, the majority relies primarily on three items to justify its decision: (1) a 1983 U.S. Civil Rights Commission Report showing that 76% of “public services and programs housed in state-owned buildings were inaccessible” to persons with disabilities; (2) testimony before a House subcommittee regarding the “physical inaccessibility” of local courthouses; and (3) evidence submitted to Congress' designated ADA task force that purportedly contains “numerous examples of the exclusion of persons with disabilities from state judicial services and programs.”

On closer examination, however, the Civil Rights Commission's finding consists of a single conclusory sentence in its report, and it is far from clear that its finding even includes courthouses. The House subcommittee report, for its part, contains the testimony of two witnesses, neither of whom reported being denied the right to be present at constitutionally protected court proceedings. Indeed, the witnesses' testimony, like the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Report, concerns only physical barriers to access, and does not address whether States either provided means to overcome those barriers or alternative locations for proceedings involving disabled persons. Cf. [FN4], supra (describing alternative means of access offered to respondent Lane).

Based on the majority's description, the report of the ADA Task Force on the Rights and Empowerment of Americans with Disabilities sounds promising. But the report itself says nothing about any disabled person being denied access to court. The Court thus apparently relies solely on a general citation to the Government's Lodging in Garrett, O.T.2000, No. 99-1240, which, amidst thousands of pages, contains only a few anecdotal handwritten reports of physically inaccessible courthouses, again with no mention of whether States provided alternative means of access. This evidence, moreover, was submitted not to Congress, but only to the task force, which itself made no findings regarding disabled persons' access to judicial proceedings. Cf. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 370-371 (rejecting anecdotal task force evidence for similar reasons). As we noted in Garrett, “had Congress truly understood this [task force] information as reflecting a pattern of unconstitutional behavior by the States, one would expect some mention of that conclusion in the Act’s legislative findings.” Id., at 371. Yet neither the legislative findings, nor even the Committee Reports, contain a single mention of the seemingly vital topic of access to the courts.

I would replace “congruence and proportionality” with another test – one that provides a clear, enforceable limitation supported by the text of § 5. Section 5 grants Congress the power “to enforce, by appropriate legislation,” the other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. U.S. Const., Amdt. 14 (emphasis added). Morgan notwithstanding, one does not, within any normal meaning of the term, “enforce” a prohibition by issuing a still broader prohibition directed to the same end. One does not, for example, “enforce” a 55-mile-per-hour speed limit by imposing a 45-mile-per-hour speed limit – even though that is indeed directed to the same end of automotive safety and will undoubtedly result in many fewer violations of the 55-mile-per-hour limit. And one does not “enforce” the right of access to the courts at issue in this case, see ante, at 1993, by requiring that disabled persons be provided access to all of the “services, programs, or activities” furnished or conducted by the State, 42 U.S.C. § 12132. That is simply not what the power to enforce means – or ever meant. The 1860 edition of Noah Webster’s American Dictionary of the English Language, current when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, defined “enforce” as: “To put in execution; to cause to take effect; as, to enforce the laws.” Id., at 396. See also J. Worcester, Dictionary of the English Language 484 (1860) (“To put in force; to cause to be applied or executed; as, ‘To enforce a law’”). Nothing in § 5 allows Congress to go beyond the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to proscribe, prevent, or “remedy” conduct that does not itself violate any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment. So-called “prophylactic legislation” is reinforcement rather than enforcement.

The major impediment to the approach I have suggested is stare decisis. A lot of water has gone under the bridge since Morgan, and many important and well-accepted measures, such as the Voting Rights Act, assume the validity of Morgan.

Thus, principally for reasons of stare decisis, I shall henceforth apply the permissive McCulloch standard to congressional measures designed to remedy racial discrimination by the States. I would not, however, abandon the requirement that Congress may impose prophylactic § 5 legislation only upon those particular States in which there has been an identified history of relevant constitutional violations. See Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 741-743 (Scalia, J., dissenting); Morrison, 529 U.S., at 626-627; Morgan, 384 U.S., at 666-667, 669, 670-671 (Harlan, J., dissenting). I would also adhere to the requirement that the prophylactic remedy predicated upon such state violations must be directed against the States or state actors rather than the public at large. See Morrison, supra, at 625-626. And I would not, of course, permit any congressional measures that violate other provisions of the Constitution.
§ 8.3 Additional State Sovereignty Limits: The Case of Alden v. Maine

In 1999, the Court held in Alden v. Maine that states have immunity from being sued not only in federal court, but also in state court, with respect to suits by individuals against the state, unless some valid waiver of immunity is obtained.

Alden v. Maine

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Ed.: Petitioners, a group of probation officers, filed suit against their employer, the State of Maine, alleging the State had violated the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (FLSA), the same statute at issue in Garcia, excerpted at § 8.1.1(D), seeking compensation and liquidated damages. The state trial court dismissed the suit on the basis of sovereign immunity, and the Maine Supreme Judicial Court affirmed. 715 A.2d 172 (1998).]

We hold that the powers delegated to Congress under Article I of the United States Constitution do not include the power to subject nonconsenting States to private suits for damages in state courts. We decide as well that the State of Maine has not consented to suits for overtime pay and liquidated damages under the FLSA. On these premises we affirm the judgment sustaining dismissal of the suit.

The Eleventh Amendment makes explicit reference to the States' immunity from suits “commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.” U.S. Const., Amdt. 11. We have, as a result, sometimes referred to the States' immunity from suit as “Eleventh Amendment immunity.” The phrase is convenient shorthand but something of a misnomer, for the sovereign immunity of the States neither derives from, nor is limited by, the terms of the Eleventh Amendment. Rather, as the Constitution's structure, its history, and the authoritative interpretations by this Court make clear, the States' immunity from suit is a fundamental aspect of the sovereignty which the States enjoyed before the ratification of the Constitution, and which they retain today (either literally or by virtue of their admission into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States) except as altered by the plan of the Convention or certain constitutional Amendments.

The generation that designed and adopted our federal system considered immunity from private suits central to sovereign dignity. When the Constitution was ratified, it was well established in English law that the Crown could not be sued without consent in its own courts. See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, 437-446 (1793 (Iredell, J., dissenting) (surveying English practice); cf. Nevada v. Hall, 440 U.S. 410, 414 (1979) (“The immunity of a truly independent sovereign from suit in its own courts has been enjoyed as a matter of absolute right for centuries. Only the sovereign's own consent could qualify the absolute character of that immunity”). In reciting the prerogatives of the Crown, Blackstone – whose works constituted the preeminent authority on English law for the founding generation – underscored the close and necessary relationship understood to exist between sovereignty and immunity from suit. “And, first, the law ascribes to the king the attribute of sovereignty, or pre-eminence. . . . Hence it is, that no suit or action can be brought against the king, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him. For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power . . . .” 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 234-235 (1765).

The leading advocates of the Constitution assured the people in no uncertain terms that the Constitution would not strip the States of sovereign immunity. One assurance was contained in The Federalist No. 81, written by Alexander Hamilton: “It is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent. This is the general sense and the general practice of mankind; and the exemption, as one of the attributes of sovereignty, is now enjoyed by the government of every State in the Union. Unless, therefore, there is a surrender of this immunity in the plan of the convention, it will remain with the States and the danger intimated must be merely ideal. . . . [T]here is no color to pretend that the State governments would, by the adoption of that plan, be divested of the privilege of paying their own debts in their own way, free from every constraint but that which flows from the obligations of good faith. The contracts between a nation and individuals are only binding on the conscience of the sovereign, and have no pretensions to a compulsive force. They confer no right of action independent of the sovereign will.”

At the Virginia ratifying convention, James Madison echoed this theme: “Its jurisdiction in controversies between a state and citizens of another state is much objected to, and perhaps without reason. It is not in the power of individuals to call any state into court. . . . It appears to me that this [clause] can have no operation but this – to give a citizen a right to be heard in the federal courts; and if a state should condescend to be a party, this court may take cognizance of it.” 3 Debates on the Federal Constitution 533 (J. Elliot 2d ed. 1854) (hereinafter Elliot's Debates).

When Madison's explanation was questioned, John Marshall provided immediate support: “With respect to disputes between a state and citizens of another state, its jurisdiction has been decried with unusual vehemence. I hope no gentleman will think that a state will be called at the bar of the federal court. . . . It is not rational to suppose that the sovereign power should be dragged before a court. The intent is, to enable states to recover claims of individuals residing in other states.”

Despite the persuasive assurances of the Constitution's leading advocates and the expressed understanding of the only state conventions to address the issue in explicit terms, this Court held, just five years after the Constitution was adopted, that Article III authorized a private citizen of another State to sue the State of Georgia without its consent. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 [U.S. (2 Dall.)] 419 (1793). Given the outraged reaction to Chisholm, as well as Congress' repeated refusal to otherwise qualify the text of the Amendment, it is doubtful that if Congress meant to write a new immunity into the Constitution it would have limited that immunity to the narrow text of the Eleventh Amendment . . . .

The more natural inference is that the Constitution was understood, in light of its history and structure, to preserve the States' traditional immunity from private suits. As the Amendment clarified the only provisions of the Constitution that anyone had suggested might support a contrary understanding, there was no reason to draft with a broader brush.

The Court's principal rationale for today's result . . . turns on history: was the . . . conception of sovereign immunity as inherent in any notion of an independent State widely held in the United States in the period preceding the ratification of 1788 (or the adoption of the Tenth Amendment in 1791)?

The answer is certainly no. There is almost no evidence that the generation of the Framers thought sovereign immunity was fundamental in the sense of being unalterable. Whether one looks at the period before the framing, to the ratification controversies, or to the early republican era, the evidence is the same. Some Framers thought sovereign immunity was an obsolete royal prerogative inapplicable in a republic; some thought sovereign immunity was a common law power defeasible, like other common law rights, by statute; and perhaps a few thought, in keeping with a natural law view distinct from the common law conception, that immunity was inherent in a sovereign because the body that made a law could not logically be bound by it.

At the Constitutional Convention, the notion of sovereign immunity, whether as natural law or as common law, was not an immediate subject of debate, and the sovereignty of a State in its own courts seems not to have been mentioned. This comes as no surprise, for although the Constitution required state courts to apply federal law, the Framers did not consider the possibility that federal law might bind States, say, in their relations with their employees. In the subsequent ratification debates, however, the issue of jurisdiction over a State did emerge in the question whether States might be sued on their debts in federal court, and on this point, too, a variety of views emerged and the diversity of sovereign immunity conceptions displayed itself.

The only arguable support for the Court's absolutist view that I have found among the leading participants in the debate surrounding ratification was the one already mentioned, that of Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist No. 81 [quoted by the majority]. Hamilton chose his words carefully, and he acknowledged the possibility that at the Convention the States might have surrendered sovereign immunity in some circumstances . . . . [Ed.: hence the concern over the debt cases.]

At the furthest extreme from Hamilton, James Wilson made several comments in the Pennsylvania Convention that suggested his hostility to any idea of state sovereign immunity. . . . “Upon what principle is it contended that the sovereign power resides in the state governments? The honorable gentleman has said truly, that there can be no subordinate sovereignty. Now, if there cannot, my position is, that the sovereignty resides in the people; they have not parted with it; they have only dispensed such portions of the power as were conceived necessary for the public welfare.” [Chisholm, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.)] at 443. While this statement did not specifically address sovereign immunity, it expressed the major premise of what would later become Justice Wilson's position in Chisholm: that because the people, and not the States, are sovereign, sovereign immunity has no applicability to the States.
Practically speaking, of course, the broad state immunity granted under current doctrine is still limited by the fact that the federal government can always sue states to enforce compliance with federal law; individuals can often sue under Ex parte Young for injunction relief; the federal government can create incentives for state compliance under its Spending Clause power; and states can choose voluntarily to comply with federal law, as did Maine after Alden v. Maine, where Maine began to pay its workers consistent with federal minimum wage and overtime laws, despite the lawsuit seeking damages for prior violations being dismissed on state sovereign immunity grounds.\(^{89}\)

For discussion of the historical background surrounding the 11th Amendment and state sovereign immunity doctrine, see Charles D. Kelso & R. Randall Kelso, The Path of Constitutional Law Ch. §§ 12.3.3 nn.129-43 & 17.2.4.3 (2007) (http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsomaterials) (noting that while 17th century theories of Hobbes & Locke, with only two branches of government, the legislative and executive, with courts under the executive branch, support strong sovereign immunity for the King, as reflected in Blackstone, 18th century theory of Montesquieu, with a tripartite system of legislative, executive, and independent judicial branches, and full statements and actions in context of Hamilton, Madison, and Marshall, support Justice Souter’s view in Alden v. Maine).

§ 8.4 Additional Textual Limits on Federal Power

Article I, § 9 of the Constitutions contains eight clauses providing for specific textual limitations on federal power. These clauses tend to be clear in their meaning, and thus have not provided the source for many constitutional cases. These eight provisions provide:

1. No prohibiting international slave trade prior to 1808, discussed at § 16.4.2 nn.47-49;
2. Writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it, addressed at §§ 12.4.1 nn.38-42, 12.4.2 nn.44-52 & 12.4.3 nn.65-67;
3. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed, addressed at § 16.2.2 & 16.2.3;
4. No capitation, or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to census or enumeration, amended by the 16th Amendment, addressed at § 7.1.1 n.6;
5. No tax or duty, shall be laid on articles exported from any state;
6. No preference shall be given to any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over another, nor shall vessels bound from one state have to pay duties to enter or leave any port of another;
7. No money shall be drawn from the treasury except by appropriation made by law, and a regular accounting shall be published of all money spent from time to time, although who would have standing to bring such a case is unclear; and
8. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding office may accept any present, gift, or title from any King, Prince, or foreign state without approval of Congress.

PART III: FEDERAL EXECUTIVE VERSUS LEGISLATIVE POWER

CHAPTER 9: OVERVIEW OF EXECUTIVE VERSUS LEGISLATIVE POWER

§ 9.1 Introduction to Executive versus Legislative Power ........................................... 395

§ 9.2 Legislative Delegation of Power to the Executive Branch ............................... 415

§ 9.3 Legislative Attempts to Control Delegated Power ........................................... 422

§ 9.4 Legislative Attempts to Enhance Executive Power .......................................... 432

§ 9.1 Introduction to Executive versus Legislative Power

1. General Principles Regarding the Separation of Powers

The separation of powers doctrine combines two ideas. The first is that the Constitution identifies three distinct governmental functions: the legislative power, a power to make law; the executive power, a power to apply law or call for its application, subject to judicial review; and the judicial power, a power to declare authoritatively what the law is and to approve its application in specific cases. The second idea is that no one branch of government can exercise the central power of any other branch or substantially disrupt the operations of that branch. Thus, Congress may not impose core executive or administrative duties, that is, duties of a non-judicial nature, on judges holding office under Article III.1 Similarly, Congress cannot delegate to executive or judicial officers the legislative power to make rules without also creating standards by which the power is to be used.2

Lying behind the separation of powers doctrine is the notion of checks and balances. Checks and balances doctrine has two main principles. First, each branch must be given sufficient power to discharge its operations efficiently. Second, to prevent tyranny by any one branch, no branch should have unlimited power. James Madison wrote in The Federalist Papers No. 51, “In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.”3

Designed in part to promote the goal of efficiency, the separation of powers doctrine does not prohibit one branch from ever exercising a power of the other branches. Indeed, the Constitution expressly authorizes certain blends. For example, Congress exercises a kind of judicial power when it engages in impeachment proceedings. The President exercises a kind of legislative power when vetoing a bill, and a kind of judicial power when granting a pardon. Courts exercised executive powers when, pursuant to the Appointments Clause, they appointed independent counsels under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as addressed in Morrison v. Olson, excerpted at § 10.1. Justice Powell, concurring in INS v. Chadha, and quoting from Justice Jackson, said that the Constitution contemplates that "practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government."

In one of the most notable statements on the separation of powers, Justice Story said in 1833 in his book Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States: “[The separation of powers doctrine] is not meant to affirm, that [the three branches of government] must be kept wholly separate and distinct, and have no common link or connection or dependence, the one upon the other, in the slightest degree. The true meaning is, that the whole power of one of these departments should not be exercised by the same hands, which possess the whole power of either of the other departments. . . . [A]s a corollary, that, in reference to each other, neither of them ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence in the administration of their respective powers."5

Modern natural law Justices agree that the framers and ratifiers were motivated by such a sharing of powers view of government. At the same time, where the Constitution provides for an allocation of power, that text should be followed. Reflecting these principles, Justice Kennedy cautioned in Public Citizen v. United States Dep’t of Justice, “This is not to say that each of the three Branches must be entirely separate and distinct, for that is not the governmental structure of checks and balances established by the Framers. . . . But as to the particular divisions of power lines the Constitution does in fact draw, we are without authority to alter them, and indeed we are empowered to act in particular cases to prevent any other Branch from undertaking to alter them.”6

Instrumentalists share this view. However, consistent with their interpretive method, they will place greater weight on arguments of purpose and structure, and less weight on text, than do natural law judges. Instrumentalist judges thus tend to focus on whether the purposes lying behind the structural separation of powers doctrine would be advanced or retarded, especially the need to preserve checks and balances and prevent the tyranny of any one branch. But they are sensitive to text when the text is clear. Thus, instrumentalist Justices Marshall and Stevens joined other members of the Court in Bowsher v. Synar,7 discussed at § 10.2.1(A) nn.20-21, to hold that Congress may not delegate power to formulate national policy to one of its two Houses, to a legislative committee, or to an individual agent of Congress, such as the Comptroller General, in violation of the Bicameralism Clause’s text.

Holmesian judges share the view that separation of powers doctrine should be based on a sharing of powers approach, and a balance between text and purpose. Indeed, because of their strong policy of deference to government, Holmesian judges are the most likely to defer to arrangements agreed-upon by the other branches, unless those arrangements clearly violate the Constitution. For example, in INS v. Chadha, excerpted at § 9.3, Holmesian Justice White dissented from the Court’s striking down legislative vetoes of executive actions. In Bowsher v. Synar, discussed at § 10.2.1(A) n.22, Justice White dissented from the Court’s striking down provisions allowing the Comptroller General to determine what budget reductions were necessary to comply with the Gramm-Rudman budget bill. In Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, discussed at § 10.3 nn.42-43, Justice White, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and instrumentalist Justice Marshall, dissented from the Court’s decision to hold invalid a Board of Review composed of members of Congress.8

At the other extreme from these views, the formalist preference for literal interpretation and bright-line rules suggests a strict separation of powers approach, without any balancing. Under such a view, there should be strict separation of powers based on the literal text of the Constitution, which provides in Article I, § 1, “all legislative Powers herein granted” are vested in Congress; in Article II, § 1, “the executive Power” is vested in the President; and in Article III, § 1, the “judicial power” is vested in “the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress, from time to time, may establish.” Applied to issues of executive power, this view has been described as promoting a “Unitary Executive” model of government, with few checks and balances on executive action,9 although that view can be challenged on structural, historical, practice, and precedent grounds.10 Justice Scalia called for a strict separation of powers approach in a number of cases.11

9 See, e.g., Steven G. Calabresi & Saikrishna B. Prakash, The President’s Power to Execute the Laws, 104 Yale L.J. 541 (1994).

An additional separation of powers issue involves whether the judge is more sympathetic to exercises of legislative or executive power in cases where the two come into conflict. From the time of the Constitution until today, the Federalist/Whig/Republican party has always been more sympathetic to exercises of executive power, while the Jefferson/Jackson/Democratic party has always been more suspicious of executive power and more trusting of the legislative branch. Thus, judges appointed by Republican presidents tend to favor broad grants of executive power to the president. Judges appointed by Democratic presidents tend to restrain executive power in favor of legislative prerogatives. Some conservative Democratic judges, however, like Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Reed during the 1950s, have tended to share the Republican predisposition for executive power, as indicted by their dissent in Youngstown Sheet, excerpted at § 9.1.2 below.

The reasons for these predispositions are not altogether clear. It may be that more conservative individuals, typically Republican, are more comfortable with a “corporate” model of administration, with a strong CEO, and clearly-defined lines of authority, while more progressive individuals, with their faith in the “people,” prefer the most representative branch of government, the legislature. Certainly at the time of the founding, it was Jefferson and his associates who favored the legislative branch, and were more supportive of the strong notions of legislative supremacy consistent with the French Revolution, while conservatives, like Hamilton, favored stronger executive power closer to that of the English King, although without the King’s power to declare war.12

2. Presidential Power over National Policy

Under Article II, § 1, “The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years.” Under Article II, § 1, cl. 5, “No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.” The Constitution also refers to other aspects regarding the election of Presidents, particularly right to vote for President and operation of the electoral college.

After vesting “executive Power” in the President in Article II, § 1, Article II continues by enumerating a number of specific presidential powers. Under Article II, § 2, cl. 1, the President is named “Commander in Chief,” and is given the power to “Pardon” individuals for federal crimes. For discussion of this pardon power, see Charles D. KELSO & R. RANDALL KELSO, THE PATH OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 19.3.5 (2007) (noting the power to pardon for federal crimes is textually unlimited, but acknowledging the widespread view that the President cannot pardon himself)

Under Art. II, § 1, cl. 7, the President shall receive a fixed compensation for his services, currently $400,000 a year, and shall not receive “any other Emolument” from the United States or from any individual State. Under Art. I, § 9, cl. 8, “no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of Congress, accept any present, Emolument, Office or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.” For discussion of the Emoluments Clauses in the context of litigation against President Trump for payments to Trump International Hotel in Washington D.C., see District of Columbia v. Trump, 315 F. Supp. 875 (D. Maryland 2018) (comprehensive, well-reasoned opinion).

Under Art. II, § 2, cl. 2, the President is given the power, with the “Advice and Consent” of the Senate, to appoint “Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States.” The President is also given power to “make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur,” and the power to “receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers” from foreign countries. Under Article II, § 3, the President has the duty to “take Care that the Laws shall be faithfully executed,” and the President “shall from time to time give to the Congress Information on the State of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.” Under Article I, § 7, cl. 2, after a bill is passed by both houses of Congress, it must be “presented to the President,” who may sign the bill or veto it, such veto capable of being overridden by a 2/3 majority in each House.

Unlike Article I, § 8, which lists Congress’s powers in some detail, Article II’s listing of powers, such as the “executive Power shall be vested in a President” or “Commander-in-Chief” power, are stated in broader terms. This has led to a number of cases where considerations other than literal text have predominated in the Court’s opinions. Perhaps the most famous of these cases is Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, excerpted below, decided in 1952. In Youngstown Sheet, while Justice Black’s opinion did suggest the President’s powers are limited to the formal, textually enumerated powers, no other Justice agreed that the President's power was that limited. Based upon legislative and executive practice, and Court precedents, Holmesian Justice Jackson's analysis in the case suggested that Presidential power is dependent upon a functional analysis. Jackson noted:

(1) The President has maximum power when acting pursuant to an express or implied congressional authorization.

(2) A “zone of twilight” occurs if the President acts when Congress is silent. In this area, "any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law." Justice Clark added that the nature of the power probably depended on the gravity of the situation.

(3) The President has least power when acting contrary to the expressed or implied will of Congress. Courts can then sustain the President's action only by finding that Congress' will was expressed in an unconstitutional manner or it has no power over the subject.

14 Id. at 635-38 (Jackson, J., concurring); id. at 662 (Clark, J., concurring in the judgment).
Also focusing on arguments of legislative and executive practice, Holmesian Justice Frankfurter noted in his concurrence that even if Congress has been silent, “A systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued by the knowledge of Congress, and never before questioned, engaged in by Presidents who have also sworn to uphold the Constitution, making as it were such exercise of power part of the structure of our government, may be treated as a gloss on ‘executive Power’ vested in the President.”\textsuperscript{15} Justice Frankfurter also discussed cases where Congress may not have approved the President’s action in advance, but subsequently ratified the President’s action, or may not have disapproved the President’s action in advance, but subsequently expressed their dissatisfaction.

The general separation of powers concern with promoting efficiency, while protecting against tyranny, also has shaped court decisions. Specifically, Congress has frequently allowed the President to take the lead in foreign affairs to promote efficiency in foreign policy decisionmaking. Thus, in considering executive versus legislative powers, the Court tends to give the President more leeway in cases involving foreign affairs, than those involving domestic power, where Congress’ policy-making power is more dominant. For domestic policy, the concern with prevention of presidential tyranny has been viewed as the greater concern than governmental efficiency.

Based on these considerations, Table 9 summarizes these “Justice Jackson” factors that the Court considers under the post-1937 non-formalist approach to presidential powers:

Where the case involves a category nearer the top of the Table, the President’s authority to act will be greater than when the case involves facts near the bottom of the Table. In Youngstown Sheet, the President’s authority was near the bottom of this Table, as the case involved primarily a domestic issue, the seizure of steel mills, although it did have a foreign component, the proposed effect of a steel strike on the ability to provide military equipment for the Korean War. The case also involved action taken pursuant to implied congressional disapproval, as Congress had provided for alternative ways to resolve domestic strikes in times of emergency, such as the provision in the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley Act) for a 60-day cooling-off period with an injunction against a strike, followed by 20 days for a secret ballot upon the final offer of settlement, or referral of the controversy to the Wage Stabilization Board, which President Truman did, but whose recommendations were viewed as too favorable to the workers by steel management. Further, Congress had specifically rejected giving the President the power to seize plants unilaterally when considering the issue in the Taft-Hartley Act, as Justice Burton noted in his concurrence.18

In Youngstown Sheet, Justice Frankfurter’s “gloss on meaning” use of legislative and executive practice did not provide President Truman with much help. Justice Frankfurter noted that while President Roosevelt had taken unilateral action in the events leading up to World War II 12 times, 6 of those times were pursuant to congressional approval, 3 times involved subsequent ratification by Congress, and thus only 3 times even remotely resembled President Truman’s action in this case. Those facts did not demonstrate the kind of “consistent, unbroken, executive practice” necessary for triggering a strong “gloss on meaning” argument on these facts.19

The dissenters in Youngstown Sheet, Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Reed and Minton, also resorted to arguments of legislative and executive practice. They merely balanced them differently than did Justice Jackson. They concluded that the President was attempting to execute defense programs for the Korean War, and thus was acting pursuant to implied congressional authorization.20 Justice Vinson’s opinion also contained language focusing on the need for efficiency in government operations, suggesting that the President may have power where Congress is silent to deal with emergencies in ways that save legislative programs or which protect the country. As Chief Justice Vinson noted in his opinion, “A review of executive action demonstrates that on many occasions Presidents have exhibited the leadership contemplated by the Framers when they made the President Commander in Chief, and imposed upon him the trust to ‘take Care that the laws be faithfully executed.’”21 conservative judges, such as Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Reed and Minton, to resolve close cases in favor of presidential authority, and downplay concerns with presidential tyranny.

In contrast, liberal judges tend to resolve close questions more in favor of the legislative branch, and to be suspicious of broad grants of power to the President. As liberal instrumentalist Justice Douglas noted in his concurrence in Youngstown Sheet, focusing on the policy behind the President’s action in this case and in other potential future cases, “Today a kindly President uses the seizure power to effect a wage increase [based on the Wage Stabilization Board’s pro-union recommendations] and to keep steel furnaces in production. Yet tomorrow another President might use the same power to prevent a wage increase, to curb trade unionists, to regiment labor as oppressively as industry thinks it has been regimented by this seizure.”

Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are asked to decide whether the President was acting within his constitutional power when he issued an order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the Nation's steel mills. The mill owners argue that the President's order amounts to lawmaking, a legislative function which the Constitution has expressly confided to the Congress and not to the President. The Government's position is that the order was made on findings of the President that his action was necessary to avert a national catastrophe which would inevitably result from a stoppage of steel production, and that in meeting this grave emergency the President was acting within the aggregate of his constitutional powers as the Nation's Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. The issue emerges here from the following series of events:

In the latter part of 1951, a dispute arose between the steel companies and their employees over terms and conditions that should be included in new collective bargaining agreements. Long-continued conferences failed to resolve the dispute. On December 18, 1951, the employees' representative, United Steelworkers of America, C. I. O., gave notice of an intention to strike when the existing bargaining agreements expired on December 31. The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service then intervened in an effort to get labor and management to agree. This failing, the President on December 22, 1951, referred the dispute to the Federal Wage Stabilization Board to investigate and make recommendations for fair and equitable terms of settlement. This Board's report resulted in no settlement. On April 4, 1952, the Union gave notice of a nation-wide strike called to begin at 12:01 a. m. April 9. The indispensability of steel as a component of substantially all weapons and other war materials led the President to believe that the proposed work stoppage would immediately jeopardize our national defense and that governmental seizure of the steel mills was necessary in order to assure the continued availability of steel. Reciting these considerations for his action, the President, a few hours before the strike was to begin, issued Executive Order 10340, a copy of which is attached as an appendix. The order directed the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of most of the steel mills and keep them running. The Secretary immediately issued his own possessory orders, calling upon the presidents of the various seized companies to serve as operating managers for the United States. They were directed to carry on their activities in accordance with regulations and directions of the Secretary. The next morning the President sent a message to Congress reporting his action. Cong. Rec., April 9, 1952, p. 3962. Twelve days later he Obeying the Secretary's orders under protest, the companies brought proceedings against him in the District Court. Their complaints charged that the seizure was not authorized by an act of Congress or by any constitutional provisions. The District Court was asked to declare the orders of the President and the Secretary invalid and to issue preliminary and permanent injunctions restraining their enforcement. Opposing the motion for preliminary injunction, the United States asserted that a strike disrupting steel production for even a brief period would so endanger the well-being and safety of the Nation that the President had "inherent power" to do what he had done – power "supported by the Constitution, by historical precedent, and by court decisions." The Government also contended that in any event no preliminary injunction should be issued because the companies had made no showing that their available legal remedies were inadequate or that their injuries from seizure would be irreparable. Holding against the Government on all points, the District Court on April 30 issued a preliminary injunction restraining the Secretary from "continuing the seizure and possession of the plants . . . and from acting under the purported authority of Executive Order No.

10340." 103 F. Supp. 569. On the same day the Court of Appeals stayed the District Court's injunction. 197 F.2d 582. Deeming it best that the issues raised be promptly decided by this Court, we granted certiorari on May 3 and set the cause for argument on May 12. 343 U.S. 937.

The President's power, if any, to issue the order must stem either from an act of Congress or from the Constitution itself. There is no statute that expressly authorizes the President to take possession of property as he did here. Nor is there any act of Congress to which our attention has been directed from which such a power can fairly be implied. Indeed, we do not understand the Government to rely on statutory authorization for this seizure. There are two statutes which do authorize the President to take both personal and real property under certain conditions. However, the Government admits that these conditions were not met and that the President's order was not rooted in either of the statutes. The Government refers to the seizure provisions of one of these statutes (§ 201 (b) of the Defense Production Act) as "much too cumbersome, involved, and time-consuming for the crisis which was at hand."[Ed.: The other statute was The Selective Service Act of 1948, 50 U.S.C. § 468.]

Moreover, the use of the seizure technique to solve labor disputes in order to prevent work stoppages was not only unauthorized by any congressional enactment; prior to this controversy, Congress had refused to adopt that method of settling labor disputes. When the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration in 1947, Congress rejected an amendment which would have authorized such governmental seizures in cases of emergency. Apparently it was thought that the technique of seizure, like that of compulsory arbitration, would interfere with the process of collective bargaining. Consequently, the plan Congress adopted in that Act did not provide for seizure under any circumstances. Instead, the plan sought to bring about settlements by use of the customary devices of mediation, conciliation, investigation by boards of inquiry, and public reports. In some instances temporary injunctions were authorized to provide cooling-off periods. All this failing, unions were left free to strike after a secret vote by employees as to whether they wished to accept their employers' final settlement offer.

It is clear that if the President had authority to issue the order he did, it must be found in some provision of the Constitution. And it is not claimed that express constitutional language grants this power to the President. The contention is that presidential power should be implied from the aggregate of his powers under the Constitution. Particular reliance is placed on provisions in Article II which say that "The executive Power shall be vested in a President . . ."; that "he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"; and that he "shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States."

The order cannot properly be sustained as an exercise of the President's military power as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. The Government attempts to do so by citing a number of cases upholding broad powers in military commanders engaged in day-to-day fighting in a theater of war. Such cases need not concern us here. Even though "theater of war" be an expanding concept, we cannot with faithfulness to our constitutional system hold that the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces has the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the Nation's lawmakers, not for its military authorities.

Nor can the seizure order be sustained because of the several constitutional provisions that grant executive power to the President. In the framework of our Constitution, the President's power to see that the laws are faithfully executed refutes the idea that he is to be a lawmaker. The Constitution limits his functions in the lawmaking process to the recommending of laws he thinks wise and the vetoing of laws he thinks bad. And the Constitution is neither silent nor equivocal about who shall make laws which the President is to execute. The first section of the first article says that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States . . ." After granting many powers to the Congress, Article I goes on to provide [in Art. I, § 8, cl. 18] that Congress may "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."

The President's order does not direct that a congressional policy be executed in a manner prescribed by Congress – it directs that a presidential policy be executed in a manner prescribed by the President. The preamble of the order itself, like that of many statutes, sets out reasons why the President believes certain policies should be adopted, proclaims these policies as rules of conduct to be followed, and again, like a statute, authorizes a government official to promulgate additional rules and regulations consistent with the policy proclaimed and needed to carry that policy into execution. The power of Congress to adopt such public policies as those proclaimed by the order is beyond question. It can authorize the taking of private property for public use. It can make laws regulating the relationships between employers and employees, prescribing rules designed to settle labor disputes, and fixing wages and working conditions in certain fields of our economy. The Constitution does not subject this lawmaking power of Congress to presidential or military supervision or control.

It is said that other Presidents without congressional authority have taken possession of private business enterprises in order to settle labor disputes. But even if this be true, Congress has not thereby lost its exclusive constitutional authority to make laws necessary and proper to carry out the powers vested by the Constitution "in the Government of the United States, or any Department or Officer thereof."

The Founders of this Nation entrusted the lawmaking power to the Congress alone in both good and bad times. It would do no good to recall the historical events, the fears of power and the hopes for freedom that lay behind their choice. Such a review would but confirm our holding that this seizure order cannot stand.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Justice DOUGLAS, concurring.

There can be no doubt that the emergency which caused the President to seize these steel plants was one that bore heavily on the country. But the emergency did not create power; it merely marked an occasion when power should be exercised. And the fact that it was necessary that measures be taken to keep steel in production does not mean that the President, rather than the Congress, had the constitutional authority to act. The Congress, as well as the President, is trustee of the national welfare. The President can act more quickly than the Congress. The President with the armed services at his disposal can move with force as well as with speed. All executive power – from the reign of ancient kings to the rule of modern dictators – has the outward appearance of efficiency.

Legislative power, by contrast, is slower to exercise. There must be delay while the ponderous machinery of committees, hearings, and debates is put into motion. That takes time; and while the Congress slowly moves into action, the emergency may take its toll in wages, consumer goods, war production, the standard of living of the people, and perhaps even lives. Legislative action may indeed often be cumbersome, time-consuming, and apparently inefficient. But as Mr. Justice Brandeis stated in his dissent in Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 293 [(1926)]: “The doctrine of the separation of powers was adopted by the Convention of 1787 not to promote efficiency but to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power. The purpose was not to avoid friction, but, by means of the inevitable friction incident to the distribution of the governmental powers among three departments, to save the people from autocracy.”

The great office of President is not a weak and powerless one. The President represents the people and is their spokesman in domestic and foreign affairs. The office is respected more than any other in the land. It gives a position of leadership that is unique. The power to formulate policies and mold opinion inheres in the Presidency and conditions our national life. The impact of the man and the philosophy he represents may at times be thwarted by the Congress. Stalemates may occur when emergencies mount and the Nation suffers for lack of harmonious, reciprocal action between the White House and Capitol Hill. That is a risk inherent in our system of separation of powers. The tragedy of such stalemates might be avoided by allowing the President the use of some legislative authority. The Framers with memories of the tyrannies produced by a blending of executive and legislative power rejected that political arrangement. Some future generation may, however, deem it so urgent that the President have legislative authority that the Constitution will be amended. We could not sanction the seizures and condemnations of the steel plants in this case without reading Article II as giving the President not only the power to execute the laws but to make some. Such a step would most assuredly alter the pattern of the Constitution.

We pay a price for our system of checks and balances, for the distribution of power among the three branches of government. It is a price that today may seem exorbitant to many. Today a kindly President uses the seizure power to effect a wage increase and to keep the steel furnaces in production. Yet tomorrow another President might use the same power to prevent a wage increase, to curb trade unionists, to regiment labor as oppressively as industry thinks it has been regimented by this seizure.

Justice FRANKFURTER, concurring.

It cannot be contended that the President would have had power to issue this order had Congress explicitly negated such authority in formal legislation. Congress has expressed its will to withhold this power from the President as though it had said so in so many words. The authoritatively expressed purpose of Congress to disallow such power to the President and to require him, when in his mind the occasion arose for such a seizure, to put the matter to Congress and ask for specific authority from it, could not be more decisive if it had been written into §§ 206-210 of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947. Only the other day, we treated the Congressional gloss upon those sections as part of the Act. Bus Employees v. Wisconsin Board, 340 U.S. 383, 395-396. Grafting upon the words a purpose of Congress thus unequivocally expressed is the regular legislative mode for defining the scope of an Act of Congress. It would be not merely infelicitous draftsmanship but almost offensive gaucherie to write such a restriction upon the President's power in terms into a statute rather than to have it authoritatively expounded, as it was, by controlling legislative history.

By the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, Congress said to the President, "You may not seize. Please report to us and ask for seizure power if you think it is needed in a specific situation." This of course calls for a report on the unsuccessful efforts to reach a voluntary settlement, as a basis for discharge by Congress of its responsibility – which it has unequivocally reserved – to fashion further remedies than it provided. But it is now claimed that the President has seizure power by virtue of the Defense Production Act of 1950 and its Amendments. And the claim is based on the occurrence of new events – Korea and the need for stabilization, etc. – although it was well known that seizure power was withheld by the Act of 1947, and although the President, whose specific requests for other authority were in the main granted by Congress, never suggested that in view of the new events he needed the power of seizure which Congress in its judgment had decided to withhold from him. The utmost that the Korean conflict may imply is that it may have been desirable to have given the President further authority, a freer hand in these matters. Absence of authority in the President to deal with a crisis does not imply want of power in the Government. Conversely the fact that power exists in the Government does not vest it in the President. The need for new legislation does not enact it. Nor does it repeal or amend existing law.

No authority that has since been given to the President can by any fair process of statutory construction be deemed to withdraw the restriction or change the will of Congress as expressed by a body of enactments, culminating in the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947.

To be sure, the content of the three authorities of government is not to be derived from an abstract analysis. The areas are partly interacting, not wholly disjointed. The Constitution is a framework for government. Therefore the way the framework has consistently operated fairly establishes that it has operated according to its true nature. Deeply embedded traditional ways of conducting government cannot supplant the Constitution or legislation, but they give meaning to the words of a text or supply them. It is an inadmissibly narrow conception of American constitutional law to confine it to the words of the Constitution and to disregard the gloss which life has written upon them. In short, a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned, engaged in by Presidents who have also sworn to uphold the Constitution, making as it were such exercise of power part of the structure of our government, may be treated as a gloss on ‘executive Power’ vested in the President by § 1 of Art. II.

Such was the case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U.S. 459 [(1915)]. The contrast between the circumstances of that case and this one helps to draw a clear line between authority not explicitly conferred yet authorized to be exercised by the President and the denial of such authority. In both instances it was the concern of Congress under express constitutional grant to make rules and regulations for the problems with which the President dealt. In the one case he was dealing with the protection of property belonging to the United States; in the other with the enforcement of the Commerce Clause and with raising and supporting armies and maintaining the Navy. In the Midwest Oil case lands which Congress had opened for entry were, over a period of 80 years and in 252 instances, and by Presidents learned and unlearned in the law, temporarily withdrawn from entry so as to enable Congress to deal with such withdrawals. No remotely comparable practice can be vouched for executive seizure of property at a time when this country was not at war, in the only constitutional way in which it can be at war. It would pursue the irrelevant to reopen the controversy over the constitutionality of some acts of Lincoln during the Civil War. See J. G. Randall, Constitutional Problems under Lincoln (Revised ed. 1951). Suffice it to say that he seized railroads in territory where armed hostilities had already interrupted the movement of troops to the beleaguered Capitol, and his order was ratified by the Congress.

The only other instances of seizures are those during the periods of the first and second World Wars. In his eleven seizures of industrial facilities, President Wilson acted, or at least purported to act, under authority granted by Congress. Thus his seizures cannot be adduced as interpretations by a President of his own powers in the absence of statute.

Down to the World War II period, then, the record is barren of instances comparable to the one before us. Of twelve seizures by President Roosevelt prior to the enactment of the War Labor Disputes Act in June, 1943, three were sanctioned by existing law, and six others were effected after Congress, on December 8, 1941, had declared the existence of a state of war. In this case, reliance on the powers that flow from declared war has been commendably disclaimed by the Solicitor General. Thus the list of executive assertions of the power of seizure in circumstances comparable to the present reduces to three in the six-month period from June to December of 1941. We need not split hairs in comparing those actions to the one before us, though much might be said by way of differentiation. Without passing on their validity, as we are not called upon to do, it suffices to say that these three isolated instances do not add up, either in number, scope, duration or contemporaneous legal justification, to the kind of executive construction of the Constitution revealed in the Midwest Oil case. Nor do they come to us sanctioned by long-continued acquiescence of Congress giving decisive weight to a construction by the Executive of its powers.

Justice JACKSON, concurring in the judgment and opinion of the Court.

That comprehensive and undefined presidential powers hold both practical advantages and grave dangers for the country will impress anyone who has served as legal adviser to a President in time of transition and public anxiety. While an interval of detached reflection may temper teachings of that experience, they probably are a more realistic influence on my views than the conventional materials of judicial decision which seem unduly to accentuate doctrine and legal fiction. But as we approach the question of presidential power, we half overcome mental hazards by recognizing them.
The opinions of judges, no less than executives and publicists, often suffer the infirmity of confusing the issue of a power's validity with the cause it is invoked to promote, of confounding the permanent executive office with its temporary occupant. The tendency is strong to emphasize transient results upon policies – such as wages or stabilization – and lose sight of enduring consequences upon the balanced power structure of our Republic.

A judge, like an executive adviser, may be surprised at the poverty of really useful and unambiguous authority applicable to concrete problems of executive power as they actually present themselves.
Just what our forefathers did envision, or would have envisioned had they foreseen modern conditions, must be divined from materials almost as enigmatic as the dreams Joseph was called upon to interpret for Pharaoh. A century and a half of partisan debate and scholarly speculation yields no net result but only supplies more or less apt quotations from respected sources on each side of any question. They largely cancel each other. And court decisions are indecisive because of the judicial practice of dealing with the largest questions in the most narrow way.

The actual art of governing under our Constitution does not and cannot conform to judicial definitions of the power of any of its branches based on isolated clauses or even single Articles torn from context. While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity. Presidential powers are not fixed but fluctuate, depending upon their disjunction or conjunction with those of Congress. We may well begin by a somewhat over-simplified grouping of practical situations in which a President may doubt, or others may challenge, his powers, and by distinguishing roughly the legal consequences of this factor of relativity.

1. When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. In these circumstances, and in these only, may he be said (for what it may be worth) to personify the federal sovereignty. If his act is held unconstitutional under these circumstances, it usually means that the Federal Government as an undivided whole lacks power. A seizure executed by the President pursuant to an Act of Congress would be supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who might attack it.

2. When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measures on independent presidential responsibility. In this area, any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.

3. When the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Courts can sustain exclusive presidential control in such a case only by disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject. Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.

Into which of these classifications does this executive seizure of the steel industry fit? It is eliminated from the first by admission, for it is conceded that no congressional authorization exists for this seizure. That takes away also the support of the many precedents and declarations which were made in relation, and must be confined, to this category.

Can it then be defended under flexible tests available to the second category? It seems clearly eliminated from that class because Congress has not left seizure of private property an open field but has covered it by three statutory policies inconsistent with this seizure. In cases where the purpose is to supply needs of the Government itself, two courses are provided: one, seizure of a plant which fails to comply with obligatory orders placed by the Government [Selective Service Act of 1948]; another, condemnation of facilities, including temporary use under the power of eminent domain [Defense Production Act of 1950]. The third is applicable where it is the general economy of the country that is to be protected rather than exclusive governmental interests [Labor Management Relations Act of 1947]. None of these were invoked. In choosing a different and inconsistent way of his own, the President cannot claim that it is necessitated or invited by failure of Congress to legislate upon the occasions, grounds and methods for seizure of industrial properties.

We should not use this occasion to circumscribe, much less to contract, the lawful role of the President as Commander in Chief. I should indulge the widest latitude of interpretation to sustain his exclusive function to command the instruments of national force, at least when turned against the outside world for the security of our society. But, when it is turned inward, not because of rebellion but because of a lawful economic struggle between industry and labor, it should have no such indulgence. His command power is not such an absolute as might be implied from that office in a militaristic system but is subject to limitations consistent with a constitutional Republic whose law and policy-making branch is a representative Congress. The purpose of lodging dual titles in one man was to insure that the civilian would control the military, not to enable the military to subordinate the presidential office. No penance would ever expiate the sin against free government of holding that a President can escape control of executive powers by law through assuming his military role. What the power of command may include I do not try to envision, but I think it is not a military prerogative, without support of law, to seize persons or property because they are important or even essential for the military and naval establishment.

The third clause in which the Solicitor General finds seizure powers is that "he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed . . ." That authority must be matched against words of the Fifth Amendment that "No person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law . . ." One gives a governmental authority that reaches so far as there is law, the other gives a private right that authority shall go no farther. These signify about all there is of the principle that ours is a government of laws, not of men, and that we submit ourselves to rulers only if under rules.

The Solicitor General lastly grounds support of the seizure upon nebulous, inherent powers never expressly granted but said to have accrued to the office from the customs and claims of preceding administrations. The plea is for a resulting power to deal with a crisis or an emergency according to the necessities of the case, the unarticulated assumption being that necessity knows no law.

Loose and irresponsible use of adjectives colors all nonlegal and much legal discussion of presidential powers. "Inherent" powers, "implied" powers, "incidental" powers, "plenary" powers, "war" powers and "emergency" powers are used, often interchangeably and without fixed or ascertainable meanings.

The vagueness and generality of the clauses that set forth presidential powers afford a plausible basis for pressures within and without an administration for presidential action beyond that supported by those whose responsibility it is to defend his actions in court. The claim of inherent and unrestricted presidential powers has long been a persuasive dialectical weapon in political controversy. While it is not surprising that counsel should grasp support from such unadjudicated claims of power, a judge cannot accept self-serving press statements of the attorney for one of the interested parties as authority in answering a constitutional question, even if the advocate was himself. [Ed.: As Solicitor General from 1938-1940, Justice Jackson had made such arguments in earlier cases] But prudence has counseled that actual reliance on such nebulous claims stop short of provoking a judicial test.
The Solicitor General, acknowledging that Congress has never authorized the seizure here, says practice of prior Presidents has authorized it. He seeks color of legality from claimed executive precedents, chief of which is President Roosevelt's seizure on June 9, 1941, of the California plant of the North American Aviation Company. Its superficial similarities with the present case, upon analysis, yield to distinctions so decisive that it cannot be regarded as even a precedent, much less an authority for the present seizure.

But I have no illusion that any decision by this Court can keep power in the hands of Congress if it is not wise and timely in meeting its problems. A crisis that challenges the President equally, or perhaps primarily, challenges Congress. If not good law, there was worldly wisdom in the maxim attributed to Napoleon that "The tools belong to the man who can use them." We may say that power to legislate for emergencies belongs in the hands of Congress, but only Congress itself can prevent power from slipping through its fingers.

The essence of our free Government is "leave to live by no man's leave, underneath the law" – to be governed by those impersonal forces which we call law. Our Government is fashioned to fulfill this concept so far as humanly possible. The Executive, except for recommendation and veto, has no legislative power. The executive action we have here originates in the individual will of the President and represents an exercise of authority without law. No one, perhaps not even the President, knows the limits of the power he may seek to exert in this instance and the parties affected cannot learn the limit of their rights. We do not know today what powers over labor or property would be claimed to flow from Government possession if we should legalize it, what rights to compensation would be claimed or recognized, or on what contingency it would end. With all its defects, delays and inconveniences, men have discovered no technique for long preserving free government except that the Executive be under the law, and that the law be made by parliamentary deliberations.

Justice BURTON, concurring in both the opinion and judgment of the Court.

Does the President, in such a situation, have inherent constitutional power to seize private property which makes congressional action in relation thereto unnecessary? We find no such power available to him under the present circumstances. The present situation is not comparable to that of an imminent invasion or threatened attack. We do not face the issue of what might be the President's constitutional power to meet such catastrophic situations. Nor is it claimed that the current seizure is in the nature of a military command addressed by the President, as Commander-in-Chief, to a mobilized nation waging, or imminently threatened with, total war.

The controlling fact here is that Congress, within its constitutionally delegated power, has prescribed for the President specific procedures, exclusive of seizure, for his use in meeting the present type of emergency. Congress has reserved to itself the right to determine where and when to authorize the seizure of property in meeting such an emergency. Under these circumstances, the President's order of April 8 invaded the jurisdiction of Congress. It violated the essence of the principle of the separation of governmental powers. Accordingly, the injunction against its effectiveness should be sustained.
Justice CLARK, concurring in the judgment of the Court.

One of this Court's first pronouncements upon the powers of the President under the Constitution was made by Chief Justice John Marshall some one hundred and fifty years ago. In Little v. Barreme [2 U.S. (Cranch) 170 (1804)], he used this characteristically clear language in discussing the power of the President to instruct the seizure of the Flying Fish, a vessel bound from a French port: "It is by no means clear that the president of the United States whose high duty it is to 'take care that the laws be faithfully executed,' and who is commander in chief of the armies and navies of the United States, might not, without any special authority for that purpose, in the then existing state of things, have empowered the officers commanding the armed vessels of the United States, to seize and send into port for adjudication, American vessels which were forfeited by being engaged in this illicit commerce. But when it is observed that [an act of Congress] gives a special authority to seize on the high seas, and limits that authority to the seizure of vessels bound or sailing to a French port, the legislature seem to have prescribed that the manner in which this law shall be carried into execution, was to exclude a seizure of any vessel not bound to a French port." Accordingly, a unanimous Court held that the President's instructions had been issued without authority and that they could not "legalize an act which without those instructions would have been a plain trespass." I know of no subsequent holding of this Court to the contrary.

The limits of presidential power are obscure. However, Article II, no less than Article I, is part of "a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." Some of our Presidents, such as Lincoln, "felt that measures otherwise unconstitutional might become lawful by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution through the preservation of the nation."

Others, such as Theodore Roosevelt, thought the President to be capable, as a "steward" of the people, of exerting all power save that which is specifically prohibited by the Constitution or the Congress. In my view – taught me not only by the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in Little v. Barreme, but also by a score of other pronouncements of distinguished members of this bench – the Constitution does grant to the President extensive authority in times of grave and imperative national emergency. In fact, to my thinking, such a grant may well be necessary to the very existence of the Constitution itself. As Lincoln aptly said, "[is] it possible to lose the nation and yet preserve the Constitution?" In describing this authority I care not whether one calls it "residual," "inherent," "moral," "implied," "aggregate," "emergency," or otherwise. I am of the conviction that those who have had the gratifying experience of being the President's lawyer have used one or more of these adjectives only with the utmost of sincerity and the highest of purpose.

I conclude that where Congress has laid down specific procedures to deal with the type of crisis confronting the President, he must follow those procedures in meeting the crisis; but that in the absence of such action by Congress, the President's independent power to act depends upon the gravity of the situation confronting the nation. I cannot sustain the seizure in question because here, as in Little v. Barreme, Congress had prescribed methods to be followed by the President in meeting the emergency at hand.
Chief Justice VINSON, with whom Justice REED and Justice MINTON join, dissenting.

The President of the United States directed the Secretary of Commerce to take temporary possession of the Nation's steel mills during the existing emergency because "a work stoppage would immediately jeopardize and imperil our national defense and the defense of those joined with us in resisting aggression, and would add to the continuing danger of our soldiers, sailors, and airmen engaged in combat in the field." The District Court ordered the mills returned to their private owners on the ground that the President's action was beyond his powers under the Constitution.

This Court affirms. Some members of the Court are of the view that the President is without power to act in time of crisis in the absence of express statutory authorization. Other members of the Court affirm on the basis of their reading of certain statutes. Because we cannot agree that affirmance is proper on any ground, and because of the transcending importance of the questions presented not only in this critical litigation but also to the powers of the President and of future Presidents to act in time of crisis, we are compelled to register this dissent.

Those who suggest that this is a case involving extraordinary powers should be mindful that these are extraordinary times. A world not yet recovered from the devastation of World War II has been forced to face the threat of another and more terrifying global conflict.

The steel mills were seized for a public use. The power of eminent domain, invoked in this case, is an essential attribute of sovereignty and has long been recognized as a power of the Federal Government. Kohl v. United States, 91 U.S. 367 (1876). Plaintiffs cannot complain that any provision in the Constitution prohibits the exercise of the power of eminent domain in this case. The Fifth Amendment provides: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." It is no bar to this seizure for, if the taking is not otherwise unlawful, plaintiffs are assured of receiving the required just compensation. United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U.S. 114 (1951).

History bears out the genius of the Founding Fathers, who created a Government subject to law but not left subject to inertia when vigor and initiative are required.

Focusing now on the situation confronting the President on the night of April 8, 1952, we cannot but conclude that the President was performing his duty under the Constitution to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed" – a duty described by President Benjamin Harrison as "the central idea of the office."

The President reported to Congress the morning after the seizure that he acted because a work stoppage in steel production would immediately imperil the safety of the Nation by preventing execution of the legislative programs for procurement of military equipment. And, while a shutdown could be averted by granting the price concessions requested by plaintiffs, granting such concessions would disrupt the price stabilization program also enacted by Congress. Rather than fail to execute either legislative program, the President acted to execute both.
Much of the argument in this case has been directed at straw men. We do not now have before us the case of a President acting solely on the basis of his own notions of the public welfare. Nor is there any question of unlimited executive power in this case. The President himself closed the door to any such claim when he sent his Message to Congress stating his purpose to abide by any action of Congress, whether approving or disapproving his seizure action. Here, the President immediately made sure that Congress was fully informed of the temporary action he had taken only to preserve the legislative programs from destruction until Congress could act.

The absence of a specific statute authorizing seizure of the steel mills as a mode of executing the laws – both the military procurement program and the anti-inflation program – has not until today been thought to prevent the President from executing the laws. Unlike an administrative commission confined to the enforcement of the statute under which it was created, or the head of a department when administering a particular statute, the President is a constitutional officer charged with taking care that a "mass of legislation" be executed. Flexibility as to mode of execution to meet critical situations is a matter of practical necessity. This practical construction of the "Take Care" clause, advocated by John Marshall, was adopted by this Court in In re Neagle, In re Debs and other cases cited supra. See also Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 26 (1942). Although more restrictive views of executive power, advocated in dissenting opinions of Justices Holmes, McReynolds and Brandeis, were emphatically rejected by this Court in Myers v. United States, supra, members of today's majority treat these dissenting views as authoritative.

There is no statute prohibiting seizure as a method of enforcing legislative programs. Congress has in no wise indicated that its legislation is not to be executed by the taking of private property (subject of course to the payment of just compensation) if its legislation cannot otherwise be executed. Indeed, the Universal Military Training and Service Act authorizes the seizure of any plant that fails to fill a Government contract or the properties of any steel producer that fails to allocate steel as directed for defense production. And the Defense Production Act authorizes the President to requisition equipment and condemn real property needed without delay in the defense effort. Where Congress authorizes seizure in instances not necessarily crucial to the defense program, it can hardly be said to have disclosed an intention to prohibit seizures where essential to the execution of that legislative program.

Whatever the extent of Presidential power on more tranquil occasions, and whatever the right of the President to execute legislative programs as he sees fit without reporting the mode of execution to Congress, the single Presidential purpose disclosed on this record is to faithfully execute the laws by acting in an emergency to maintain the status quo, thereby preventing collapse of the legislative programs until Congress could act. The President's action served the same purposes as a judicial stay entered to maintain the status quo in order to preserve the jurisdiction of a court. In his Message to Congress immediately following the seizure, the President explained the necessity of his action in executing the military procurement and anti-inflation legislative programs and expressed his desire to cooperate with any legislative proposals approving, regulating or rejecting the seizure of the steel mills. Consequently, there is no evidence whatever of any Presidential purpose to defy Congress or act in any way inconsistent with the legislative will.
As the District Judge stated, this is no time for "timorous" judicial action. But neither is this a time for timorous executive action. Faced with the duty of executing the defense programs which Congress had enacted and the disastrous effects that any stoppage in steel production would have on those programs, the President acted to preserve those programs by seizing the steel mills. There is no question that the possession was other than temporary in character and subject to congressional direction – either approving, disapproving or regulating the manner in which the mills were to be administered and returned to the owners. The President immediately informed Congress of his action and clearly stated his intention to abide by the legislative will. No basis for claims of arbitrary action, unlimited powers or dictatorial usurpation of congressional power appears from the facts of this case. On the contrary, judicial, legislative and executive precedents throughout our history demonstrate that in this case the President acted in full conformity with his duties under the Constitution. Accordingly, we would reverse the order of the District Court.

Following Youngstown Sheet, a strike commenced. Consumer inventories of steel ran low after 3 weeks, causing shutdowns in the auto industry. The government stockpiles ran low after 5 weeks. The strike ended after 7 weeks, substantially on union terms, in part because Truman threatened to place “obligatory orders” and then use the Selective Service Act provisions to seize the steel plants.

When Congress delegates legislative power to the President, administrative agencies, or special commissions, a separation of powers concern arises if Congress has delegated too much policymaking power. To prevent this, the Court has required Congress to provide the delegated agent with congressionally developed standards to guide application of the delegated power.

During the formalist era, this doctrine was applied in a relatively strict manner, with the Court requiring detailed congressional standards or policies. For example, in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, the Court considered that part of the Depression-era National Industrial Recovery Act which provided that the President was granted authority to approve or not various industry-adopted codes of fair labor practices, in this case the Code of Fair Competition for the Live Poultry Industry. The Act provided that as a condition of approval the President must find that the codes “impose no inequitable restrictions on admission to membership” and are not “designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises and will not operate to discriminate against them.” The Court noted that these restrictions “leave virtually untouched the field of policy,” do not undertake “to prescribe rules of conduct to be applied to particular states of fact determined by appropriate administrative procedure,” and set up “no standards, aside from the statement of the general aims.” In short, “the President in approving or prescribing codes, and thus enacting laws for the government of trade and industry throughout the country, is virtually unfettered. We think that the code-making authority thus conferred is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.”

Similarly, in Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, the Court struck down as an impermissible delegation of legislative power a part of the National Industrial Recovery Act which granted to the President the authority to prohibit the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum products in excess of the amount permitted under any state law. The Court noted, “Congress did not declare in what circumstances that transportation should be forbidden, or require the President to make any determination as to any facts or circumstances. Among the numerous and diverse objectives broadly stated, the President was not required to choose. The President was not required to ascertain and proclaim the conditions prevailing in the industry which made the prohibition necessary. The Congress left the matter to the President without standard or rule, to be dealt with as he pleased.”

Reflecting a moderate version of formalism, which had the controlling votes on the Court during the formalist era, Chief Justice Hughes noted that, despite the unconstitutional delegation found in Panama Refining, the “Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality which will enable it to perform its functions in laying down policies and establishing standards, while leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the Legislature is to apply. Without capacity to give authorizations of that sort we should have the anomaly of a legislative power which in many circumstances calling for its exertion would be but a futility.” Reflecting this moderate approach, in each case during the formalist era other than Schechter Poultry and Panama Refining, delegations of legislative power were upheld on the ground that adequate standards were provided. For example, in J.W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, the President was granted authority to adjust tariffs on products imported from other countries to equalize differences in the cost of production. Citing numerous cases, the Court held, “What the President was required to do was merely in execution of an act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect.”

Since 1937, the Court has applied the doctrine regarding delegation of legislative power consistent with the non-formalist view that sharing of powers suggests that the Court should find that an “intelligible principle” was given by Congress to guide delegations, rather than to apply the doctrine in a relatively strict manner. For example, in Mistretta v. United States, the Court was faced with a challenge to the constitutionality of the United States Sentencing Commission, which was established to promulgate sentencing guidelines binding on the courts, subject to aggravating or mitigating factors. In discussing the doctrine regarding delegation, the 8 non-formalist Justices on the Court in 1989 stated:

So long as Congress “shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to [exercise the delegated authority] is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power.”

Applying this “intelligible principle” test to congressional delegations, our jurisprudence has been driven by a practical understanding that in our increasingly complex society, replete with ever changing and more technical problems, Congress simply cannot do its job absent an ability to delegate power under broad general directives. Accordingly, this Court has deemed it “constitutionally sufficient if Congress clearly delineates the general policy, the public agency which is to apply it, and the boundaries of this delegated authority.”

In Mistretta, Congress charged the Commission with three goals: to assure meeting the purposes of sentencing set forth in the Act; to provide certainty and fairness in sentencing, while avoiding unwarranted sentencing disparities, but maintaining sufficient flexibility to permit individualized sentences; and to reflect, to the extent practicable, advancement in knowledge of human behavior as it relates to the criminal justice system. Congress also specified four purposes of sentencing: to reflect the seriousness of the offense, promote respect for the law, and provide just punishment; to afford adequate deterrence; to protect the public from further crimes; and to provide the defendant with needed correctional treatment. Congress also instructed the Commission that the sentencing ranges should be consistent with current provisions, not exceed current statutory maximums, and the current average sentence should be used as a starting point for structuring the sentencing guidelines. While such general aims might have raised a concern by the Court that decided Schechter Poultry, they raised no concern in Mistretta. Indeed, even formalist Justice Scalia in dissent acknowledged no problem with the “intelligibility” of the congressional standards in this case. As Justice Scalia stated, “What legislative standard, one must wonder, can possibly be too vague . . ., when we have repeatedly upheld, in various contexts, a ‘public interest’ standard.”

Under this approach, no federal statute since 1937 has been held invalid by the Court because of an excessive delegation of legislative power to an executive agency. Justice Scalia did dissent in Mistretta, however, based on the ground that the entire purpose of the Sentencing Commission was to exercise legislative power. Thus, unlike other cases, the delegated power was not being used as United States, 319 U.S. 190, 216-17 (1943) (“public interest” regarding regulating radio and television licensing not too vague in the Communications Act of 1934, given the context of “the nature of radio transmissions and reception, by the scope, character, and quality of services” and by “the interest of the listening public in the ‘larger and more efficient use of radio’”); New York Central Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24-25 (1932) (“public interest” not too vague in the Transportation Act of 1920, given context that it relates to “adequacy of transportation service, to its essential conditions of economy and efficiency, and to the appropriate provision and best use of transportation facilities”).

ancillary to executive or judicial discharge of their normal governmental functions, but instead was an example of a pure delegation of legislative power, which Justice Scalia said was unconstitutional under his strict separation of powers approach. Scalia noted, “Strictly speaking, there is no acceptable delegation of legislative power,” referring to language from John Locke’s Second Treatise on Government in 1790, which stated that “the legislative can have no power to transfer their authority of making laws, and place it in other hands.”

Locke’s approach, which focused on only two branches of government, the legislative and the executive, with the judiciary as part of the executive branch, predated the development in the 18th century by Montesquieu and others of the tripartite system of government, and a sharing of powers approach to separation of powers issues. In addition, while a number of state constitutions at the time the Constitution was framed did have language consistent with a strict separation of powers approach, the first Congress specifically rejected the inclusion of such a strict separation of powers amendment in the original Bill of Rights. For these reasons, it is not surprising that all non-formalist Justices on the current Court have rejected this part of Justice Scalia’s analysis, grounding the constitutional doctrine regarding delegation solely on the “intelligibility” principle stated above. The Court confirmed this approach to the delegation doctrine in Whitman v. American Trucking Associations, Inc., excerpted below. Any related questions concerning appointment, removal, and powers given under any particular delegation, are handled as general separation of powers concerns.

Of course, before the Court will find that Congress has made an excessive delegation, the Court will search for a clear indication that Congress intended the delegation to be so broad. For example, in Solid Waste Agency v. Army Corps of Engineers, Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, said, “Where an administrative interpretation of a statute invokes the outer limits of Congress’ power, we expect a clear indication that Congress intended that result.” The Chief Justice continued, “This requirement stems from our prudential desire not to needlessly reach constitutional issues and our assumption that Congress does not casually authorize administrative agencies to interpret a statute to push the limit of congressional authorization.”

33 531 U.S. 457, 472-76 (2001). The Court also noted in Whitman that, in an unusual case of an unconstitutional delegation, an agency cannot can cure the unlawful delegation by adopting in its discretion a limiting construction of the statute. Id. at 473. See generally David M. Driesen, Loose Canons: Statutory Construction and the New Nondelegation Doctrine, 64 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 1 (2002).

In addition to these kinds of legislative delegations to other branches of the government, sometimes government delegates, or more properly speaking, “contracts out,” governmental functions to private parties. While some state courts have analyzed such delegations under state constitutional "vesting" clauses, vesting law-making power solely in the legislature not private parties, most state courts, and the federal courts, have typically analyzed such delegations under the Due Process Clause. As discussed at § 28.3.2(I), the issues presented in such cases usually involve either: (1) a concern with conflicts of interest where the private delegate may have a personal or pecuniary interest that is inconsistent with or repugnant to the public interest, or (2) the availability and extent of any agency or court review process of decisions made by the private actor. As discussed at § 28.3.2(J), related due process issues arise when a body of law has developed around the practice of legislatures or agencies incorporating or enacting a code or set of rules borrowed entirely from some outside group, such as local fire codes or licensing requirements for practicing medicine or law.

Whitman v. American Trucking Associations, Inc.

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases present the following questions: (1) Whether § 109(b)(1) of the Clean Air Act (CAA) delegates legislative power to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). (2) Whether the Administrator may consider the costs of implementation in setting national ambient air quality standards (NAAQS) under § 109(b)(1). (3) Whether the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction to review the EPA's interpretation of Part D of Title I of the CAA, 42 U.S.C. §§ 7501-7515, with respect to implementing the revised ozone NAAQS. (4) If so, whether the EPA's interpretation of that part was permissible.

Section 109(b)(1) of the CAA instructs the EPA to set “ambient air quality standards the attainment and maintenance of which in the judgment of the Administrator, based on [the] criteria [documents of § 108] and allowing an adequate margin of safety, are requisite to protect the public health.” 42 U.S.C. § 7409(b)(1). The Court of Appeals held that this section as interpreted by the Administrator did not provide an “intelligible principle” to guide the EPA's exercise of authority in setting NAAQS. “[The] EPA,” it said, “lack[ed] any determinate criteria for drawing lines. It has failed to state intelligibly how much is too much.” 175 F.3d, at 1034. The court hence found that the EPA's interpretation (but not the statute itself) violated the nondelegation doctrine. Id., at 1038. We disagree.

In a delegation challenge, the constitutional question is whether the statute has delegated legislative power to the agency. Article I, § 1, of the Constitution vests “[a]ll legislative Powers herein granted ... in a Congress of the United States.” This text permits no delegation of those powers, Loving v. United States, 517 U.S. 748, 771 (1996); see id., at 776-777 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment), and so we repeatedly have said that when Congress confers decisionmaking authority upon agencies Congress must “lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to [act] is directed to conform.” J.W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 409 (1928). We have never suggested that an agency can cure an unlawful delegation of legislative power by adopting in its discretion a limiting construction of the statute. Both Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U.S. 245, 252-253 (1947), and Lichter v. United States, 334 U.S. 742, 783 (1948), mention agency regulations in the course of their nondelegation discussions, but Lichter did so because a subsequent Congress had incorporated the regulations into a revised version of the statute, ibid., and Fahey because the customary practices in the area, implicitly incorporated into the statute, were reflected in the regulations, 332 U.S., at 250. The idea that an agency can cure an unconstitutionally standardless delegation of power by declining to exercise some of that power seems to us internally contradictory. The very choice of which portion of the power to exercise – that is to say, the prescription of the standard that Congress had omitted – would itself be an exercise of the forbidden legislative authority. Whether the statute delegates legislative power is a question for the courts, and an agency's voluntary self-denial has no bearing upon the answer.

We agree with the Solicitor General that the text of § 109(b)(1) of the CAA at a minimum requires that “[f]or a discrete set of pollutants and based on published air quality criteria that reflect the latest scientific knowledge, [the] EPA must establish uniform national standards at a level that is requisite to protect public health from the adverse effects of the pollutant in the ambient air.” Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 99-1257, p. 5. Requisite, in turn, “mean[s] sufficient, but not more than necessary.” Id., at 7. These limits on the EPA's discretion are strikingly similar to the ones we approved in Touby v. United States, 500 U.S. 160 (1991), which permitted the Attorney General to designate a drug as a controlled substance for purposes of criminal drug enforcement if doing so was “necessary to avoid an imminent hazard to the public safety.”” Id. at 163. They also resemble the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 provision requiring the agency to “set the standard which most adequately assures, to the extent feasible, on the basis of the best available evidence, that no employee will suffer any impairment of health” – which the Court upheld in Industrial Union Dept., AFL-CIO v. American Petroleum Institute, 448 U.S. 607, 646 (1980), and which even then-Justice Rehnquist, who alone in that case thought the statute violated the nondelegation doctrine, see id., at 671 (opinion concurring in judgment), would have upheld if, like the statute here, it did not permit economic costs to be considered. See American Textile Mfrs. Institute, Inc. v. Donovan, 452 U.S. 490, 545 (1981) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

The scope of discretion § 109(b)(1) allows is in fact well within the outer limits of our nondelegation precedents. In the history of the Court we have found the requisite “intelligible principle” lacking in only two statutes, one of which provided literally no guidance for the exercise of discretion, and the other of which conferred authority to regulate the entire economy on the basis of no more precise a standard than stimulating the economy by assuring “fair competition.” See Panama Refining Co.
v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388 (1935); A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495 (1935). We have, on the other hand, upheld the validity of § 11(b)(2) of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 49 Stat. 821, which gave the Securities and Exchange Commission authority to modify the structure of holding company systems so as to ensure that they are not “unduly or unnecessarily complicate[d]” and do not “unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders.” American Power & Light Co. v. SEC, 329 U.S. 90, 104. We have approved the wartime conferral of agency power to fix the prices of commodities at a level that “will be generally fair and equitable and will effectuate the [in some respects conflicting] purposes of th[e] Act.” Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 420, 423-426 (1944). And we have found an “intelligible principle” in various statutes authorizing regulation in the “public interest.” See, e.g., National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 225-226 (1943) (Federal Communications Commission's power to regulate airwaves); New York Central Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24-25 (1932) (Interstate Commerce Commission's power to approve railroad consolidations). In short, we have “almost never felt qualified to second-guess Congress regarding the permissible degree of policy judgment that can be left to those executing or applying the law.” Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 416 (1989) (Scalia, J., dissenting); see id., at 373 (majority opinion).

It is true enough that the degree of agency discretion that is acceptable varies according to the scope of the power congressionally conferred. See Loving v. United States, 517 U.S., at 772-773; United States v. Mazurie, 419 U.S. 544, 556-557 (1975). While Congress need not provide any direction to the EPA regarding the manner in which it is to define “country elevators,” which are to be exempt from new-stationary-source regulations governing grain elevators, see 42 U.S.C. § 7411(i), it must provide substantial guidance on setting air standards that affect the entire national economy. But even in sweeping regulatory schemes we have never demanded, as the Court of Appeals did here, that statutes provide a “determinate criterion” for saying “how much [of the regulated harm] is too much.” 175 F.3d, at 1034. In Touby, for example, we did not require the statute to decree how “imminent” was too imminent, or how “necessary” was necessary enough, or even – most relevant here – how “hazardous” was too hazardous. 500 U.S., at 165-167. Similarly, the statute at issue in Lichter authorized agencies to recoup “excess profits” paid under wartime Government contracts, yet we did not insist that Congress specify how much profit was too much. 334 U.S., at 783-786. It is therefore not conclusive for delegation purposes that, as respondents argue, ozone and particulate matter are “nonthreshold” pollutants that inflict a continuum of adverse health effects at any airborne concentration greater than zero, and hence require the EPA to make judgments of degree. “[A] certain degree of discretion, and thus of lawmaking, inheres in most executive or judicial action.” Mistretta v. United States, supra, at 417 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (emphasis deleted); see 488 U.S., at 378-379 (majority opinion). Section 109(b)(1) of the CAA, which to repeat we interpret as requiring the EPA to set air quality standards at the level that is “requisite,” that is, not lower or higher than is necessary – to protect the public health with an adequate margin of safety, fits comfortably within the scope of discretion permitted by our precedent.
§ 9.3 Legislative Attempts to Control Delegated Power

With the rise of the administrative state during the New Deal in the 1930s, Congress began to pass a number of laws delegating power to administrative officials whose action could be set aside by a later veto by both Houses of Congress, one House of Congress, or, occasionally, a legislative committee. This was done by Congress to try to preserve some legislative control over the broad delegations which were being made. By the 1980s, roughly 300 such veto provisions had been passed in roughly 200 statutes. This practice was declared unconstitutional in INS v. Chadha.

Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) v. Chadha
462 U.S. 919 (1983)

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari in Nos. 80-2170 and 80-2171, and postponed consideration of the question of jurisdiction in No. 80-1832. Each presents a challenge to the constitutionality of the provision in § 244(c)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 66 Stat. 216, as amended, 8 U.S.C. § 1254(c)(2), authorizing one House of Congress, by resolution, to invalidate the decision of the Executive Branch, pursuant to authority delegated by Congress to the Attorney General of the United States, to allow a particular deportable alien to remain in the United States.

After the House veto of the Attorney General's decision to allow Chadha to remain in the United States, the Immigration Judge reopened the deportation proceedings to implement the House order deporting Chadha. Chadha moved to terminate the proceedings on the ground that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional. The Immigration Judge held that he had no authority to rule on the constitutional validity of § 244(c)(2). On November 8, 1976, Chadha was ordered deported pursuant to the House action.

Chadha appealed the deportation order to the Board of Immigration Appeals, again contending that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional. The Board held that it had "no power to declare unconstitutional an act of Congress" and Chadha's appeal was dismissed. App. 55-56.

Pursuant to § 106(a) of the Act, 8 U. S. C. § 1105a(a), Chadha filed a petition for review of the deportation order in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The Immigration and Naturalization Service agreed with Chadha's position before the Court of Appeals and joined him in arguing that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional. In light of the importance of the question, the Court of Appeals invited both the Senate and the House of Representatives to file briefs amici curiae.

After full briefing and oral argument, the Court of Appeals held that the House was without constitutional authority to order Chadha's deportation; accordingly it directed the Attorney General "to cease and desist from taking any steps to deport this alien based upon the resolution enacted by the House of Representatives." 634 F.2d 408, 436 (1980). The essence of its holding was that § 244(c)(2) violates the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.
We granted certiorari in Nos. 80-2170 and 80-2171, and postponed consideration of our jurisdiction over the appeal in No. 80-1832, 454 U.S. 812 (1981), and we now affirm.

Congress . . . contends that the provision for the one-House veto in § 244(c)(2) cannot be severed from § 244. Congress argues that if the provision for the one-House veto is held unconstitutional, all of § 244 must fall. If § 244 in its entirety is violative of the Constitution, it follows that the Attorney General has no authority to suspend Chadha's deportation under § 244(a)(1) and Chadha would be deported. From this, Congress argues that Chadha lacks standing to challenge the constitutionality of the one-House veto provision because he could receive no relief even if his constitutional challenge proves successful.

Only recently this Court reaffirmed that the invalid portions of a statute are to be severed “[u]nless it is evident that the Legislature would not have enacted those provisions which are within its power, independently of that which is not.” Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 108 (1976), quoting Champlin Refining Co. v. Corporation Comm'n, 286 U.S. 210, 234 (1932). Here, however, we need not embark on that elusive inquiry since Congress itself has provided the answer to the question of severability in § 406 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1101 note, which provides: “If any particular provision of this Act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.” (Emphasis added.)

This language is unambiguous and gives rise to a presumption that Congress did not intend the validity of the Act as a whole, or of any part of the Act, to depend upon whether the veto clause of § 244(c)(2) was invalid. The one-House veto provision in § 244(c)(2) is clearly a “particular provision” of the Act as that language is used in the severability clause. Congress clearly intended “the remainder of the Act” to stand if “any particular provision” were held invalid. Congress could not have more plainly authorized the presumption that the provision for a one-House veto in § 244(c)(2) is severable from the remainder of § 244 and the Act of which it is a part. See Electric Bond & Share Co. v. SEC, 303 U.S. 419, 434 (1938).

The presumption as to the severability of the one-House veto provision in § 244(c)(2) is supported by the legislative history of § 244. That section and its precursors supplanted the long established pattern of dealing with deportations like Chadha's on a case-by-case basis through private bills. Although it may be that Congress was reluctant to delegate final authority over cancellation of deportations, such reluctance is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of severability raised by § 406.

It is also contended that this is not a genuine controversy but "a friendly, non-adversary, proceeding," Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S., at 346 (Brandeis, J., concurring), upon which the Court should not pass. This argument rests on the fact that Chadha and the INS take the same position on the constitutionality of the one-House veto. But it would be a curious result if, in the administration of justice, a person could be denied access to the courts because the Attorney General of the United States agreed with the legal arguments asserted by the individual.
A case or controversy is presented by these cases. First, from the time of Congress' formal intervention, see n.5, supra, the concrete adverseness is beyond doubt. Congress is both a proper party to defend the constitutionality of § 244(c)(2) and a proper petitioner under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1). Second, prior to Congress' intervention, there was adequate Art. III adverseness even though the only parties were the INS and Chadha. We have already held that the INS's agreement with the Court of Appeals' decision that § 244(c)(2) is unconstitutional does not affect that agency's "aggrieved" status for purposes of appealing that decision under 28 U.S.C. § 1252, see supra, at 929-931. For similar reasons, the INS's agreement with Chadha's position does not alter the fact that the INS would have deported Chadha absent the Court of Appeals' judgment. We agree with the Court of Appeals that "Chadha has asserted a concrete controversy, and our decision will have real meaning: if we rule for Chadha, he will not be deported; if we uphold § 244(c)(2), the INS will execute its order and deport him." 634 F.2d, at 419.

Of course, there may be prudential, as opposed to Art. III, concerns about sanctioning the adjudication of these cases in the absence of any participant supporting the validity of § 244(c)(2). The Court of Appeals properly dispelled any such concerns by inviting and accepting briefs from both Houses of Congress. We have long held that Congress is the proper party to defend the validity of a statute when an agency of government, as a defendant charged with enforcing the statute, agrees with plaintiffs that the statute is inapplicable or unconstitutional. See Cheng Fan Kwok v. INS, 392 U.S., at 210, n. 9; United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946).

We turn now to the question whether action of one House of Congress under § 244(c)(2) violates strictures of the Constitution. We begin, of course, with the presumption that the challenged statute is valid. Its wisdom is not the concern of the courts; if a challenged action does not violate the Constitution, it must be sustained: "Once the meaning of an enactment is discerned and its constitutionality determined, the judicial process comes to an end. We do not sit as a committee of review, nor are we vested with the power of veto." TVA v. Hill, 437 U.S. 153, 194-195 (1978).

By the same token, the fact that a given law or procedure is efficient, convenient, and useful in facilitating functions of government, standing alone, will not save it if it is contrary to the Constitution. Convenience and efficiency are not the primary objectives – or the hallmarks – of democratic government and our inquiry is sharpened rather than blunted by the fact that congressional veto provisions are appearing with increasing frequency in statutes which delegate authority to executive and independent agencies:

"Since 1932, when the first veto provision was enacted into law, 295 congressional veto-type procedures have been inserted in 196 different statutes as follows: from 1932 to 1939, five statutes were affected; from 1940-49, nineteen statutes; between 1950-59, thirty-four statutes; and from 1960-69, forty-nine. From the year 1970 through 1975, at least one hundred sixty-three such provisions visions were included in eighty-nine laws." Abourezk, The Congressional Veto: A Contemporary Response to Executive Encroachment on Legislative Prerogatives, 52 Ind. L. Rev. 323, 324 (1977).
Justice White undertakes to make a case for the proposition that the one-House veto is a useful "political invention," and we need not challenge that assertion. We can even concede this utilitarian argument although the long-range political wisdom of this "invention" is arguable. It has been vigorously debated, and it is instructive to compare the views of the protagonists. See, e.g., Javits & Klein, Congressional Oversight and the Legislative Veto: A Constitutional Analysis, 52 N. Y. U. L. Rev. 455 (1977), and Martin, The Legislative Veto and the Responsible Exercise of Congressional Power, 68 Va. L. Rev. 253 (1982). But policy arguments supporting even useful "political inventions" are subject to the demands of the Constitution which defines powers and, with respect to this subject, sets out just how those powers are to be exercised.

Explicit and unambiguous provisions of the Constitution prescribe and define the respective functions of the Congress and of the Executive in the legislative process.

The purposes underlying the Presentment Clauses, Art. I, § 7, cls. 2, 3, and the bicameral requirement of Art. I, § 1, and § 7, cl. 2, guide our resolution of the important question presented in these cases. The very structure of the Articles delegating and separating powers under Arts. I, II, and III exemplifies the concept of separation of powers, and we now turn to Art. I.

The records of the Constitutional Convention reveal that the requirement that all legislation be presented to the President before becoming law was uniformly accepted by the Framers. Presentment to the President and the Presidential veto were considered so imperative that the draftsmen took special pains to assure that these requirements could not be circumvented. During the final debate on Art. I, § 7, cl. 2, James Madison expressed concern that it might easily be evaded by the simple expedient of calling a proposed law a "resolution" or "vote" rather than a "bill." 2 Farrand 301-302. As a consequence, Art. I, § 7, cl. 3, supra, at 945-946, was added. 2 Farrand 304-305.

The decision to provide the President with a limited and qualified power to nullify proposed legislation by veto was based on the profound conviction of the Framers that the powers conferred on Congress were the powers to be most carefully circumscribed. It is beyond doubt that lawmaking was a power to be shared by both Houses and the President. In The Federalist No. 73 (H. Lodge ed. 1888), Hamilton focused on the President's role in making laws: "If even no propensity had ever discovered itself in the legislative body to invade the rights of the Executive, the rules of just reasoning and theoretic propriety would of themselves teach us that the one ought not to be left to the mercy of the other, but ought to possess a constitutional and effectual power of self-defence." Id., at 458. See also The Federalist No. 51. In his Commentaries on the Constitution, Joseph Story makes the same point. 1 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 614-615 (3d ed. 1858).

The President's role in the lawmaker process also reflects the Framers' careful efforts to check whatever propensity a particular Congress might have to enact oppressive, improvident, or ill-considered measures.

The Court also has observed that the Presentment Clauses serve the important purpose of assuring that a "national" perspective is grafted on the legislative process: "The President is a representative of the people just as the members of the Senate and of the House are, and it may be, at some times, on some subjects, that the President elected by all the people is rather more representative of them all than are the members of either body of the Legislature whose constituencies are local and not countrywide . . . ." Myers v. United States, supra, at 123.

The bicameral requirement of Art. I, §§ 1, 7, was of scarcely less concern to the Framers than was the Presidential veto and indeed the two concepts are interdependent. By providing that no law could take effect without the concurrence of the prescribed majority of the Members of both Houses, the Framers reemphasized their belief, already remarked upon in connection with the Presentment Clauses, that legislation should not be enacted unless it has been carefully and fully considered by the Nation's elected officials.

We see therefore that the Framers were acutely conscious that the bicameral requirement and the Presentment Clauses would serve essential constitutional functions. The President's participation in the legislative process was to protect the Executive Branch from Congress and to protect the whole people from improvident laws. The division of the Congress into two distinctive bodies assures that the legislative power would be exercised only after opportunity for full study and debate in separate settings. The President's unilateral veto power, in turn, was limited by the power of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress to overrule a veto thereby precluding final arbitrary action of one person. See id., at 99-104. It emerges clearly that the prescription for legislative action in Art. I, §§ 1, 7, represents the Framers' decision that the legislative power of the Federal Government be exercised in accord with a single, finely wrought and exhaustively considered, procedure.

Beginning with this presumption, we must nevertheless establish that the challenged action under § 244(c)(2) is of the kind to which the procedural requirements of Art. I, § 7, apply. Not every action taken by either House is subject to the bicameralism and presentment requirements of Art. I. [Ed.: The Court noted each House has the power to determine its own internal procedures. Non-binding resolutions by one or both Houses, such as occasional "sense of the Senate resolutions" or Congress declaring the first Thursday of May "National Day of Prayer," would be other examples where the action does not involve "legislative power" because no legal rights are implicated]. Whether actions taken by either House are, in law and fact, an exercise of legislative power depends not on their form but upon "whether they contain matter which is properly to be regarded as legislative in its character and effect." S. Rep. No. 1335, 54th Cong., 2d Sess., 8 (1897).

Examination of the action taken here by one House pursuant to § 244(c)(2) reveals that it was essentially legislative in purpose and effect. In purporting to exercise power defined in Art. I, § 8, cl. 4, to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization," the House took action that had the purpose and effect of altering the legal rights, duties, and relations of persons, including the Attorney General, Executive Branch officials and Chadha, all outside the Legislative Branch. Section 244(c)(2) purports to authorize one House of Congress to require the Attorney General to deport an individual alien whose deportation otherwise would be canceled under § 244. The one-House veto operated in these cases to overrule the Attorney General and mandate Chadha's deportation; absent the House action, Chadha would remain in the United States.
Finally, we see that when the Framers intended to authorize either House of Congress to act alone and outside of its prescribed bicameral legislative role, they narrowly and precisely defined the procedure . . . . There are four provisions in the Constitution, explicit and unambiguous, by which one House may act alone with the unreviewable force of law, not subject to the President's veto:

(a) The House of Representatives alone was given the power to initiate impeachments. Art. I, § 2, cl. 5;

(b) The Senate alone was given the power to conduct trials following impeachment on charges initiated by the House and to convict following trial. Art. I, § 3, cl. 6;

(c) The Senate alone was given final unreviewable power to approve or to disapprove Presidential appointments. Art. II, § 2, cl. 2;

(d) The Senate alone was given unreviewable power to ratify treaties negotiated by the President. Art. II, § 2, cl. 2.

Clearly, when the Draftsmen sought to confer special powers on one House, independent of the other House, or of the President, they did so in explicit, unambiguous terms. These carefully defined exceptions from presentment and bicameralism underscore the difference between the legislative functions of Congress and other unilateral but important and binding one-House acts provided for in the Constitution. These exceptions are narrow, explicit, and separately justified; none of them authorize the action challenged here. On the contrary, they provide further support for the conclusion that congressional authority is not to be implied and for the conclusion that the veto provided for in § 244(c)(2) is not authorized by the constitutional design of the powers of the Legislative Branch.

We hold that the congressional veto provision in § 244(c)(2) is severable from the Act and that it is unconstitutional. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

Justice POWELL, concurring in the judgment.

The Court's decision, based on the Presentment Clauses, Art. I, § 7, cls. 2 and 3, apparently will invalidate every use of the legislative veto. The breadth of this holding gives one pause. Congress has included the veto in literally hundreds of statutes, dating back to the 1930's. Congress clearly views this procedure as essential to controlling the delegation of power to administrative agencies. One reasonably may disagree with Congress' assessment of the veto's utility, but the respect due its judgment as a coordinate branch of Government cautions that our holding should be no more extensive than necessary to decide these cases. In my view, the cases may be decided on a narrower ground. When Congress finds that a particular person does not satisfy the statutory criteria for permanent residence in this country it has assumed a judicial function in violation of the principle of separation of powers. Accordingly, I concur only in the judgment.

On its face, the House's action appears clearly adjudicatory. The House did not enact a general rule; rather it made its own determination that six specific persons did not comply with certain statutory criteria. It thus undertook the type of decision that traditionally has been left to other branches. [Ed.: E.g., prohibition on bills of attainder, addressed at § 16.2.2] Even if the House did not make a de novo determination, but simply reviewed the Immigration and Naturalization Service's findings, it still assumed a function ordinarily entrusted to the federal courts. See 5 U. S. C. § 704 (providing generally for judicial review of final agency action); cf. Foti v. INS, 375 U.S. 217 (1963) (holding that courts of appeals have jurisdiction to review INS decisions denying suspension of deportation). Where, as here, Congress has exercised a power "that cannot possibly be regarded as merely in aid of the legislative function of Congress," Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S., at 138, the decisions of this Court have held that Congress impermissibly assumed a function that the Constitution entrusted to another branch, see id., at 138-141; cf. Springer v. Philippine Islands, 277 U.S., at 202.

Justice WHITE, dissenting.

Today the Court not only invalidates § 244(c)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, but also sounds the death knell for nearly 200 other statutory provisions in which Congress has reserved a "legislative veto." For this reason, the Court's decision is of surpassing importance. And it is for this reason that the Court would have been well advised to decide the cases, if possible, on the narrower grounds of separation of powers, leaving for full consideration the constitutionality of other congressional review statutes operating on such varied matters as war powers and agency rulemaking, some of which concern the independent regulatory agencies.

The prominence of the legislative veto mechanism in our contemporary political system and its importance to Congress can hardly be overstated. It has become a central means by which Congress secures the accountability of executive and independent agencies. Without the legislative veto, Congress is faced with a Hobson's choice: either to refrain from delegating the necessary authority, leaving itself with a hopeless task of writing laws with the requisite specificity to cover endless special circumstances across the entire policy landscape, or in the alternative, to abdicate its law-making function to the Executive Branch and independent agencies. To choose the former leaves major national problems unresolved; to opt for the latter risks unaccountable policymaking by those not elected to fill that role. Accordingly, over the past five decades, the legislative veto has been placed in nearly 200 statutes. The device is known in every field of governmental concern: reorganization, budgets, foreign affairs, war powers, and regulation of trade, safety, energy, the environment, and the economy.

For all these reasons, the apparent sweep of the Court's decision today is regrettable. The Court's Art. I analysis appears to invalidate all legislative vetoes irrespective of form or subject. Because the legislative veto is commonly found as a check upon rulemaking by administrative agencies and upon broad-based policy decisions of the Executive Branch, it is particularly unfortunate that the Court reaches its decision in cases involving the exercise of a veto over deportation decisions regarding particular individuals. Courts should always be wary of striking statutes as unconstitutional; to strike an entire class of statutes based on consideration of a somewhat atypical and more readily indictable exemplar of the class is irresponsible. It was for cases such as these that Justice Brandeis wrote: "The Court has frequently called attention to the 'great gravity and delicacy' of its function in passing upon the validity of an act of Congress . . . . The Court will not 'formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied.' Liverpool, N. Y. & P.S.S. Co. v. Emigration Commissioners, [113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885)]." Ashwander *v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 345, 347 (1936) (concurring opinion).

Unfortunately, today's holding is not so limited.

If Congress may delegate lawmaking power to independent and Executive agencies, it is most difficult to understand Art. I as prohibiting Congress from also reserving a check on legislative power for itself. Absent the veto, the agencies receiving delegations of legislative or quasi-legislative power may issue regulations having the force of law without bicameral approval and without the President's signature. It is thus not apparent why the reservation of a veto over the exercise of that legislative power must be subject to a more exacting test. In both cases, it is enough that the initial statutory authorizations comply with the Art. I requirements.

Nor are there strict limits on the agents that may receive such delegations of legislative authority so that it might be said that the Legislature can delegate authority to others but not to itself. While most authority to issue rules and regulations is given to the Executive Branch and the independent regulatory agencies, statutory delegations to private persons have also passed this Court's scrutiny. In Currin v. Wallace, 306 U.S. 1 (1939), the statute provided that restrictions upon the production or marketing of agricultural commodities was to become effective only upon the favorable vote by a prescribed majority of the affected farmers. United States v. Rock Royal Co-operative, Inc., 307 U.S. 533, 577 (1939), upheld an Act which gave producers of specified commodities the right to veto marketing orders issued by the Secretary of Agriculture. Assuming Currin and Rock Royal Cooperative remain sound law, the Court's decision today suggests that Congress may place a "veto" power over suspensions of deportation in private hands or in the hands of an independent agency, but is forbidden to reserve such authority for itself. Perhaps this odd result could be justified on other constitutional grounds, such as the separation of powers, but certainly it cannot be defended as consistent with the Court's view of the Art. I presentment and bicameralism commands.

The central concern of the presentation and bicameralism requirements of Article I is that when a departure from the legal status quo is undertaken, it is done with the approval of the President and both Houses of Congress – or, in the event of a presidential veto, a two-thirds majority in both Houses. This interest is fully satisfied by the operation of § 244(c)(2). The President's approval is found in the Attorney General's action in recommending to Congress that the deportation order for a given alien be suspended. The House and the Senate indicate their approval of the Executive's action by not passing a resolution of disapproval within the statutory period. Thus, a change in the legal status quo – the deportability of the alien – is consummated only with the approval of each of the three relevant actors.

I do not suggest that all legislative vetoes are necessarily consistent with separation-of-powers principles. A legislative check on an inherently executive function, for example, that of initiating prosecutions, poses an entirely different question. But the legislative veto device here – and in many other settings – is far from an instance of legislative tyranny over the Executive. It is a necessary check on the unavoidably expanding power of the agencies, both Executive and independent, as they engage in exercising authority delegated by Congress.

I regret that I am in disagreement with my colleagues on the fundamental questions that these cases present. But even more I regret the destructive scope of the Court's holding. It reflects a profoundly different conception of the Constitution than that held by the courts which sanctioned the modern administrative state. Today's decision strikes down in one fell swoop provisions in more laws enacted by Congress than the Court has cumulatively invalidated in its history. I fear it will now be more difficult to "[insure] that the fundamental policy decisions in our society will be made not by an appointed official but by the body immediately responsible to the people," Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 626 (1963) (Harlan, J., dissenting in part). I must dissent.

[Justice White then included an Appendix which “identifies and describes briefly current statutory provisions for a legislative veto by one or both Houses of Congress. Statutory provisions for a veto by committees of the Congress and provisions which require legislation (i.e., passage of a joint resolution) are not included.”]

Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice WHITE joins, dissenting.

By severing [the legislative veto in] § 244(c)(2), the Court permits suspension of deportation in a class of cases where Congress never stated that suspension was appropriate. I do not believe we should expand the statute in this way without some clear indication that Congress intended such an expansion.

The Court finds that the legislative history of § 244 shows that Congress intended § 244(c)(2) to be severable because Congress wanted to relieve itself of the burden of private bills. But the history elucidated by the Court shows that Congress was unwilling to give the Executive Branch permission to suspend deportation on its own. Over the years, Congress consistently rejected requests from the Executive for complete discretion in this area. Congress always insisted on retaining ultimate control, whether by concurrent resolution, as in the 1948 Act, or by one-House veto, as in the present Act. Congress has never indicated that it would be willing to permit suspensions of deportation unless it could retain some sort of veto.

It is doubtless true that Congress has the power to provide for suspensions of deportation without a one-House veto. But the Court has failed to identify any evidence that Congress intended to exercise that power. On the contrary, Congress' continued insistence on retaining control of the suspension process indicates that it has never been disposed to give the Executive Branch a free hand. By severing § 244(c)(2) the Court has "confounded" Congress' "intention" to permit suspensions of deportation "with their power to carry that intention into effect." Davis, supra, at 484, quoting State ex rel. McNeal v. Dombaugh, 20 Ohio St. 167, 174 (1870).

Because I do not believe that § 244(c)(2) is severable, I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.
Focusing on the checks and balances concern of efficiency, Justice White noted that without the legislative veto, Congress must write more specific laws, abdicate its lawmaking function, or engage in oversight hearings and investigations, corrective legislation, or sunset laws – none of which are as satisfactory as the legislative veto. Justice Burger replied that administrative delegations are checked by legislative standards and judicial review, whereas there would be no such check here, thus raising a greater specter of legislative tyranny, the other checks and balances concern. Furthermore, where the text of the Constitution is so clear, it outweighs any checks and balances arguments of efficiency or arguments based on legislative and executive practice.

Chief Justice Burger also noted in Chadha that other mechanisms, such as durational limits on authorizations and reporting requirements, could be used to ensure efficient government action. In addition, congressional oversight, including either threatening to, or actually, holding hearings on agency action, including subpoena power to compel testimony, or using Congress’ appropriation power to reduce an agency’s budget, are steps Congress can take to affect the agency’s use of delegated power. Without regard to the efficiency of these indirect means of oversight, it has been questioned whether in all circumstances such committee oversight will reflect accurately the view of Congress as a whole, particularly in cases where the executive branch chooses to withhold information from Congress that Congress thinks it needs to make an informed evaluation.

In 1995, Congress passed the Congressional Review Act (CRA), which allows any member of the House or Senate to introduce a resolution of disapproval against a final agency rule. If passed and signed by the President, a CRA resolution knocks out the rule. In addition, the CRA requires all rules to be submitted to Congress before they take effect. This mechanism has not often been used. For example, in 1999, it was noted, “To date, only a few CRA resolutions of disapproval have been introduced and none have been passed by either House. There are many reasons for this, including Congress' institutional hesitance to adopt the CRA's new procedures and the fact that a resolution of disapproval requires the same groundwork as ordinary legislation or appropriations riders.”42 In particular, as for any bill, such action requires the President’s approval, or else his veto overridden by a 2/3 vote in each house of Congress. To the extent that the agency action reflects the President’s views, the President may well veto any attempted change by Congress, although if the change is attached to a general appropriations bill the President wishes to sign, a veto may be more unlikely.

§ 9.4 Legislative Attempts to Enhance Executive Power

The Line-Item Veto Act of 1996 gave the President authority to "cancel in whole" three types of provisions that have been signed into law: "(1) any dollar amount of discretionary budget authority; (2) any item of new direct spending; or (3) any limited tax benefit." The Act set forth a detailed expedited procedure for the consideration by Congress of a “disapproved bill.” These procedures basically involved re-passing the bill without giving the President a line-item veto power this time around.43 This “line-item” veto differs from the regular presidential veto, which is authorized by the Presentment Clause of Article 1, § 7, cl. 2, in that it occurs after the bill becomes law, and it cancels “in whole” only some of the provisions in the law. No constitutional text explicitly authorizes such presidential action that repeals or amends parts of duly enacted statutes.

In Clinton v. City of New York,44 excerpted below, a 6-3 Court declared the law unconstitutional on the ground that the procedures specified in the Act were not authorized by the Constitution. The Court noted that the Constitution has clear language in Article 1, § 7, cl. 2 giving the President the power to veto entire bills, not exercise a line-item veto power. Constitutional text simply does not authorize Congress and the President to create a different law than one whose text was voted on by both Houses and presented to the President for signature, even if such a line-item veto power would be efficient for the President to have, a power which 43 of 50 Governors have under state constitutions. As in Chadha, the text of the Constitution was sufficiently clear that it outweighed any contrary arguments based on general structural efficiency versus prevention of tyranny concerns, or on legislative and executive practice.

An interesting mix of three Justices concluded that the textual arguments were not sufficiently clear, and that general separation of powers doctrine supported the Line-Item Veto Act. Justice Scalia’s dissent, joined by Justice O’Connor and Justice Breyer, said that the Court had been misled by the title of the law since the action it authorizes is, in fact, not a line-item veto that would trigger concerns of consistency with the presentment clause of Article 1, §7, cl.2. Instead, Justice Scalia said, the statute was actually a form of executive impoundment of funds – a practice long approved by the Court, as in the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974.\textsuperscript{45} In response, the Court majority noted that unlike an impoundment of certain funds for a specified period of time, this Act permitted the President to cancel an appropriation of funds, and thus was more like an impermissible line-item veto, than a mere limited impoundment of funds.\textsuperscript{46}

Clinton v. City of New York

The Line Item Veto Act (Act), 110 Stat. 1200, 2 U.S.C. § 691 et seq. (1994 ed., Supp. II), was enacted in April 1996 and became effective on January 1, 1997. The following day, six Members of Congress who had voted against the Act brought suit in the District Court for the District of Columbia challenging its constitutionality. On April 10, 1997, the District Court entered an order holding that the Act is unconstitutional. Byrd v. Raines, 956 F. Supp. 25. In obedience to the statutory direction to allow a direct, expedited appeal to this Court, see §§ 692(b)-(c), we promptly noted probable jurisdiction and expedited review. We determined, however, that the Members of Congress did not have standing to sue because they had not "alleged a sufficiently concrete injury to have established Article III standing," Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 830 (1997) (slip op., at 18); thus, "in . . . light of [the] overriding and time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary's power within its proper constitutional sphere," id., at (slip op., at 8), we remanded the case to the District Court with instructions to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction.

Less than two months after our decision in that case, the President exercised his authority to cancel one provision in the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, Pub. L. 105-33, 111 Stat. 251, 515, and two provisions in the Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997, Pub. L. 105-34, 111 Stat. 788, 895-896, 990-993. Appellees, claiming that they had been injured by two of those cancellations, filed these cases in the District Court. That Court again held the statute invalid, 985 F. Supp. 168, 177-182 (1998), and we again expedited our review. We now hold that these appellees have standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Act and, reaching the merits, we agree that the cancellation procedures set forth in the Act violate the Presentment Clause, Art. I, § 7, cl. 2, of the Constitution.

[Ed.: The Court first held the parties had standing because each was denied a benefit – either a tax break or a government subsidy – by the President’s action.]

\textsuperscript{45} Id. at 464-69 (Scalia, J., joined by O’Connor, J., and joined in part by Breyer, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), citing, inter alia, Train v. City of New York, 420 U.S. 35, 41 n.8 (1975) (discussing the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974).

\textsuperscript{46} Id. at 442-47.
The Line Item Veto Act gives the President the power to "cancel in whole" three types of provisions that have been signed into law: "(1) any dollar amount of discretionary budget authority; (2) any item of new direct spending; or (3) any limited tax benefit." 2 U.S.C. § 691(a) (1994 ed., Supp. II).

It is undisputed that the New York case involves an "item of new direct spending" and that the Snake River case involves a "limited tax benefit" as those terms are defined in the Act. It is also undisputed that each of those provisions had been signed into law pursuant to Article I, § 7, of the Constitution before it was canceled.

The Act requires the President to adhere to precise procedures whenever he exercises his cancellation authority. In identifying items for cancellation he must consider the legislative history, the purposes, and other relevant information about the items. See 2 U.S.C. § 691(b) (1994 ed., Supp. II). He must determine, with respect to each cancellation, that it will "(I) reduce the Federal budget deficit; (ii) not impair any essential Government functions; and (iii) not harm the national interest." § 691(a)(A). Moreover, he must transmit a special message to Congress notifying it of each cancellation within five calendar days (excluding Sundays) after the enactment of the canceled provision. See § 691(a)(B). It is undisputed that the President meticulously followed these procedures in these cases.

A cancellation takes effect upon receipt by Congress of the special message from the President. See § 691b(a). If, however, a "disapproval bill" pertaining to a special message is enacted into law, the cancellations set forth in that message become "null and void." Ibid. The Act sets forth a detailed expedited procedure for the consideration of a "disapproval bill," see § 691d, but no such bill was passed for either of the cancellations involved in these cases. A majority vote of both Houses is sufficient to enact a disapproval bill. The Act does not grant the President the authority to cancel a disapproval bill, see § 691(c), but he does, of course, retain his constitutional authority to veto such a bill.

The effect of a cancellation is plainly stated in § 691e, which defines the principal terms used in the Act. With respect to both an item of new direct spending and a limited tax benefit, the cancellation prevents the item "from having legal force or effect." 2 U.S.C. §§ 691e(4)(B)-(C) (1994 ed., Supp. II). Thus, under the plain text of the statute, the two actions of the President that are challenged in these cases prevented one section of the Balanced Budget Act of 1997 and one section of the Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997 "from having legal force or effect." The remaining provisions of those statutes, with the exception of the second canceled item in the latter, continue to have the same force and effect as they had when signed into law.

In both legal and practical effect, the President has amended two Acts of Congress by repealing a portion of each. "Repeal of statutes, no less than enactment, must conform with Art. I." INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 954 (1983). There is no provision in the Constitution that authorizes the President to enact, to amend, or to repeal statutes. Both Article I and Article II assign responsibilities to the President that directly relate to the lawmaking process, but neither addresses the issue presented by these cases. The President "shall from time to time give to the Congress Information on the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient . . . ." Art. II, § 3. Thus, he may initiate and influence legislative proposals.

Moreover, after a bill has passed both Houses of Congress, but "before it becomes a Law," it must be presented to the President. If he approves it, "he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it." Art. I, § 7, cl. 2. His "return" of a bill, which is usually described as a "veto," is subject to being overridden by a two-thirds vote in each House.

There are important differences between the President's "return" of a bill pursuant to Article I, § 7, and the exercise of the President's cancellation authority pursuant to the Line Item Veto Act. The constitutional return takes place before the bill becomes law; the statutory cancellation occurs after the bill becomes law. The constitutional return is of the entire bill; the statutory cancellation is of only a part. Although the Constitution expressly authorizes the President to play a role in the process of enacting statutes, it is silent on the subject of unilateral Presidential action that either repeals or amends parts of duly enacted statutes.

There are powerful reasons for construing constitutional silence on this profoundly important issue as equivalent to an express prohibition. The procedures governing the enactment of statutes set forth in the text of Article I were the product of the great debates and compromises that produced the Constitution itself. Familiar historical materials provide abundant support for the conclusion that the power to enact statutes may only "be exercised in accord with a single, finely wrought and exhaustively considered, procedure." Chadha, 462 U.S. at 951. Our first President understood the text of the Presentment Clause as requiring that he either "approve all the parts of a Bill, or reject it in toto." What has emerged in these cases from the President's exercise of his statutory cancellation powers, however, are truncated versions of two bills that passed both Houses of Congress. They are not the product of the "finely wrought" procedure that the Framers designed.

Neither are we persuaded by the Government's contention that the President's authority to cancel new direct spending and tax benefit items is no greater than his traditional authority to decline to spend appropriated funds. The Government has reviewed in some detail the series of statutes in which Congress has given the Executive broad discretion over the expenditure of appropriated funds. For example, the First Congress appropriated "sums not exceeding" specified amounts to be spent on various Government operations. See, e.g., Act of Sept. 29, 1789, ch. 23, § 1, 1 Stat. 95; Act of Mar. 26, 1790, ch. 4, § 1, 1 Stat. 104; Act of Feb. 11, 1791, ch. 6, 1 Stat. 190. In those statutes, as in later years, the President was given wide discretion with respect to both the amounts to be spent and how the money would be allocated among different functions. It is argued that the Line Item Veto Act merely confers comparable discretionary authority over the expenditure of appropriated funds. The critical difference between this statute and all of its predecessors, however, is that unlike any of them, this Act gives the President the unilateral power to change the text of duly enacted statutes. None of the Act's predecessors could even arguably have been construed to authorize such a change.

Although appellees challenge the validity of the Act on alternative grounds, the only issue we address concerns the "finely wrought" procedure commanded by the Constitution. Chadha, 462 U.S. at 951. We have been favored with extensive debate about the scope of Congress' power to delegate law-making authority, or its functional equivalent, to the President. The excellent briefs filed by the parties and their amici curiae have provided us with valuable historical information that illuminates the delegation issue but does not really bear on the narrow issue that is dispositive of these cases. Thus, because we conclude that the Act's cancellation provisions violate Article I, § 7, of the Constitution, we find it unnecessary to consider the District Court's alternative holding that the Act "impermissibly disrupts the balance of powers among the three branches of government." 985 F. Supp. at 179.

If there is to be a new procedure in which the President will play a different role in determining the final text of what may "become a law," such change must come not by legislation but through the amendment procedures set forth in Article V of the Constitution. Cf. U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 837 (1995).

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Justice KENNEDY, concurring.

A nation cannot plunder its own treasury without putting its Constitution and its survival in peril. The statute before us, then, is of first importance, for it seems undeniable the Act will tend to restrain persistent excessive spending. Nevertheless, for the reasons given by Justice Stevens in the opinion for the Court, the statute must be found invalid. Failure of political will does not justify unconstitutional remedies.

Separation of powers was designed to implement a fundamental insight: concentration of power in the hands of a single branch is a threat to liberty. The Federalist states the axiom in these explicit terms: "The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands . . . may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny." The Federalist No. 47, p. 301 (C. Rossiter ed., 1961). So convinced were the Framers that liberty of the person inheres in structure that at first they did not consider a Bill of Rights necessary. The Federalist No. 84, pp. 513, 515; G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic 1776-1787, pp. 536-543 (1969). It was at Madison's insistence that the First Congress enacted the Bill of Rights. R. Goldwin, From Parchment to Power 75-153 (1997). It would be a grave mistake, however, to think a Bill of Rights in Madison's scheme then or in sound constitutional theory now renders separation of powers of lesser importance. See Amar, The Bill of Rights as a Constitution, 100 Yale L. J. 1131, 1132 (1991).

In recent years, perhaps, we have come to think of liberty as defined by that word in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and as illuminated by the other provisions of the Bill of Rights. The conception of liberty embraced by the Framers was not so confined. They used the principles of separation of powers and federalism to secure liberty in the fundamental political sense of the term, quite in addition to the idea of freedom from intrusive governmental acts. The idea and the promise were that when the people delegate some degree of control to a remote central authority, one branch of government ought not possess the power to shape their destiny without a sufficient check from the other two. In this vision, liberty demands limits on the ability of any one branch to influence basic political decisions. Quoting Montesquieu, the Federalist Papers made the point in the following manner:
"'When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body,' says he, 'there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner.' Again: 'Were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator: Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor.'" The Federalist No. 47, supra, at 303.

It follows that if a citizen who is taxed has the measure of the tax or the decision to spend determined by the Executive alone, without adequate control by the citizen's Representatives in Congress, liberty is threatened. Money is the instrument of policy and policy affects the lives of citizens. The individual loses liberty in a real sense if that instrument is not subject to traditional constitutional constraints.

The principal object of the statute, it is true, was not to enhance the President's power to reward one group and punish another, to help one set of taxpayers and hurt another, to favor one State and ignore another. Yet these are its undeniable effects. The law establishes a new mechanism which gives the President the sole ability to hurt a group that is a visible target, in order to disfavor the group or to extract further concessions from Congress. The law is the functional equivalent of a line item veto and enhances the President's powers beyond what the Framers would have endorsed.

It is no answer, of course, to say that Congress surrendered its authority by its own hand; nor does it suffice to point out that a new statute, signed by the President or enacted over his veto, could restore to Congress the power it now seeks to relinquish. That a congressional cession of power is voluntary does not make it innocuous. The Constitution is a compact enduring for more than our time, and one Congress cannot yield up its own powers, much less those of other Congresses to follow. See Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 880 (1991); cf. Chadha, supra, at 942, n.13. Abdication of responsibility is not part of the constitutional design.

. . . By increasing the power of the President beyond what the Framers envisioned, the statute compromises the political liberty of our citizens, liberty which the separation of powers seeks to secure.

The Constitution is not bereft of controls over improvident spending. Federalism is one safeguard, for political accountability is easier to enforce within the States than nationwide. The other principal mechanism, of course, is control of the political branches by an informed and responsible electorate. Whether or not federalism and control by the electorate are adequate for the problem at hand, they are two of the structures the Framers designed for the problem the statute strives to confront. The Framers of the Constitution could not command statesmanship. They could simply provide structures from which it might emerge. The fact that these mechanisms, plus the proper functioning of the separation of powers itself, are not employed, or that they prove insufficient, cannot validate an otherwise unconstitutional device. With these observations, I join the opinion of the Court.
Justice SCALIA, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, and with whom Justice BREYER joins as to Part III, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with the Court that the New York appellees have standing to challenge the President's cancellation of § 4722(c) of the Balanced Budget Act of 1997 as an "item of new direct spending." The tax liability they will incur under New York law is a concrete and particularized injury, fairly traceable to the President's action, and avoided if that action is undone. Unlike the Court, however, I do not believe that Executive cancellation of this item of direct spending violates the Presentment Clause.

The Presentment Clause requires, in relevant part, that "every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it," U.S. Const., Art. I, § 7, cl. 2. There is no question that enactment of the Balanced Budget Act complied with these requirements: the House and Senate passed the bill, and the President signed it into law. It was only after the requirements of the Presentment Clause had been satisfied that the President exercised his authority under the Line Item Veto Act to cancel the spending item. Thus, the Court's problem with the Act is not that it authorizes the President to veto parts of a bill and sign others into law, but rather that it authorizes him to "cancel" – prevent from "having legal force or effect" – certain parts of duly enacted statutes.

Article I, § 7 of the Constitution obviously prevents the President from cancelling a law that Congress has not authorized him to cancel. Such action cannot possibly be considered part of his execution of the law, and if it is legislative action, as the Court observes, "repeal of statutes, no less than enactment, must conform with Art. I." Ante, quoting from INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 954 (1983). But that is not this case. It was certainly arguable, as an original matter, that Art. I, § 7 also prevents the President from cancelling a law which itself authorizes the President to cancel it. But as the Court acknowledges, that argument has long since been made and rejected. In 1809, Congress passed a law authorizing the President to cancel trade restrictions against Great Britain and France if either revoked edicts directed at the United States. Act of Mar. 1, 1809, § 11, 2 Stat. 528. Joseph Story regarded the conferral of that authority as entirely unremarkable in The Orono, 1 Gall. 137, 18 F. Cas. 830 (No. 10,585) (CCD Mass. 1812). The Tariff Act of 1890 authorized the President to "suspend, by proclamation to that effect" certain of its provisions if he determined that other countries were imposing "reciprocally unequal and unreasonable" duties. Act of Oct. 1, 1890, § 3, 26 Stat. 612. This Court upheld the constitutionality of that Act in Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649 (1892), reciting the history since 1798 of statutes conferring upon the President the power to, inter alia, "discontinue the prohibitions and restraints hereby enacted and declared," id., at 684, "suspend the operation of the aforesaid act," id., at 685, and "declare the provisions of this act to be inoperative," id., at 688.

As much as the Court goes on about Art. I, § 7, therefore, that provision does not demand the result the Court reaches. It no more categorically prohibits the Executive reduction of congressional dispositions in the course of implementing statutes that authorize such reduction, than it categorically prohibits the Executive augmentation of congressional dispositions in the course of implementing statutes that authorize such augmentation – generally known as substantive rulemaking. There are, to be sure, limits upon the former just as there are limits upon the latter – and I am prepared to acknowledge that the limits upon the former may be much more severe. Those limits are established, however, not by some categorical prohibition of Art. I, § 7, which our cases conclusively disprove, but by what has come to be known as the doctrine of unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority: When authorized Executive reduction or augmentation is allowed to go too far, it usurps the nondelegable function of Congress and violates the separation of powers.

I turn, then, to the crux of the matter: whether Congress's authorizing the President to cancel an item of spending gives him a power that our history and traditions show must reside exclusively in the Legislative Branch.

Insofar as the degree of political, "law-making" power conferred upon the Executive is concerned, there is not a dime's worth of difference between Congress's authorizing the President to cancel a spending item, and Congress's authorizing money to be spent on a particular item at the President's discretion. And the latter has been done since the Founding of the Nation.

The short of the matter is this: Had the Line Item Veto Act authorized the President to "decline to spend" any item of spending contained in the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, there is not the slightest doubt that authorization would have been constitutional. What the Line Item Veto Act does instead – authorizing the President to "cancel" an item of spending – is technically different. But the technical difference does not relate to the technicalities of the Presentment Clause, which have been fully complied with; and the doctrine of unconstitutional delegation, which is at issue here, is preeminently not a doctrine of technicalities. The title of the Line Item Veto Act, which was perhaps designed to simplify for public comprehension, or perhaps merely to comply with the terms of a campaign pledge, has succeeded in faking out the Supreme Court. The President's action it authorizes in fact is not a line-item veto and thus does not offend Art. I, § 7; and insofar as the substance of that action is concerned, it is no different from what Congress has permitted the President to do since the formation of the Union.

Justice BREYER, with whom Justice O'CONNOR and Justice SCALIA join as to Part III, dissenting.

II

I approach the constitutional question before us with three general considerations in mind. First, the Act represents a legislative effort to provide the President with the power to give effect to some, but not to all, of the expenditure and revenue-diminishing provisions contained in a single massive appropriations bill. And this objective is constitutionally proper.

When our Nation was founded, Congress could easily have provided the President with this kind of power.
At that time, a Congress, wishing to give a President the power to select among appropriations, could simply have embodied each appropriation in a separate bill, each bill subject to a separate Presidential veto.

Today, however, our population is about 250 million, see U.S. Dept. of Commerce, Census Bureau, 1990 Census, the Federal Government employs more than four million people, see Office of Management and Budget, Budget of the United States Government, Fiscal Year 1998: Analytical Perspectives 207 (1997) (hereinafter Analytical Perspectives), the annual federal budget is $ 1.5 trillion, see Office of Management and Budget, Budget of the United States Government, Fiscal Year 1998: Budget 303 (1997) (hereinafter Budget), and a typical budget appropriations bill may have a dozen titles, hundreds of sections, and spread across more than 500 pages of the Statutes at Large. See, e.g., Balanced Budget Act of 1997, Pub. L. 105-33, 111 Stat. 251. Congress cannot divide such a bill into thousands, or tens of thousands, of separate appropriations bills, each one of which the President would have to sign, or to veto, separately. Thus, the question is whether the Constitution permits Congress to choose a particular novel means to achieve this same, constitutionally legitimate, end.

Second, the case in part requires us to focus upon the Constitution's generally phrased structural provisions, provisions that delegate all "legislative" power to Congress and vest all "executive" power in the President. See Part IV, infra. The Court, when applying these provisions, has interpreted them generously in terms of the institutional arrangements that they permit.

Third, we need not here referee a dispute among the other two branches.

III

The Court believes that the Act violates the literal text of the Constitution. A simple syllogism captures its basic reasoning:

Major Premise: The Constitution sets forth an exclusive method for enacting, repealing, or amending laws.

Minor Premise: The Act authorizes the President to "repeal or amend" laws in a different way, namely by announcing a cancellation of a portion of a previously enacted law.

Conclusion: The Act is inconsistent with the Constitution.

I find this syllogism unconvincing, however, because its Minor Premise is faulty. When the President "canceled" the two appropriation measures now before us, he did not repeal any law nor did he amend any law. He simply followed the law, leaving the statutes, as they are literally written, intact.
[The Act] delegates to the President the power to decide how to spend the money to which the line item refers either for the specific purpose mentioned in the item, or for general deficit reduction.

[I]t is not, and it is not just like, the repeal or amendment of a law, or, for that matter, a true line item veto (despite the Act's title). Because one cannot say that the President's exercise of the power the Act grants is, literally speaking, a “repeal” or “amendment,” the fact that the Act's procedures differ from the Constitution's exclusive procedures for enacting (or repealing) legislation is beside the point. The Act itself was enacted in accordance with these procedures, and its failure to require the President to satisfy those procedures does not make the Act unconstitutional.

Because I disagree with the Court's holding of literal violation, I must consider whether the Act nonetheless violates Separation of Powers principles – principles that arise out of the Constitution's vesting of the "executive Power" in "a President," U.S. Const., Art. II, § 1, and "all legislative Powers" in "a Congress," Art. I, § 1. There are three relevant Separation of Powers questions here: (1) Has Congress given the President the wrong kind of power, i.e., "non-Executive" power? (2) Has Congress given the President the power to "encroach" upon Congress' own constitutionally reserved territory? (3) Has Congress given the President too much power, violating the doctrine of "nondelegation?" These three limitations help assure "adequate control by the citizen's representatives in Congress," upon which Justice Kennedy properly insists. And with respect to this Act, the answer to all these questions is "no."

Viewed conceptually, the power the Act conveys is the right kind of power. It is "executive." As explained above, an exercise of that power "executes" the Act. Conceptually speaking, it closely resembles the kind of delegated authority – to spend or not to spend appropriations, to change or not to change tariff rates – that Congress has frequently granted the President, any differences being differences in degree, not kind.

If there is a Separation of Powers violation, then, it must rest, not upon purely conceptual grounds, but upon some important conflict between the Act and a significant Separation of Powers objective.

The Act does not undermine what this Court has often described as the principal function of the Separation of Powers, which is to maintain the tripartite structure of the Federal Government – and thereby protect individual liberty – by providing a "safeguard against the encroachment or aggrandizement of one branch at the expense of the other."

Nor can one say that the Act's basic substantive objective is constitutionally improper, for the earliest Congresses could have, . . . and often did, confer on the President this sort of discretionary authority over spending. . . . Nor can one say the Act's grant of power "aggrandizes" the Presidential office. The grant is limited to the context of the budget. It is limited to the power to spend, or not to spend, particular appropriated items, and the power to permit, or not to permit, specific limited exemptions from generally applicable tax law from taking effect.
The "nondelegation" doctrine represents an added constitutional check upon Congress' authority to delegate power to the Executive Branch. And it raises a more serious constitutional obstacle here. The Constitution permits Congress to "seek assistance from another branch" of Government, the "extent and character" of that assistance to be fixed "according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental co-ordination." J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. at 406. But there are limits on the way in which Congress can obtain such assistance; it "cannot delegate any part of its legislative power except under the limitation of a prescribed standard." United States v. Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co., 282 U.S. 311, 324 (1931). Or, in Chief Justice Taft's more familiar words, the Constitution permits only those delegations where Congress "shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to [act] is directed to conform." J. W. Hampton, supra, at 409 (emphasis added).

The Act before us seeks to create such a principle in three ways. The first is procedural. The Act tells the President that, in "identifying dollar amounts [or] . . . items. . . for cancellation" (which I take to refer to his selection of the amounts or items he will "prevent from having legal force or effect"), he is to "consider," among other things, "the legislative history, construction, and purposes of the law which contains [those amounts or items, and] . . . any specific sources of information referenced in such law or . . . the best available information . . . ." 2 U.S.C. § 691(b) (1994 ed., Supp. II).

The second is purposive. The clear purpose behind the Act, confirmed by its legislative history, is to promote "greater fiscal accountability" and to "eliminate wasteful federal spending and . . . special tax breaks." H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-491, p. 15 (1996).

The third is substantive. The President must determine that, to "prevent" the item or amount "from having legal force or effect" will "reduce the Federal budget deficit; . . . not impair any essential Government functions; and . . . not harm the national interest." 2 U.S.C. § 691(a)(A) (1994 ed., Supp. II).

The resulting standards are broad. But this Court has upheld standards that are equally broad, or broader.

In sum, I recognize that the Act before us is novel. In a sense, it skirts a constitutional edge. But that edge has to do with means, not ends. The means chosen do not amount literally to the enactment, repeal, or amendment of a law. Nor, for that matter, do they amount literally to the "line item veto" that the Act's title announces. Those means do not violate any basic Separation of Powers principle. They do not improperly shift the constitutionally foreseen balance of power from Congress to the President. Nor, since they comply with Separation of Powers principles, do they threaten the liberties of individual citizens. They represent an experiment that may, or may not, help representative government work better. The Constitution, in my view, authorizes Congress and the President to try novel methods in this way. Consequently, with respect, I dissent.
§ 10.1 The Appointment Power

There is clear text in the Constitution regarding the appointment of officers of the United States. Article II, § 2 of the Constitution provides, in pertinent part: “[The President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.” Under Article II, § 3, the President has the duty to “Commission all the Officers of the United States.”

An “Officer of the United States” is any appointee who exercises "significant authority” pursuant to the “laws of the United States.” For example, in Buckle v. Valeo, the Court held that Congress could not itself appoint members of the Federal Election Commission since those members were officers of the United States because they (1) hold a “continuing” office established by law and (2) wield “significant authority” because they would be making rules, giving advisory opinions, and determining the eligibility of funds for federal elective offices. On application of this doctrine, see Freytag v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 501 U.S. 868 (1991) (“special trial judges” of the United States Tax Court are “Officers” and must be appointed consistent with the Appointments Clause); Lucia v. SEC, 138 S. Ct. 2044 (2018) (SEC’s Administrative Law Judges (ALJs) are “Officers” who exercise “significant authority” and thus must be appointed consistent with the Appointments Clause, not by merit-selection process administered by the Office of Personnel Management), citing, Bandimere v. SEC, 844 F.3d 1168 (10th Cir. 2016). Under this approach, well over 90% of those who render service to the Federal Government are not “Officers.” See Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, 561 U.S. 477, 506 n.9 (2010).

Instead of the current Buckley/Freytag case-by-case approach, Justices Thomas and Gorsuch have proposed a broad view that any individual “with responsibility for an ongoing statutory duty” should be viewed as an “Officer.” Lucia, 138 S. Ct. at 2056 (Thomas, J., joined by Gorsuch, J., concurring). In contrast, Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor have proposed that one component of “significant authority” should be a requirement that the individual makes “final, binding decisions.” Thus any person who “merely advises and provides recommendations,” as do the ALJs in Lucia, should not be an “Officer.” Id. at 2065 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., dissenting).

As the text of the Appointments Clause indicates, the standard role of Congress in the appointment of federal executive officers or judges is the Senate power of Advice and Consent. While Congress may waive such Advice and Consent for “inferior Officers,” there is no requirement of such a waiver. For example, whether or not they could be viewed as “inferior Officers,” all lower federal court judges have always been subject to the Senate confirmation process. Under existing statutes, more than 1,200 executive positions are subject to Senate confirmation; when judges and military officers are added, the number reaches more than 3,000. By literal text, all Supreme Court Justices must be confirmed by the Senate, although the number of such Justices is determined by Congress, as provided at 28 U.S.C. § 1. Initially, there were 6 Supreme Court Justices. To deprive Jefferson of an appointment, the lame-duck Federalist Congress reduced this to 5 in 1801, but it was restored to 6 in 1802 by the Jeffersonian Congress. As the United States expanded and grew, Congress increased this number in 1807 to 7; in 1837 to 9; and in 1863 to 10. Following President Lincoln’s assassination in 1865, Congress reduced the number in 1866 to 7, wishing to deprive Lincoln’s Democratic Vice-President, Andrew Johnson, of the ability to nominate Supreme Court Justices. Once Johnson left office, Congress increased the number in 1869 back to 9, where it remains today.

In a series of appointments cases since 1986, a majority of the Court has used a non-formalist balancing approach to determine whether certain non-traditional methods of appointment were in violation of the Appointments Clause or the doctrine of the separation of powers. The first of these cases was Morrison v. Olson, which involved the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. That Act was a response to the “Saturday Night Massacre,” where in 1973 President Nixon terminated the power of Archibald Cox to investigate Watergate wrongdoing, a power the president had at the time. Political pressure forced Nixon to appoint Leon Jaworski to continue the investigation, which led to subsequent prosecutions, as referenced in United States v. Nixon, excerpted at § 10.4.1.

Morrison v. Olson

provisions of the Act do not violate the Appointments Clause of the Constitution, Art. II, § 2, cl. 2, or the limitations of Article III, nor do they impermissibly interfere with the President's authority under Article II in violation of the constitutional principle of separation of powers.

Briefly stated, Title VI of the Ethics in Government Act (Title VI or the Act), 8 U.S.C. §§ 591-599 (1982 ed., Supp. V), allows for the appointment of an “independent counsel” to investigate and, if appropriate, prosecute certain high-ranking Government officials for violations of federal criminal laws. The Act requires the Attorney General, upon receipt of information that he determines is “sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate whether any person [covered by the Act] may have violated any Federal criminal law,” to conduct a preliminary investigation of the matter. [Ed.: The main individuals covered by the Act included Cabinet level officers and the President and Vice-President of the United States.] When the Attorney General has completed this investigation, or 90 days has elapsed, he is required to report to a special court (the Special Division) created by the Act “for the purpose of appointing independent counsels.” 28 U.S.C. § 49 (1982 ed., Supp. V). If the Attorney General determines that “there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation is warranted,” then he must notify the Special Division of this result. In such a case, “the division of the court shall have no power to appoint an independent counsel.” § 592(b)(1). If, however, the Attorney General has determined that there are “reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted,” then he “shall apply to the division of the court for the appointment of an independent counsel.” The Attorney General's application to the court “shall contain sufficient information to assist the [court] in selecting an independent counsel and in defining that independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction.” § 592(d). Upon receiving this application, the Special Division “shall appoint an appropriate independent counsel and shall define that independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction.” § 593(b)

The parties do not dispute that “[t]he Constitution for purposes of appointment . . . divides all its officers into two classes.” United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. (9 Otto) 508, 509 (1879). As we stated in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 132 (1976): “[P]rincipal officers are selected by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Inferior officers Congress may allow to be appointed by the President alone, by the heads of departments, or by the Judiciary.” The initial question is, accordingly, whether appellant is an “inferior” or a “principal” officer. If she is the latter, as the Court of Appeals concluded, then the Act is in violation of the Appointments Clause.

The line between “inferior” and “principal” officers is one that is far from clear, and the Framers provided little guidance into where it should be drawn. See, e.g., 2 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution § 1536, pp. 397-398 (3d ed. 1858) (“In the practical course of the government there does not seem to have been any exact line drawn, who are and who are not to be deemed inferior officers, in the sense of the constitution, whose appointment does not necessarily require the concurrence of the senate”). We need not attempt here to decide exactly where the line falls between the two types of officers, because in our view appellant clearly falls on the “inferior officer” side of that line. Several factors lead to this conclusion.

First, appellant is subject to removal by a higher Executive Branch official. Although appellant may not be “subordinate” to the Attorney General (and the President) insofar as she possesses a degree of independent discretion to exercise the powers delegated to her under the Act, the fact that she can be removed by the Attorney General indicates that she is to some degree “inferior” in rank and authority. Second, appellant is empowered by the Act to perform only certain, limited duties. An independent counsel's role is restricted primarily to investigation and, if appropriate, prosecution for certain federal crimes. Admittedly, the Act delegates to appellant “full power and independent authority to exercise all investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers of the Department of Justice,” § 594(a), but this grant of authority does not include any authority to formulate policy for the Government or the Executive Branch, nor does it give appellant any administrative duties outside of those necessary to operate her office. The Act specifically provides that in policy matters appellant is to comply to the extent possible with the policies of the Department. § 594(f).

Third, appellant's office is limited in jurisdiction. Not only is the Act itself restricted in applicability to certain federal officials suspected of certain serious federal crimes, but an independent counsel can only act within the scope of the jurisdiction that has been granted by the Special Division pursuant to a request by the Attorney General. Finally, appellant's office is limited in tenure. There is concededlly no time limit on the appointment of a particular counsel. Nonetheless, the office of independent counsel is “temporary” in the sense that an independent counsel is appointed essentially to accomplish a single task, and when that task is over the office is terminated, either by the counsel herself or by action of the Special Division. Unlike other prosecutors, appellant has no ongoing responsibilities that extend beyond the accomplishment of the mission that she was appointed for and authorized by the Special Division to undertake. In our view, these factors relating to the “ideas of tenure, duration . . . and duties” of the independent counsel, Germaine, supra, 9 Otto, at 511, are sufficient to establish that appellant is an “inferior” officer in the constitutional sense.

This does not, however, end our inquiry under the Appointments Clause. Appellees argue that even if appellant is an “inferior” officer, the Clause does not empower Congress to place the power to appoint such an officer outside the Executive Branch. They contend that the Clause does not contemplate congressional authorization of “interbranch appointments,” in which an officer of one branch is appointed by officers of another branch. The relevant language of the Appointments Clause is worth repeating. It reads: “. . . but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.” On its face, the language of this “excepting clause” admits of no limitation on interbranch appointments. Indeed, the inclusion of “as they think proper” seems clearly to give Congress significant discretion to determine whether it is “proper” to vest the appointment of, for example, executive officials in the “courts of Law.” We recognized as much in one of our few decisions in this area, Ex parte Siebold, [100 U.S. 371 (1879)], where we stated: “It is no doubt usual and proper to vest the appointment of inferior officers in that department of the government, executive or judicial, or in that particular executive department to which the duties of such officers appertain. But there is no absolute requirement to this effect in the Constitution; and, if there were, it would be difficult in many cases to determine to which department an office properly belonged. . . . But as the Constitution stands, the selection of the appointing power, as between the functionaries named, is a matter resting in the discretion of Congress.” Id., 100 U.S. (10 Otto), at 397-398.
We also note that the history of the Clause provides no support for appellees' position. Throughout most of the process of drafting the Constitution, the Convention concentrated on the problem of who should have the authority to appoint judges. At the suggestion of James Madison, the Convention adopted a proposal that the Senate should have this authority, 1 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, pp. 232-233 (M. Farrand ed. 1966), and several attempts to transfer the appointment power to the President were rejected. See 2 id., at 42-44, 80-83. The August 6, 1787, draft of the Constitution reported by the Committee of Detail retained Senate appointment of Supreme Court Judges, provided also for Senate appointment of ambassadors, and vested in the President the authority to “appoint officers in all cases not otherwise provided for by this Constitution.” Id., at 183, 185. This scheme was maintained until September 4, when the Committee of Eleven reported its suggestions to the Convention. This Committee suggested that the Constitution be amended to state that the President “shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, and other public Ministers, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the [United States], whose appointments are not otherwise herein provided for.” Id., at 498-499. After the addition of “Consuls” to the list, the Committee's proposal was adopted, id., at 539, and was subsequently reported to the Convention by the Committee of Style. See id., at 599. It was at this point, on September 15, that Gouverneur Morris moved to add the Excepting Clause to Art. II, § 2. Id., at 627. The one comment made on this motion was by Madison, who felt that the Clause did not go far enough in that it did not allow Congress to vest appointment powers in “Superior Officers below Heads of Departments.” The first vote on Morris' motion ended in a tie. It was then put forward a second time, with the urging that “some such provision [was] too necessary, to be omitted.” This time the proposal was adopted. Id., at 627-628. As this discussion shows, there was little or no debate on the question whether the Clause empowers Congress to provide for interbranch appointments, and there is nothing to suggest that the Framers intended to prevent Congress from having that power.

We do not mean to say that Congress' power to provide for interbranch appointments of “inferior officers” is unlimited. In addition to separation-of-powers concerns, which would arise if such provisions for appointment had the potential to impair the constitutional functions assigned to one of the branches, Siebold itself suggested that Congress' decision to vest the appointment power in the courts would be improper if there was some “incongruity” between the functions normally performed by the courts and the performance of their duty to appoint. 100 U.S. (10 Otto), at 398. In this case, however, we do not think it impermissible for Congress to vest the power to appoint independent counsel in a specially created federal court. We thus disagree with the Court of Appeals' conclusion that there is an inherent incongruity about a court having the power to appoint prosecutorial officers. We have recognized that courts may appoint private attorneys to act as prosecutor for judicial contempt judgments. See Young v. United States ex rel. Vuitton et Fils S.A., 481 U.S. 787 (1987). In Go-Bart Importing Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 344 (1931), we approved court appointment of United States commissioners, who exercised certain limited prosecutorial powers. Id., at 353, n.2. In Siebold, as well, we indicated that judicial appointment of federal marshals, who are “executive officer[s],” would not be inappropriate. Lower courts have also upheld interim judicial appointments of United States Attorneys, see United States v. Solomon, 216 F.Supp. 835 (SDNY 1963), and Congress itself has vested the power to make these interim appointments in the district courts, see 28 U.S.C. § 546(d) (1982 ed., Supp. V).
Appellees next contend that the powers vested in the Special Division by the Act conflict with Article III of the Constitution. We have long recognized that by the express provision of Article III, the judicial power of the United States is limited to “Cases” and “Controversies.” See Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 356 (1911). As a general rule, we have broadly stated that “executive or administrative duties of a nonjudicial nature may not be imposed on judges holding office under Art. III of the Constitution.” Buckley, 424 U.S., at 123 (citing United States v. Ferreira, 13 How. 40 (1852); Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409 (1792)). The purpose of this limitation is to help ensure the independence of the Judicial Branch and to prevent the Judiciary from encroaching into areas reserved for the other branches. See United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 396 (1980).

[T]he Act vests in the Special Division the power to choose who will serve as independent counsel and the power to define his or her jurisdiction. § 593(b). Clearly, once it is accepted that the Appointments Clause gives Congress the power to vest the appointment of officials such as the independent counsel in the “courts of Law,” there can be no Article III objection to the Special Division's exercise of that power, as the power itself derives from the Appointments Clause, a source of authority for judicial action that is independent of Article III.

Nor do we believe, as appellees contend, that the Special Division's exercise of the various powers specifically granted to it under the Act poses any threat to the “impartial and independent federal adjudication of claims within the judicial power of the United States.” Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, supra, at 850. We reach this conclusion for two reasons. First, the Act as it currently stands gives the Special Division itself no power to review any of the actions of the independent counsel or any of the actions of the Attorney General with regard to the counsel. Accordingly, there is no risk of partisan or biased adjudication of claims regarding the independent counsel by that court. Second, the Act prevents members of the Special Division from participating in “any judicial proceeding concerning a matter which involves such independent counsel while such independent counsel is serving in that office.” 28 U.S.C. § 49(f) (1982 ed., Supp. V) (emphasis added); see also § 596(a)(3) (preventing members of the Special Division from participating in review of the Attorney General's decision to remove an independent counsel). We think both the special court and its judges are sufficiently isolated by these statutory provisions from the review of the activities of the independent counsel so as to avoid any taint of the independence of the Judiciary such as would render the Act invalid under Article III.

Justice KENNEDY took no part in the consideration or decision of this case. [Ed.: Justice Kennedy was confirmed as a Justice too late to take part in all the deliberations in the case].

Justice SCALIA, dissenting.

That is what this suit is about. Power. The allocation of power among Congress, the President, and the courts in such fashion as to preserve the equilibrium the Constitution sought to establish – so that “a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department,” Federalist No. 51, p. 321
(J. Madison), can effectively be resisted. Frequently an issue of this sort will come before the Court clad, so to speak, in sheep's clothing: the potential of the asserted principle to effect important change in the equilibrium of power is not immediately evident, and must be discerned by a careful and perceptive analysis. But this wolf comes as a wolf.

The principle of separation of powers is expressed in our Constitution in the first section of each of the first three Articles. Article I, § 1, provides that “[a]ll legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.” Article III, § 1, provides that “[t]he judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.” And the provision at issue here, Art. II, § 1, cl. 1, provides that “[t]he executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.”

[T]his does not mean some of the executive power, but all of the executive power. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of the Court of Appeals invalidating the present statute must be upheld on fundamental separation-of-powers principles if the following two questions are answered affirmatively: (1) Is the conduct of a criminal prosecution (and of an investigation to decide whether to prosecute) the exercise of purely executive power? (2) Does the statute deprive the President of the United States of exclusive control over the exercise of that power? Surprising to say, the Court appears to concede an affirmative answer to both questions, but seeks to avoid the inevitable conclusion that since the statute vests some purely executive power in a person who is not the President of the United States it is void.

The Court has, nonetheless, replaced the clear constitutional prescription that the executive power belongs to the President with a “balancing test.” What are the standards to determine how the balance is to be struck, that is, how much removal of Presidential power is too much? Many countries of the world get along with an executive that is much weaker than ours – in fact, entirely dependent upon the continued support of the legislature. Once we depart from the text of the Constitution, just where short of that do we stop? The most amazing feature of the Court's opinion is that it does not even purport to give an answer. It simply announces, with no analysis, that the ability to control the decision whether to investigate and prosecute the President's closest advisers, and indeed the President himself, is not “so central to the functioning of the Executive Branch” as to be constitutionally required to be within the President's control. Apparently that is so because we say it is so. Having abandoned as the basis for our decision-making the text of Article II that “the executive Power” must be vested in the President, the Court does not even attempt to craft a substitute criterion – a “justiciable standard,” see, e.g., Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 210 (1962); Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 454-455 (1939), however remote from the Constitution – that today governs, and in the future will govern, the decision of such questions. Evidently, the governing standard is to be what might be called the unfettered wisdom of a majority of this Court, revealed to an obedient people on a case-by-case basis. This is not only not the government of laws that the Constitution established; it is not a government of laws at all.

In my view, moreover, even as an ad hoc, standardless judgment the Court's conclusion must be wrong. Before this statute was passed, the President, in taking action disagreeable to the Congress, or an executive officer giving advice to the President or testifying before Congress concerning one of those many matters on which the two branches are from time to time at odds, could be assured that his acts and motives would be adjudged—insofar as the decision whether to conduct a criminal investigation and to prosecute is concerned—in the Executive Branch, that is, in a forum attuned to the interests and the policies of the Presidency. That was one of the natural advantages the Constitution gave to the Presidency, just as it gave Members of Congress (and their staffs) the advantage of not being prosecutable for anything said or done in their legislative capacities. See U.S. Const., Art. I, § 6, cl. 1; Gravel v. United States, 408 U.S. 606 (1972). It is the very object of this legislation to eliminate that assurance of a sympathetic forum. Unless it can honestly be said that there are “no reasonable grounds to believe” that further investigation is warranted, further investigation must ensue; and the conduct of the investigation, and determination of whether to prosecute, will be given to a person neither selected by nor subject to the control of the President—who will in turn assemble a staff by finding out, presumably, who is willing to put aside whatever else they are doing, for an indeterminate period of time, in order to investigate and prosecute the President or a particular named individual in his administration. The prospect is frightening . . . even outside the context of a bitter, interbranch political dispute. Perhaps the boldness of the President himself will not be affected—though I am not even sure of that. (How much easier it is for Congress, instead of accepting the political damage attendant to the commencement of impeachment proceedings against the President on trivial grounds—or, for that matter, how easy it is for one of the President's political foes outside of Congress—simply to trigger a debilitating criminal investigation of the Chief Executive under this law.) But as for the President's high-level assistants, who typically have no political base of support, it is as utterly unrealistic to think that they will not be intimidated by this prospect, and that their advice to him and their advocacy of his interests before a hostile Congress will not be affected, as it would be to think that the Members of Congress and their staffs would be unaffected by replacing the Speech or Debate Clause with a similar provision. It deeply wounds the President, by substantially reducing the President's ability to protect himself and his staff.

The Court also held in Morrison that the Act did not violate separation of powers principles by imposing significant executive or administrative duties of a non-judicial nature on Article III judges. Under Court precedents, Congress cannot impose significant extra duties on judges. The selection by the Chief Justice of 3 judges to serve on the Special Division in Morrison, who would then select the independent counsel, did not fall into this category. Many statutes provide for the Chief Justice to make selection among sitting federal judges to serve on special judicial bodies, such as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which deals with government applications for electronic surveillance; the Alien Terrorist Removal Court, which hears alien removal proceedings; and the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, which hears certain mass tort cases.4

In 1998, Congress declined to extend the provisions of the Ethics in Government Act. The Act was initially authorized in 1978 to run for 15 years, but was extended for 5 years in 1993 by a Democrat-controlled Congress. By 1998, support among both Democrats and Republicans had waned, in part because Republicans believed the Act gave Lawrence Walsh too much independent power in his Iran-Contra Investigation of the Reagan Administration during the 1980s, and Democrats believed the Act gave Kenneth Starr too much independent power in his investigation of President Clinton during the 1990s. With the Act no longer in force, investigations today of Cabinet-level officials, or the President or Vice-President, would likely be done by independent counsels appointed by the Attorney General, or appropriate designate, if the Attorney General’s actions were under review.

Soon after Morrison, the Court decided another case where the majority used a non-formalist approach to an appointments issue. In Mistretta v. United States, the Court upheld the United States Sentencing Commission on general separation of power grounds, in addition to upholding the Commission as a proper delegation of legislative authority, discussed at § 9.2 nn.27-30. The Sentencing Commission is composed of 7 members appointed by the President with the Advice and Consent of the Senate. At least 3 of the 7 members must be federal judges. Because Advice and Consent of the Senate was required, the literal text of the Appointments Clause was met.

Regarding general separation of powers concerns with efficiency versus the prevention of tyranny, the Court said, consistent with a non-formalist approach, that statutes could to some degree commingle the functions of the branches where that did not pose a danger of aggrandizement of the powers of one branch or encroachment on the functions of another. The Court noted in Mistretta that efficiency was advanced because judicial participation would ensure that sentencing guidelines would be informed by judicial experience, and the limited service on the Commission would not undermine judicial effectiveness by exhausting the resources of the judicial branch, or undermine public perception of the impartiality of the judiciary, since rationalizing sentencing is an “essentially neutral endeavor.” With regard to tyranny, there was no impermissible aggrandizement of judicial power, since judges had determined criminal sentences in cases prior to the law.

Since Mistretta was decided, a district court held that the “Feeney Amendment,” which altered the membership of the Sentencing Commission to provide that “not more than three federal judges” may sit on the 7-person Commission, but did not ensure that three federal judges sit on the Commission, aggrandized executive power too much and constituted executive encroachment on the judicial sentencing authority. Whether that balancing of executive versus judicial authority would be upheld on appeal is unknown. The opinion makes clear that courts consider not only specific textual language, like the Appointments Clause, but also general separation of powers concerns like (1) the “efficiency” and “no incongruity” principles of Morrison/Mistretta and (2) the prevention of tyranny and no impermissible aggrandizement or delegation of power aspects of Morrison/Mistretta.

A third Supreme Court case regarding appointment is Public Citizen v. United States Department of Justice.

In Public Citizen, the issue was whether the Federal Advisory Committee Act, which requires groups who advise the President on public affairs to hold open meetings and make their records public, called for the Justice Department to make public their reports on nominees for federal judicial nominees. The Court interpreted the statute not to apply to judicial nominations, thus avoiding constitutional difficulties. Justices Kennedy, Rehnquist and O'Connor thought the Act did apply, but was unconstitutional. Justice Kennedy noted that where there no was violation of express constitutional text, a “balancing test” was appropriate in cases like Morrison and Mistretta. Here, however, the explicit text of the Appointment Clause grants to the President the power to nominate federal judges. The only textual limitation on that power is the Incompatibility Clause, which prevents Senators or Representatives from being appointed “to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time” in office. Since the Act placed additional limits on the nomination process, the Act was unconstitutional as violating clear constitutional text. By the same reasoning, congressional limitations on appointment, like Congress’ view that the head of the Women’s Bureau at the Department of Labor should be a woman, are unconstitutional limitations on whom the President can nominate to fill a position. Of course, if the President were to nominate a man for that position, the Senate could refuse to confirm under the Advice and Consent power.

Article II, § 2, cl. 3 provides, “The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire as the End of their next Session.” It could be argued that this literal text only gives the President this “Recess” power if the vacancy is created during a period that the Senate is in Recess. Alexander Hamilton’s discussion of the clause in The Federalist Papers No. 67 supports this view. Hamilton wrote:

> The ordinary power of appointment is confided to the President and Senate jointly, and can therefore only be exercised during the session of the Senate; but as it would have been improper to oblige this body to be continually in session for the appointment of officers, and as vacancies might happen in their recess, which it might be necessary for the public service to fill without delay, the succeeding clause is evidently intended to authorize the President, singly, to make temporary appointments "during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

10 The Federalist No. 67 (A. Hamilton).
By executive practice, Presidents have always interpreted this provision as a power to fill any vacant position that otherwise would require Senate confirmation by an appointment when the Senate is in recess, and congressional acquiescence has fixed this as the accepted view.\footnote{11} It has been noted:

Indeed, the matter lacks major controversy . . . . Why does the clause so clearly mean something it does not say? It can only be because the "arise" interpretation does not make sense in light of the clause's purpose. If the president needs to make an appointment, and the Senate is not around, when the vacancy arose hardly matters; the point is that it must be filled now. This represents [an] instance of purpose trumping, or at least informing our reading of, the text.

\ldots Attorney General Henry Stanbury once argued if "happen" meant "occurring during the recess," then the president could possess authority to make a recess appointment when the Senate is in session. This would happen if a position opened during the Senate's recess, triggering the recess appointment authority, but was still not filled when Senate returned; an appointment made then would still fill a vacancy that "happen[ed] during the recess of the Senate." Therefore, "happen during the recess" must mean "exist" rather than "occur."\footnote{12}

Despite these considerations, two recent Court of Appeals challenged the accepted view of the Recess Power, and the Supreme Court considered the issue in \textit{NLRB v. Noel Canning}.\footnote{13} Four Justices adopted the Court of Appeals' "literal" interpretation that the President can only use the recess power for positions which become available during a Senate recess and recess appointments must be made during that recess period. The majority, however, followed executive and legislative practice allowing the President to make "recess" appointments for any vacancy as long as the Senate is in "recess" when the appointment occurs, but noted that virtually all such appointments have come when the "recess" was longer than 10 days. In this case, the President made the "recess" appointment when Congress was meeting in \textit{pro forma} sessions every three days, because under Art. I, § 5, cl. 4, "Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days," and the House of Representatives did not agree to a longer recess, in part to prevent the President from making "recess" appointments. The Court concluded that this short three-day period was not a "recess" triggering the Clause, except perhaps for "emergency" circumstances where a "recess" appointment even during that short period might be permitted.

Bowing to the political dynamic involved, even under the broader view of the recess power, Presidents have not used this recess power often. It has been used, however, for both non-Cabinet level executive appointments, such as President Bush appointing John Bolton to be United Nations Ambassador in 2005, and appointment of lower federal court judges. Presidents rarely use the recess power for controversial Supreme Court or Cabinet appointments: President Washington used the recess power to appoint Chief Justice Rutledge in 1795 (his formal nomination later rejected by the Senate, 10-14); President Eisenhower used the recess power to appoint Lewis Strauss as Secretary of Commerce in 1958 (his formal nomination later rejected by the Senate, 46-49). Less controversial recess appointments have been made more frequently, such as President Eisenhower’s appointments of Chief Justice Warren (1953), Justice Brennan (1956), and Justice Stewart (1958) to fill vacancies in October at the start of the Court’s term (those nominees all easily confirmed the following year), or President George H.W. Bush elevating Lawrence Eagleburger from Deputy Secretary of State to Secretary of State in 1992. By historical practice, no individual has ever been appointed to the same recess position twice, and under 5 U.S.C. § 5503(a) they would not be paid if they were. Under the clause’s text, the recess appointment “shall expire at the end of the their [the Senate’s] next Session,” which under current practice would mean the end of the next calendar year.

An additional method of appointment for executive officials to fill positions without formal Senate Advice and Consent is represented by the Vacancies Act. The Vacancies Act, first passed in 1868, delegates to the President limited authority to temporarily fill certain vacancies in executive agencies or military departments. As provided at 5 U.S.C. § 3345, when a vacancy occurs by death, resignation, or other inability to perform duties, including illness, in a position whose appointment is not vested in the head of the department, but rather subject to Senate Advice and Consent, the “first assistant” to the office is designated to perform the functions of that office, unless the President directs another person who serves in a position subject to Senate Advice and Consent, or a person within the agency itself, whether subject to Senate Advice and Consent, to perform the functions and duties of the vacant office. This power is subject to certain specified limitations regarding length of service and rank of pay, and the time limitations of 5 U.S.C. § 3346, which in general provide for service of a maximum of 210 days. For many Cabinet-level Departments, executive orders have Presidents of both parties have used the power occasionally to appoint judges blocked by the Senate. President Clinton used the power to appoint Roger Gregory to the 4th Circuit in December 2000. President Bush used the power to appoint Charles Pickering, Sr. to the 5th Circuit in January 2004, and William Pryor, Jr. to the 11th Circuit in February 2004. President Obama never used the recess power to appoint judges.

SW General, Inc., 137 S. Ct. 929 (2017), the Court held that the limitations in the Federal Vacancies Reform Act that a person cannot serve as an “acting” agency officer if the President has nominated that person to fill the position and is awaiting Senate confirmation applies not only to “first assistants” who automatically assumed the position when their boss left, but also applies to anyone designated as an acting agency officer. been promulgated indicating a line of succession to be followed in the absence of contrary Presidential appointment.16

§ 10.2 The Executive Removal Power and Congress’ Power of Impeachment

1. The Executive Removal Power

A. No Direct Congressional Role in Removal

The Constitution contains no explicit text regarding the removal of executive officers, except for the provisions regarding impeachment, addressed at § 10.2.2. In the absence of explicit text, the Court has applied general separation of powers principles. As an historical matter, President Andrew Johnson’s removal of the Secretary of War (since 1947, named the Secretary of Defense) without Senate approval caused the House to impeach President Johnson in 1868, though the Senate by one vote did not convict. Later Court doctrine has upheld the President’s power to fire a member of his Cabinet “at will” without congressional interference in the decision, as discussed at § 10.2.1(B) n.25.

The accepted separation-of-powers view is that Congress can never exercise removal power over a member of the executive branch. This is consistent with the conclusion of the First Congress, and clear Supreme Court doctrine. Under Article III, there is no real debate regarding removal of federal judges, since Article III judges have life-tenure “during good Behaviour” and have never been removed except by impeachment. Regarding separation-of-power principles, it has been noted:

[A] Senate removal role would transform the executive into a "two-headed monster." Officers could entrench themselves by serving the Senate's interests rather than satisfying the executive, "which is constitutionally authorized to inspect and control" their conduct. . . . Likewise, if the executive enjoyed the power to remove subject to the whim of Congress, that doctrine would set "the Legislature at the head of the Executive branch." Rather than the president directing his branch, Congress could parcel out the executive power to executive officers by providing that the president could not remove certain officers. Then the officers "who are to aid him in the duties of that department" would not be responsible to him. Either construction would give credence to complaints that the Constitution had failed to adequately separate powers and violate the Constitution's implicit bar against uniting any two of the three fundamental powers of government.19

19 Prakesh, supra note 17, at 795-96.
Applying these general principles, the Court held in 1986 in Bowsher v. Synar\(^\text{20}\) that Congress could not authorize the Comptroller General, an official of the legislative branch and director of the Congressional Budget Office, to determine what budget reductions were necessary to comply with the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act budget guidelines. The Court noted that making the Comptroller General an executive officer for purposes of this Act created a problem since Congress had retained power to remove the Comptroller under several standards, such as "inefficiency" or "neglect of duty." The Court said that Congress can remove executive officials only by impeachment. Otherwise Congress would be executing the laws in violation of the principle of separation of powers, and could impede too greatly upon the President’s ability to manage effectively the executive branch.

Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Marshall, concurred in the result on the ground that Congress may not delegate power to formulate national policy to one of its two Houses, to a legislative committee, or to an individual agent of Congress, such as the Comptroller General. Unlike the majority, which viewed the Comptroller General’s role under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act as executive, they viewed his role as making the legislative policy decision regarding the need for budget reductions. Under Chadha, excerpted at § 9.3, legislative actions must comply with bicameralism and presentment. While in this case this alternative characterization led to the same result, probably the better argument is that in executing the provisions of the Act, the Comptroller General was exercising executive powers, as held by the majority.

On the question of removal, assuming the Comptroller General was exercising executive functions, Justices Stevens and Marshall agreed with Justices White and Blackmun in dissent that from a functional perspective there was no real danger that the Comptroller General would be rendered subservient to Congress. Thus, for them, the literal fact of a removal power was not sufficient to make the Act unconstitutional on this ground.\(^\text{21}\)

Justice White, a Holmesian, dissented from the Court’s result. He agreed with the Court that the functions performed by the Comptroller General were “executive” in nature, but he complained that the Court did not adopt a sufficiently functional view of the removal issue. Justice White acknowledged that Congress retained, as an analytic matter, removal power over the Comptroller General, and that constitutional text and basic separation of powers principles suggest that Congress’ only power of removal over executive officials is by impeachment. Nonetheless, Justice White stated that Congress’ power to remove the Comptroller had only minimal practical significance and posed no threat to the basic scheme of separation of powers. Thus, from a functional perspective, Congress’ removal power should pose no constitutional problem.\(^\text{22}\) Similarly adopting a functional approach, instrumentalist Justice Blackmun, dissenting, said he would cure any constitutional problem by refusing to allow congressional removal of the Comptroller if it were ever attempted.23

In response to Bowsher, Congress repassed the Budget Act, but made the Director of the Office of Management and Budget the person responsible for implementing the Act. Since the Director of the OMB is a member of the executive branch, who serves at the pleasure of the President, there was no constitutional problem with this new statute with regard to the categorical rule stated in Bowsher that Congress can exercise no removal power over a member of the executive branch.

B. Congress Limiting Grounds on Which the President or Head of a Department Can Remove Executive Officials

In Morrison v. Olsen,24 the Court was faced not with Congress attempting to exercise removal power, but with Congress limiting the President’s ability or the Head of a Department’s ability to remove an executive official. The limited interference with the power of removal in Morrison provided that the Attorney General could remove the Independent Counsel only for “good cause.” The Court said that this limited removal power is consistent with prior precedent, which allowed Congress to provide limited periods of office for independent agencies, and forbid removal in the meantime, except for “good cause” or other similar terminology like “neglect of duties or malfeasance in office.” The real issue is whether the removal restrictions are of such a nature that they “impede” the President's ability to perform his constitutional duties. Here, as with many independent agencies, such as the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Food and Drug Administration, the Federal Election Commission, and others, the President's need to control the exercise of counsel's discretion was viewed as not so central to the functioning of the executive branch as to require that counsel be terminated at will by the President. Nor was the President's power to supervise impermissibly burdened because the Attorney General's power to terminate with “good cause” gives the President ample authority to assure that counsel is competently performing statutory duties.

In contrast, in cases involving individuals with more high-level, policy-making executive functions, like Cabinet officers and their high-level subordinates, the Court has stated that Congress cannot limit the President’s ability to remove if that would impermissibly “impede” the President’s ability efficiently to run his administration. As the Court noted in Morrison, “[T]here are some ‘purely executive’ officials who must be removable by the President at will if he is to accomplish his constitutional role.”25 This is particularly true for those policymaking positions typically viewed as part of the President’s team.

This post-1937 doctrine represents an evolution from pre-1937 doctrine. Consistent with the general observation, discussed at § 1.1.4 n.15, that pre-1937 doctrine adopted more categorical tests, while post-1937 doctrine has been more functional in adopting balancing tests, the removal doctrine before 1937 adopted more rigid categorical distinctions. For example, in 1926, the Court declared in Myers v. United States,\(^{26}\) that “the President has the exclusive power of removing executive officers of the United States whom he has appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.” In 1935, in Humphrey’s Executor v. United States,\(^{27}\) the Court noted that for “quasi-legislative” or “quasi-judicial” officials, such as those working at administrative agencies with a mixture of rule-making, enforcement, or administrative law judge responsibilities, the authority of Congress “to require them to act in discharge of their duties independently of executive control cannot well be doubted; and that authority includes, as an appropriate incident, power to fix the period during which they shall continue in office, and to forbid their removal except for cause in the meantime.”

Consistent with post-1937 doctrine not being as predisposed to adopt categorical tests like “executive” versus “quasi-legislative” or “quasi-judicial,” the Court said in 1988 in Morrison:

We undoubtedly did rely on the terms ”quasi-legislative” and ”quasi-judicial” to distinguish the officials involved in Humphrey’s Executor . . . from those in Myers, but our present considered view is that the determination of whether the Constitution allows Congress to impose a ”good cause”-type restriction on the President's power to remove an official cannot be made to turn on whether or not that official is classified as ”purely executive.” The analysis contained in our removal cases is designed not to define rigid categories of those officials who may or may not be removed at will by the President, but to ensure that Congress does not interfere with the President's exercise of the ”executive power” and his constitutionally appointed duty to ”take care that the laws be faithfully executed” under Article II.

[T]he real question is whether the removal restrictions are of such a nature that they impede the President's ability to perform his constitutional duty, and the functions of the officials in question must be analyzed in that light.\(^{28}\)

Under Morrison, it would be an interesting question if Congress placed limits on the President’s ability to remove the Director of the FBI or CIA, whether that position would be viewed as part of the President’s team, or for other reasons constitutionally removable at will, or would be treated like a Director, or one of a number of Commissioners, of an Independent Agency, and thus able to be protected from at-will removal by statute. While there is no current statutory protection for the Director of the FBI or CIA, in practice such Directors are not replaced at the start of a new presidency, as are Cabinet positions, but tend to survive from one administration to the next.

\(^{28}\) Morrison, 487 U.S. at 689-90.
Applying a formalist, strict separation of powers approach, Justice Scalia said in dissent in Morrison that restrictions on removal for “good cause” should always be viewed as resulting in impeding of executive power as applied to principal officers subject to Senate Advice and Consent, without the need for any balancing test regarding the extent of the intrusion on presidential prerogatives. However, in Justice Scalia’s view, restrictions on removal for good cause should always be permissible for inferior officers appointed without Advice and Consent, but subject to supervision by the President or Head of Department who appointed them, as long as the “good cause” limitation would permit the President or Head of Department to remove the individual for failure to accept supervision. Structured as a bright-line rule, Justice Scalia noted that this doctrine was consistent with the formalist-era cases of Myers and United States v. Perkins. It would also preserve great discretion in the executive branch, consistent with a conservative predisposition toward executive power, addressed at § 9.1.1 n.14. That conservative predisposition appears in the following case.

Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board

Chief Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Our Constitution divided the “powers of the new Federal Government into three defined categories, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial.” INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983). Article II vests “[t]he executive Power . . . in a President of the United States of America,” who must “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.” Art. II, § 1, cl. 1; id., § 3. In light of “[t]he impossibility that one man should be able to perform all the great business of the State,” the Constitution provides for executive officers to “assist the supreme Magistrate in discharging the duties of his trust.” 30 Writings of George Washington 334 (J. Fitzpatrick ed.1939).

Since 1789, the Constitution has been understood to empower the President to keep these officers accountable – by removing them from office, if necessary. See generally Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926). This Court has determined, however, that this authority is not without limit. In Humphrey’s Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), we held that Congress can, under certain circumstances, create independent agencies run by principal officers appointed by the President, whom the President may not remove at will but only for good cause. Likewise, in United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483 (1886), and Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988), the Court sustained similar restrictions on the power of principal executive officers – themselves responsible to the President – to remove their own inferiors. The parties do not ask us to reexamine any of these precedents, and we do not do so.

29 Id. at 723 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

30 Id. at 723-24 & n.4, citing inter alia, Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 127 (1926); United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483, 485 (1886) (Congress may limit the ability of the Secretary of the Navy to dismiss a naval cadet only for “misconduct” or “the sentence of a court-martial.”).
We are asked, however, to consider a new situation not yet encountered by the Court. The question is whether these separate layers of protection may be combined. May the President be restricted in his ability to remove a principal officer, who is in turn restricted in his ability to remove an inferior officer, even though that inferior officer determines the policy and enforces the laws of the United States?

We hold that such multilevel protection from removal is contrary to Article II's vesting of the executive power in the President. The President cannot “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed” if he cannot oversee the faithfulness of the officers who execute them. Here the President cannot remove an officer who enjoys more than one level of good-cause protection, even if the President determines that the officer is neglecting his duties or discharging them improperly. That judgment is instead committed to another officer, who may or may not agree with the President's determination, and whom the President cannot remove simply because that officer disagrees with him. This contravenes the President's “constitutional obligation to ensure the faithful execution of the laws.”

After a series of celebrated accounting debacles, Congress enacted the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (or Act), 116 Stat. 745. Among other measures, the Act introduced tighter regulation of the accounting industry under a new Public Company Accounting Oversight Board [PCAOB]. The Board is composed of five members, appointed to staggered 5-year terms by the Securities and Exchange Commission. It was modeled on private self-regulatory organizations in the securities industry – such as the New York Stock Exchange – that investigate and discipline their own members subject to Commission oversight.

The Act places the Board under the SEC's oversight, particularly with respect to the issuance of rules or the imposition of sanctions (both of which are subject to Commission approval and alteration). [15 U.S.C.] §§ 7217(b)(c). But the individual members of the Board – like the officers and directors of the self-regulatory organizations – are substantially insulated from the Commission's control. The Commission cannot remove Board members at will, but only “for good cause shown,” “in accordance with” certain procedures. § 7211(e)(6).

Those procedures require a Commission finding, “on the record” and “after notice and opportunity for a hearing,” that the Board member “(A) has willfully violated any provision of th[e] Act, the rules of the Board, or the securities laws; (B) has willfully abused the authority of that member; or (C) without reasonable justification or excuse, has failed to enforce compliance with any such provision or rule, or any professional standard by any registered public accounting firm or any associated person thereof.” § 7217(d)(3). Removal of a Board member requires a formal Commission order and is subject to judicial review. See 5 U.S.C. §§ 554(a), 556(a), 557(a), (c)(B); 15 U.S.C. § 78y(a)(1).

As explained, we have previously upheld limited restrictions on the President's removal power. In those cases, however, only one level of protected tenure separated the President from an officer exercising executive power. It was the President – or a subordinate he could remove at will – who decided whether the officer's conduct merited removal under the good-cause standard.
The Act before us does something quite different. It not only protects Board members from removal except for good cause, but withdraws from the President any decision on whether that good cause exists. That decision is vested instead in other tenured officers – the Commissioners – none of whom is subject to the President's direct control. The result is a Board that is not accountable to the President, and a President who is not responsible for the Board.

The added layer of tenure protection makes a difference. Without a layer of insulation between the Commission and the Board, the Commission could remove a Board member at any time, and therefore would be fully responsible for what the Board does. The President could then hold the Commission to account for its supervision of the Board, to the same extent that he may hold the Commission to account for everything else it does.

A second level of tenure protection changes the nature of the President's review. Now the Commission cannot remove a Board member at will. The President therefore cannot hold the Commission fully accountable for the Board's conduct, to the same extent that he may hold the Commission accountable for everything else that it does. The Commissioners are not responsible for the Board's actions. They are only responsible for their own determination of whether the Act's rigorous good-cause standard is met. And even if the President disagrees with their determination, he is powerless to intervene – unless that determination is so unreasonable as to constitute “inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.” Humphrey's Executor, 295 U.S., at 620 (internal quotation marks omitted).

This novel structure does not merely add to the Board's independence, but transforms it. Neither the President, nor anyone directly responsible to him, nor even an officer whose conduct he may review only for good cause, has full control over the Board. The President is stripped of the power our precedents have preserved, and his ability to execute the laws – by holding his subordinates accountable for their conduct – is impaired.

The parties have identified only a handful of isolated positions in which inferior officers might be protected by two levels of good-cause tenure. See, e.g., PCAOB Brief 43. As Judge Kavanaugh noted in dissent below: “Perhaps the most telling indication of the severe constitutional problem with the PCAOB is the lack of historical precedent for this entity. Neither the majority opinion nor the PCAOB nor the United States as intervenor has located any historical analogues for this novel structure. They have not identified any independent agency other than the PCAOB that is appointed by and removable only for cause by another independent agency.” 537 F.3d, at 669.

The dissent here suggests that other such positions might exist, and complains that we do not resolve their status in this opinion. The dissent itself, however, stresses the very size and variety of the Federal Government, and those features discourage general pronouncements on matters neither briefed nor argued here. In any event, the dissent fails to support its premonitions of doom; none of the positions it identifies are similarly situated to the Board.

For example, many civil servants within independent agencies would not qualify as “Officers of the United States,” who “exercis[e] significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States,” Buckley, 424 U.S., at 126. The parties here concede that Board members are executive “Officers,” as that term is used in the Constitution. See supra, at 4; see also Art. II, § 2, cl. 2. We do not decide the status of other Government employees, nor do we decide whether “lesser functionaries subordinate to officers of the United States” must be subject to the same sort of control as those who exercise significant authority pursuant to the laws.” Buckley, supra, at 126, and n.162.

Concluding that the removal restrictions are invalid leaves the Board removable by the Commission at will, and leaves the President separated from Board members by only a single level of good-cause tenure. The Commission is then fully responsible for the Board’s actions, which are no less subject than the Commission’s own functions to Presidential oversight.

The Court holds unconstitutional a statute providing that the Securities and Exchange Commission can remove members of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board from office only for cause. It argues that granting the “inferior officer[s]” on the Accounting Board “more than one level of good-cause protection . . . contravenes the President’s ‘constitutional obligation to ensure the faithful execution of the laws.’” I agree that the Accounting Board members are inferior officers. But in my view the statute does not significantly interfere with the President’s “executive Power.” Art. II, § 1. It violates no separation-of-powers principle. And the Court’s contrary holding threatens to disrupt severely the fair and efficient administration of the laws. I consequently dissent.

Federal statutes now require or permit Government officials to provide, regulate, or otherwise administer, not only foreign affairs and defense, but also a wide variety of such subjects as taxes, welfare, social security, medicine, pharmaceutical drugs, education, highways, railroads, electricity, natural gas, nuclear power, financial instruments, banking, medical care, public health and safety, the environment, fair employment practices, consumer protection and much else besides. Those statutes create a host of different organizational structures. Sometimes they delegate administrative authority to the President directly, e.g., 10 U.S.C. § 2031(a)(1); 42 U.S.C. § 5192(e); sometimes they place authority in a long-established Cabinet department, e.g., 7 U.S.C. § 1637b(c)(1); 12 U.S.C. § 5221(b)(2) (2006 ed., Supp. II); sometimes they delegate authority to an independent commission or board, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 4404(b); 28 U.S.C. § 994; sometimes they place authority directly in the hands of a single senior administrator, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 657d(c)(4); 42 U.S.C. § 421; sometimes they place it in a sub-cabinet bureau, office, division or other agency, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 4048; sometimes they vest it in multimember or multiagency task groups, e.g. 5 U.S.C. §§ 593-594; 50 U.S.C. § 402 (2006 ed. and Supp. II); sometimes they vest it in commissions or advisory committees made up of members of more than one branch, e.g., 20 U.S.C. § 42(a); 28 U.S.C. § 991(a) (2006 ed., Supp. II); 42 U.S.C. § 1975; sometimes they divide it among groups of departments, commissions, bureaus, divisions, and administrators, e.g., 5 U.S.C. § 9902(a) (2006 ed., Supp. II); 7 U.S.C. § 136i-1(g); and sometimes they permit state or local governments to participate as well, e.g., 7 U.S.C. § 2009aa1(a). Statutes similarly grant administrators a wide variety of powers – for example, the power to make rules, develop informal practices, investigate, adjudicate, impose sanctions, grant licenses, and provide goods, services, advice, and so forth. See generally 5 U.S.C. § 500 et seq.
The upshot is that today vast numbers of statutes governing vast numbers of subjects, concerned with vast numbers of different problems, provide for, or foresee, their execution or administration through the work of administrators organized within many different kinds of administrative structures, exercising different kinds of administrative authority, to achieve their legislatively mandated objectives. And, given the nature of the Government's work, it is not surprising that administrative units come in many different shapes and sizes.

The functional approach required by our precedents recognizes this administrative complexity and, more importantly, recognizes the various ways presidential power operates within this context—and the various ways in which a removal provision might affect that power. As human beings have known ever since Ulysses tied himself to the mast so as safely to hear the Sirens' song, sometimes it is necessary to disable oneself in order to achieve a broader objective. Thus, legally enforceable commitments—such as contracts, statutes that cannot instantly be changed, and, as in the case before us, the establishment of independent administrative institutions—hold the potential to empower precisely because of their ability to constrain. If the President seeks to regulate through impartial adjudication, then insulation of the adjudicator from removal at will can help him achieve that goal. And to free a technical decisionmaker from the fear of removal without cause can similarly help create legitimacy with respect to that official's regulatory actions by helping to insulate his technical decisions from nontechnical political pressure.

The Court fails to show why two layers of “for cause” protection—Layer One insulating the Commissioners from the President, and Layer Two insulating the Board from the Commissioners—impose any more serious limitation upon the President's powers than one layer. Consider the four scenarios that might arise:

1. The President and the Commission both want to keep a Board member in office. Neither layer is relevant.

2. The President and the Commission both want to dismiss a Board member. Layer Two stops them both from doing so without cause. The President's ability to remove the Commission (Layer One) is irrelevant, for he and the Commission are in agreement.

3. The President wants to dismiss a Board member, but the Commission wants to keep the member. Layer One allows the Commission to make that determination notwithstanding the President's contrary view. Layer Two is irrelevant because the Commission does not seek to remove the Board member.

4. The President wants to keep a Board member, but the Commission wants to dismiss the Board member. Here, Layer Two helps the President, for it hinders the Commission's ability to dismiss a Board member whom the President wants to keep in place.

Thus, the majority's decision to eliminate only Layer Two accomplishes virtually nothing. And that is because a removal restriction's effect upon presidential power depends not on the presence of a “double-layer” of for-cause removal, as the majority pretends, but rather on the real-world nature of the President's relationship with the Commission. If the President confronts a Commission that seeks to resist his policy preferences – a distinct possibility when, as here, a Commission's membership must reflect both political parties, 15 U.S.C. § 78d(a) – the restriction on the Commission's ability to remove a Board member is either irrelevant (as in scenario 3) or may actually help the President (as in scenario 4). And if the President faces a Commission that seeks to implement his policy preferences, Layer One is irrelevant, for the President and Commission see eye to eye.

In order to avoid this elementary logic, the Court creates two alternative scenarios. In the first, the Commission and the President both want to remove a Board member, but have varying judgments as to whether they have good “cause” to do so – i.e., the President and the Commission both conclude that a Board member should be removed, but disagree as to whether that conclusion (which they have both reached) is reasonable. In the second, the President wants to remove a Board member and the Commission disagrees; but, notwithstanding its freedom to make reasonable decisions independent of the President (afforded by Layer One), the Commission (while apparently telling the President that it agrees with him and would like to remove the Board member) uses Layer Two as an “excuse” to pursue its actual aims – an excuse which, given Layer One, it does not need.

Both of these circumstances seem unusual. I do not know if they have ever occurred. But I do not deny their logical possibility. I simply doubt their importance. And the fact that, with respect to the President's power, the double layer of for-cause removal sometimes might help, sometimes might hurt, leads me to conclude that its overall effect is at most indeterminate.

But once we leave the realm of hypothetical logic and view the removal provision at issue in the context of the entire Act, its lack of practical effect becomes readily apparent. That is because the statute provides the Commission with full authority and virtually comprehensive control over all of the Board's functions. Those who created the Accounting Board modeled it, in terms of structure and authority, upon the semiprivate regulatory bodies prevalent in the area of financial regulation, such as the New York Stock Exchange and other similar self-regulating organizations. See generally Brief for Former Chairmen of the SEC as Amici Curiae (hereinafter Brief for Former SEC Chairmen). And those organizations which rely on private financing and on officers drawn from the private sector – exercise rulemaking and adjudicatory authority that is pervasively controlled by, and is indeed “entirely derivative” of, the SEC. See National Assn. of Securities Dealers, Inc. v. SEC, 431 F.3d 803, 806 (C.A.D.C.2005).

Adhering to that model, the statute here gives the Accounting Board the power to adopt rules and standards “relating to the preparation of audit reports”; to adjudicate disciplinary proceedings involving accounting firms that fail to follow these rules; to impose sanctions; and to engage in other related activities, such as conducting inspections of accounting firms registered as the law requires and investigations to monitor compliance with the rules and related legal obligations. See 15 U.S.C. §§ 7211-7216. But, at the same time,

- No Accounting Board rule takes effect unless and until the Commission approves it, § 7217(b)(2);
• The Commission may “abrogat[e], delet[e] or ad[d] to” any rule or any portion of a rule promulgated by the Accounting Board whenever, in the Commission's view, doing so “further[s] the purposes” of the securities and accounting-oversight laws, § 7217(b)(5);

• The Commission may review any sanction the Board imposes and “enhance, modify, cancel, reduce, or require the remission of” that sanction if it find's the Board's action not “appropriate,” §§ 7215(e), 7217(c)(3);

• The Commission may promulgate rules restricting or directing the Accounting Board's conduct of all inspections and investigations, §§ 7211(c)(3), 7214(h), 7215(b)(1)-(4);

• The Commission may itself initiate any investigation or promulgate any rule within the Accounting Board's purview, § 7202, and may also remove any Accounting Board member who has unreasonably “failed to enforce compliance with” the relevant “rule[s], or any professional standard,” § 7217(d)(3)(C) (emphasis added);

• The Commission may at any time “relieve the Board of any responsibility to enforce compliance with any provision” of the Act, the rules, or professional standards if, in the Commission's view, doing so is in “the public interest,” § 7217(d)(1) (emphasis added).

As these statutory provisions make clear, the Court is simply wrong when it says that “the Act nowhere gives the Commission effective power to start, stop, or alter” Board investigations. On the contrary, the Commission's control over the Board's investigatory and legal functions is virtually absolute. Moreover, the Commission has general supervisory powers over the Accounting Board itself: It controls the Board's budget, §§ 7219(b), (d)(1); it can assign to the Board any “duties or functions” that it “determines are necessary or appropriate,” § 7211(c)(5); it has full “oversight and enforcement authority over the Board,” § 7217(a), including the authority to inspect the Board's activities whenever it believes it “appropriate” to do so, § 7217(d)(2) (emphasis added). And it can censure the Board or its members, as well as remove the members from office, if the members, for example, fail to enforce the Act, violate any provisions of the Act, or abuse the authority granted to them under the Act, § 7217(d)(3).

What is left? The Commission's inability to remove a Board member whose perfectly reasonable actions cause the Commission to overrule him with great frequency? What is the practical likelihood of that occurring, or, if it does, of the President's serious concern about such a matter? Everyone concedes that the President's control over the Commission is constitutionally sufficient. See Humphrey's Executor, 295 U.S. 602; Wiener, 357 U.S. 349. And if the President's control over the Commission is sufficient, and the Commission's control over the Board is virtually absolute, then, as a practical matter, the President's control over the Board should prove sufficient as well.

See generally PPH Corp. v. Consumer Financial Protection Board (CFPB), 881 F.3d 75 (2018) (7-3 en banc opinion) (provision President can remove CFPB Director only for “inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office” constitutional; does not intrude too greatly into Presidential powers).
For lower level federal employees, who are not in a policy-making role, and likely would not qualify as "Officers of the United States" who "exercis[e] significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States," but rather are "lesser functionaries subordinate to officers of the United States," Congress can provide civil service protection from at-will Presidential firing. In a 1978 analysis, a Senate Committee estimated that there were 2.9 million civil employees on the federal payroll, of whom 93% were subject to civil service protection prohibiting suspension or removal of such employees, except as provided in 5 U.S.C. § 7503(a) for suspensions of 14 days or less, or, under 5 U.S.C. § 7513(a), for more serious action, including removal, "for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service," which must be demonstrated at an administrative hearing. Civil service protection also typically applies to Administrative Law Judges and other Judges serving in Article I courts who do not have Article III protections of life-tenure and no diminution of salary while in office. Sometimes, however, there are proposals to restrict or amend such civil service protection, as in the Omnibus Patent Act of 1997 for patent examiners. Staff for federal judges, including secretaries and law clerks, do not have civil service protection under existing law.

2. Congress’ Power of Impeachment

Article II, § 4 of the Constitution provides, “The President, Vice President, and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.” In Article I, § 2, cl. 5, the House of Representatives is granted “the sole Power of Impeachment,” which by practice includes naming House members to prosecute the case before the Senate. In Article I, § 3, cl. 6, the Senate is granted “the sole Power to try all Impeachments,” with conviction by “two thirds of the Members present,” and in cases of impeachment of a President “the Chief Justice shall preside.” The Constitution provides in Article I, § 3, cl. 7, “Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualifications to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust, or Profit under the United States; but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment, and Punishment, according to Law.”

34 See Williams v. McClellan, 569 F.2d 1031, 1033 (8th Cir. 1978).
The power to impeach has rarely been used in our Nation’s history. From 1789 to 2006, only one Justice out of the 110, Samuel Chase in 1804, had been impeached, and no Justice, including Chase in 1805, and no Court of Appeals judge, had ever been convicted. As of 2003, eleven district court judges have been impeached of out more than 2,000 who have served, most on allegations of bribery, and six judges have been convicted.\textsuperscript{35}

Regarding executive officials, only two Presidents have been impeached, President Andrew Johnson in 1868 and President Bill Clinton in 1998. Neither were convicted by the Senate. Johnson’s impeachment for removing the Secretary of War without Senate approval fell one vote shy of two thirds, at 35-19. The Supreme Court has since decided that the President has the authority to fire Cabinet Secretaries at-will, discussed at § 10.2.1(B) nn.25-28. Votes on articles of impeachment for President Clinton regarding his grand jury testimony denying a sexual relationship with an intern, Monica Lewinsky, growing out of a deposition given in \textit{Clinton v. Jones}, excerpted at § 10.4.2, were: 45-55 (perjury), and 50-50 (obstruction of justice). President Richard Nixon resigned in 1974 before the House impeached him, but after a 27-9 vote of the House Judiciary Committee in favor of impeachment. Because lower federal officials typically are fired by the President or resign where credible evidence appears of an impeachable offense, only one lower federal executive official has been impeached, President Grant’s Secretary of War, William W. Belknap, in 1876. Even Belknap resigned once the House committee voted to impeach him. Congress continued the impeachment to try to impose the added punishment, discretionary with the Senate, of disqualifying him from holding office again, but the Senate vote, 37-25, failed to achieve the 2/3 majority.\textsuperscript{36}

Two main questions remain open about the relationship between judicial power and actions of Congress regarding impeachment. The first question is whether the phrase “high Crimes and Misdemeanors” is coextensive with violations of criminal law. The second issue is whether persons convicted and impeached may obtain judicial review of the impeachment proceedings.

With regard to the first question, while there are no cases on point, historical evidence suggests that use of the phrase “Misdemeanors” means that some behavior, even if not a “crime,” could be viewed by Congress as worthy of impeachment. On the other hand, not all crimes would necessarily be viewed by Congress as worthy of impeachment. This is particularly true since the remedy of impeachment was likely intended to be focused more on official misconduct, than private moral failings. For example, proceedings surrounding the Senate’s refusal to convict President Clinton suggest that for some Senators even if the President had technically violated criminal law by lying in a deposition about a sexual affair, some violations do not rise to the level of an impeachable offense. Alternatively, even if he had not violated the law, some behavior may be impeachable in any event. As an alternative to impeachment, Congress also could “censure” a President, a resolution by either House or both that would have no force of law, although one author has argued the “shame” of a censure is an unconstitutional Bill of Attainder.

With regard to the second question, the Supreme Court held in Nixon v. United States, excerpted at § 4.3.2, that whether the entire Senate had to hear the evidence regarding impeachment, or whether only a committee of the Senate could hear the evidence, was a political question. The Court indicated that since the text of the Constitution states that the “Senate shall have the sole power to try all Impeachments,” the decisions how to try the impeachment, by Senate committee or the full Senate, was not reviewable by a court under the political questions doctrine. In both cases of presidential impeachment, the entire Senate heard the case. The language in the Constitution stating that the “House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole Power of Impeachment” would likely mean courts cannot review the House’s impeachment proceedings either. Thus, an impeachment offense may well be “whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be,” as then-House Minority Leader Gerald Ford famously declared in 1970.

§ 10.3 Additional Executive Separation of Powers Issues

The Court applies the same kind of separation of power analysis involving balancing concern with the need for governmental efficiency versus preventing tyranny to cases not directly involving appointment and removal issues. For example, because of a concern with legislative tyranny, and no strong arguments of governmental efficiency, the Court confirmed in Bowsher v. Synar its long-held view that no executive functions can be performed by a member of the legislative branch. Thus, as an alternative ground in Bowsher, in addition to the problem with congressional removal, the Court held that Congress could not authorize the Comptroller General to determine what budget reductions were necessary to comply with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act budget guidelines because this was an “executive function" that could not be exercised by a member of the legislative branch.

In Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, the Court held that Congress could not transfer United States airport property to a State Board where that board could make important decisions only upon approval of a Board of Review comprised of members of Congress serving on committees overseeing airport activities. The Court said that if the Board's power were executive, the Constitution would not permit an agent of Congress to exercise it, as that would transfer to the legislative branch executive responsibilities. A long line of precedents, including Bowsher v. Synar, as noted above, had held that unconstitutional. If the Board’s power were legislative, it had to be exercised consistent with bicameralism and presentment, as in Chadha. The Court noted that if this Board were valid, Congress might use similar devices to retain control of the activities of state grant recipients charged with executing federal policy.

The rule that seems to emerge from the separation of powers cases is that where constitutional text is clear, and supports a finding of unconstitutionality – such as issues surrounding the Bicameralism and Presentment Clauses in Chadha, excerpted at § 9.3, or the President’s veto power in Clinton v. City of New York, excerpted at § 9.4, or limitations on the President’s power to nominate in Public Citizen, noted at § 10.1 nn.7-8 – that text will prevail. Where the text is clear but supports the constitutionality of the government action, as with the Appointments Clause in Morrison, excerpted at § 10.1, or the text is not clear or no text exists, as in Bowsher v. Synar, discussed at § 10.2.1(A) nn.20-23, the Court will go beyond text and will use a balancing test to determine further whether there are any constitutional problems with the government action. That balancing test will be based upon the twin separation of powers concerns of (1) efficiency/no incongruity of action versus (2) the prevention of tyranny/no impermissible aggrandizement of power, along with consideration of legislative and executive practice and precedent, as was done in Morrison and Mistretta.

43  In dissent, Holmesian Justices White and Rehnquist, along with instrumentalist Justice Marshall, said that South Dakota v. Dole, on conditional spending, placed this Board outside of separation-of-powers scrutiny. In any event, the power here was executive, not legislative, so Chadha did not apply. Bowsher was distinguished as involving greater congressional control. Id. at 277-93 (White, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Marshall, J., dissenting). The Court responded that Dole involved only federalism issues of congressional power under the Spending Clause, not the separation of power issues involved here, and that Bowsher had reflected a categorical rule regarding agents of Congress exercising executive powers, not a balancing test. Id. at 270-71.

Under this approach today, virtually all delegations of legislative power to the President or administrative agencies are constitutional. Action by the President without express or implied congressional consent, which is outside clear text, like for “Commander-in-Chief” or “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed,” raise more serious separation of powers concerns. This is particularly true given the increased use by Presidents of Executive Orders and other presidential directives to make policy.

Another issue that has arisen is the use of “presidential signing statements,” whereby a President signs a bill, but indicates his view that parts of the bill are unconstitutional, particularly provisions that are viewed as intruding on inherent presidential authority. As a constitutional matter, the President has the authority to express such views, and act upon them, subject to later judicial review, just as a President can view an existing statute passed before he took office as unconstitutional. Between 2001-06, President George W. Bush issued signing statements objecting to more than 700 distinct provisions of law – more than all previous presidents combined. This enhanced use has raised concerns from members of Congress and other groups, such as the American Bar Association.

Probably the best explanation for President George W. Bush’s increased use of presidential signing statements is that his advisers were driven predominantly by a formalist, strict separation of powers approach and belief in the “Unitary Executive” model of strong executive power, while Congress and the Courts have consistently adopted a non-formalist, sharing of powers approach to separation of powers issues, with greater limits on inherent executive power. These differences are summarized at § 9.1.1 nn.3-13. Since the Supreme Court has usually sided with Congress on these issues, a number of President Bush’s signing statements might not be valid if ever challenged in court, even given the Court’s willingness to tolerate some aspects of strong executive power, particularly in the field of foreign affairs.

On March 9, 2009, President Obama released a memorandum on the subject of “Presidential Signing Statements.” Indicating a more cautious approach to the use of signing statements than that of President Bush, President Obama stated, “I will ensure that signing statements identify my constitutional concerns about a statutory provision with sufficient specificity to make clear the nature and basis of the constitutional objection.” The memorandum further stated, “To ensure that all signing statements previously issued are followed only when consistent with these principles, executive branch departments and agencies are directed to seek the advice of the Attorney General before relying on signing statements issued prior to the date of this memorandum as the basis for disregarding, or otherwise refusing to comply with, any provision of a statute.”

45 On this history of Executive Order use and questions regarding their today, see, e.g., Tara L. Branum, President or King? The Use and Abuse of Executive Orders in Modern-Day America, 28 J. Legis. 1 (2002).

President Obama faced criticism for executive actions to waive deportation for some aliens illegally in the United States,\(^\text{47}\) and waiving for one year the employer mandate in the Affordable Care Act.\(^\text{48}\) Under a literal approach, such action could be criticized as inconsistent with the President’s responsibility to “take Care that the Laws shall be faithfully executed.”\(^\text{49}\) On the other hand, it is established executive practice that executive officials, both at the federal and state levels, have prosecutorial discretion not to enforce every law to its 100% limit.\(^\text{50}\) Such accepted executive practice would likely insulate the President from any serious attack on these actions, unless a majority of the Court switched to a literal approach to separation of powers issues. Where the President has gone beyond mere “waiving” deportation, but as part of the “waiver” making the illegal alien eligible for “work permits” or certain “social security” benefits, courts have raised more serious concerns with whether normal administrative “notice and comment” rulemaking can be waived. See, e.g., Texas v. United States, 787 F.3d 733 (5th Cir. 2015) (2-1 panel decision), affirmed by an equally divided court, United States v. Texas, 136 S. Ct. 2271 (2016).

§ 10.4  Immunities from Legal Action

1.  Executive Immunities from Judicial Processes

There is no constitutional text dealing with the issue of presidential immunities from judicial process. Nevertheless, based upon general separation of powers and checks and balances concerns, the Court has developed a doctrine regarding presidential immunities.

\(^{50}\) See, e.g., Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985) (enforcement decisions “subject to agency discretion” and “unreviewable” by a court under the Administrative Procedure Act, unless Congress clearly indicates a contrary intent in the statute delegating power to the agency); Michael A. Olivas, Dreams Deferred: Deferred Action, Prosecutorial Discretion, and the Vexing Case(s) of Dream Act Students, 21 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 463 (2012) (prosecutorial discretion common in such cases).
Under this doctrine, confidences of the President are entitled to some protection from judicial intervention. When determining the extent of immunity from judicial process, the Court has engaged in standard separation of powers balancing to determine whether the claim of the President to be free from interference in order to promote efficient operations within the executive branch outweighs the interests of the judiciary in promoting justice and preventing governmental tyranny.

In United States v. Nixon, \(^{51}\) excerpted below, the President claimed an absolute immunity from a judicial subpoena of documents relating to presidential conversations concerning the Watergate cover-up. In applying a balancing test, an 8-0 Supreme Court drew a distinction between a specific need for confidentiality, as exists for military, diplomatic, or sensitive national security interests, and a general need for confidentiality in other kinds of circumstances. The Court also drew a distinction between a court’s specific need for material evidence which could not be adequately obtained from other sources and a general need for background information. In Nixon, given only a generalized need for confidentiality by the President, and a special need for evidence by the trial court, the Court said there was not a sufficient risk that presidential advisers would temper their candor by the infrequent chance that presidential conversations would be called for in a criminal trial.\(^ {52}\)

Whether the result would have been the same had the balance of needs been different seems questionable. Thus, if the President had a specific need for confidentiality, or had the case involved a generalized need for confidentiality balanced against a generalized need for information at trial, the result might have changed. Given less important interests at stake, Presidents have never been required to provide evidence in civil trials, although sometimes Presidents have done so voluntarily.

Presidential confidentiality was also limited by the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act of 1974. That Act directed the Administrator of General Services to take custody of ex-President Nixon’s papers and tapes, to have archivists screen them, and to determinate conditions for public access. Nixon challenged the act, claiming he had an interest in presidential privacy which deserved protection. Justice Brennan conceded in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services\(^ {53}\) that the privilege of confidentiality could be claimed by ex-Presidents, as well as by incumbent Presidents. However, the materials here remained in the executive branch and there was no reason to believe that the restrictions on public access ultimately to be established by regulations would not be adequate to preserve executive confidentiality. A professional screening process, said the Court, was not a greater intrusion into confidentiality than the in camera inspection approved in United States v. Nixon. Balanced against the President’s claim of executive efficiency was the concern that the papers be preserved for history, particularly papers which might reveal abuses by the Nixon administration that would help keep the Nation on guard against governmental tyranny.

With regard to the taping system at issue in United States v. Nixon, Presidents since Franklin D. Roosevelt have occasionally taped conversations in the Oval Office, or other conversations, such as Cabinet meetings. President Lyndon B. Johnson was apparently the first President to tape all of his conversations in the Oval Office. President Nixon instituted a voice-activated taping system, which was stopped in 1973. Manually activated taping of virtually all Oval Office conversations continues to the present day.

United States v. Nixon

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This litigation presents for review the denial of a motion, filed in the District Court on behalf of the President of the United States, in the case of United States v. Mitchell (D. C. Crim. No. 74-110), to quash a third-party subpoena duces tecum issued by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, pursuant to Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 17(c). The subpoena directed the President to produce certain tape recordings and documents relating to his conversations with aides and advisers. The court rejected the President's claims of absolute executive privilege, of lack of jurisdiction, and of failure to satisfy the requirements of Rule 17(c). The President appealed to the Court of Appeals. We granted both the United States' petition for certiorari before judgment (No. 73-1766), and also the President's cross-petition for certiorari before judgment (No. 73-1834), because of the public importance of the issues presented and the need for their prompt resolution. 417 U.S. 927 and 960 (1974).

On March 1, 1974, a grand jury of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia returned an indictment charging seven named individuals with various offenses, including conspiracy to defraud the United States and to obstruct justice. Although he was not designated as such in the indictment, the grand jury named the President, among others, as an unindicted coconspirator. On April 18, 1974, upon motion of the Special Prosecutor, a subpoena duces tecum was issued pursuant to Rule 17(c) to the President by the United States District Court and made returnable on May 2, 1974. This subpoena required the production, in advance of the September 9 trial date, of certain tapes, memoranda, papers, transcripts, or other writings relating to certain precisely identified meetings between the President and others. The Special Prosecutor was able to fix the time, place, and persons present at these discussions because the White House daily logs and appointment records had been delivered to him. On April 30, the President publicly released edited transcripts of 43 conversations; portions of 20 conversations subject to subpoena in the present case were included. On May 1, 1974, the President's counsel filed a "special appearance" and a motion to quash the subpoena under Rule 17(c). This motion was accompanied by a formal claim of privilege.

On May 20, 1974, the District Court denied the motion to quash and the motions to expunge and for protective orders. 377 F. Supp. 1326. It further ordered "the President or any subordinate officer, official, or employee with custody or control of the documents or objects subpoenaed," id., at 1331, to deliver to the District Court, on or before May 31, 1974, the originals of all subpoenaed items, as well as an index and analysis of those items, together with tape copies of those portions of the subpoenaed recordings for which transcripts had been released to the public by the President on April 30. The District Court rejected jurisdictional challenges based on a contention that the dispute was nonjusticiable because it was between the Special Prosecutor and the Chief Executive and hence "intra-executive" in character; it also rejected the contention that the Judiciary was without authority to review an assertion of executive privilege by the President.

Later on May 24, the Special Prosecutor also filed, in this Court, a petition for a writ of certiorari before judgment. On May 31, the petition was granted with an expedited briefing schedule. 417 U.S. 927. On June 6, the President filed, under seal, a cross-petition for writ of certiorari before judgment. This cross-petition was granted June 15, 1974, 417 U.S. 960, and the case was set for argument on July 8, 1974.

In the District Court, the President's counsel argued that the court lacked jurisdiction to issue the subpoena because the matter was an intra-branch dispute between a subordinate and superior officer of the Executive Branch and hence not subject to judicial resolution. That argument has been renewed in this Court with emphasis on the contention that the dispute does not present a "case" or "controversy" which can be adjudicated in the federal courts. The President's counsel argues that the federal courts should not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of Government. He views the present dispute as essentially a "jurisdictional" dispute within the Executive Branch which he analogizes to a dispute between two congressional committees. Since the Executive Branch has exclusive authority and absolute discretion to decide whether to prosecute a case, Confiscation Cases, 7 Wall. 454 (1869); United States v. Cox, 342 F.2d 167, 171 (CA5), cert. denied sub nom. Cox v. Hauberg, 381 U.S. 935 (1965), it is contended that a President's decision is final in determining what evidence is to be used in a given criminal case. Although his counsel concedes that the President has delegated certain specific powers to the Special Prosecutor, he has not "waived nor delegated to the Special Prosecutor the President's duty to claim privilege as to all materials . . . which fall within the President's inherent authority to refuse to disclose to any executive officer." Brief for the President 42. The Special Prosecutor's demand for the items therefore presents, in the view of the President's counsel, a political question under Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), since it involves a "textually demonstrable" grant of power under Art. II.

Here, as in Accardi [347 U.S. 260 (1954)], it is theoretically possible for the Attorney General to amend or revoke the regulation defining the Special Prosecutor's authority. But he has not done so. So long as this regulation remains in force the Executive Branch is bound by it, and indeed the United States as the sovereign composed of the three branches is bound to respect and to enforce it. Moreover, the delegation of authority to the Special Prosecutor in this case is not an ordinary delegation by the Attorney General to a subordinate officer: with the authorization of the President, the Acting Attorney General provided in the regulation that the Special Prosecutor was not to be removed without the "consensus" of eight designated leaders of Congress.

The demands of and the resistance to the subpoena present an obvious controversy in the ordinary sense, but that alone is not sufficient to meet constitutional standards. In the constitutional sense, controversy means more than disagreement and conflict; rather it means the kind of controversy courts traditionally resolve. Here at issue is the production or nonproduction of specified evidence deemed by the Special Prosecutor to be relevant and admissible in a pending criminal case. It is sought by one official of the Executive Branch within the scope of his express authority; it is resisted by the Chief Executive on the ground of his duty to preserve the confidentiality of the communications of the President. Whatever the correct answer on the merits, these issues are "of a type which are traditionally justiciable." United States v. ICC, 337 U.S., at 430. The independent Special Prosecutor with his asserted need for the subpoenaed material in the underlying criminal prosecution is opposed by the President with his steadfast assertion of privilege against disclosure of the material. This setting assures there is "that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues upon which the court so largely depends for illumination of difficult constitutional questions." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S., at 204. Moreover, since the matter is one arising in the regular course of a federal criminal prosecution, it is within the traditional scope of Art. III power. Id., at 198.

Having determined that the requirements of Rule 17(c) were satisfied, we turn to the claim that the subpoena should be quashed because it demands "confidential conversations between a President and his close advisors that it would be inconsistent with the public interest to produce." App. 48a. The first contention is a broad claim that the separation of powers doctrine precludes judicial review of a President's claim of privilege. The second contention is that if he does not prevail on the claim of absolute privilege, the court should hold as a matter of constitutional law that the privilege prevails over the subpoena duces tecum.

In support of his claim of absolute privilege, the President's counsel urges two grounds . . . . The first ground is the valid need for protection of communications between high Government officials and those who advise and assist them in the performance of their manifold duties; the importance of this confidentiality is too plain to require further discussion. Human experience teaches that those who expect public dissemination of their remarks may well temper candor with a concern for appearances and for their own interests to the detriment of the decisionmaking process. Whatever the nature of the privilege of confidentiality of Presidential communications in the exercise of Art. II powers, the privilege can be said to derive from the supremacy of each branch within its own assigned area of constitutional duties. Certain powers and privileges flow from the nature of enumerated powers; the protection of the confidentiality Presidential communications has similar constitutional underpinnings.

The second ground asserted by the President's counsel in support of claim of absolute privilege rests on the doctrine of separation of powers. Here it is argued that the independence of the Executive Branch within its own sphere, Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 629-630 (1935); Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 190-191 (1881), insulates a President from a judicial subpoena in an ongoing criminal prosecution, and thereby protects confidential Presidential communications.

However, neither the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances. The President's need for complete candor and objectivity from advisers calls for great deference from the courts. However, when the privilege depends solely on the broad, undifferentiated claim of public interest in the confidentiality of such conversations, a confrontation with other values arises. Absent a claim of need to protect military, diplomatic, or sensitive national security secrets, we find it difficult to accept the argument that even the very important interest in confidentiality of Presidential communications is significantly diminished by production of such material for \textit{in camera} inspection with all the protection that a district court will be obliged to provide.

The impediment that an absolute, unqualified privilege would place in the way of the primary constitutional duty of the Judicial Branch to do justice in criminal prosecutions would plainly conflict with the function of the courts under Art. III. In designing the structure of our Government and dividing and allocating the sovereign power among three co-equal branches, the Framers of the Constitution sought to provide a comprehensive system, but the separate powers were not intended to operate with absolute independence.

To read the Art. II powers of the President as providing an absolute privilege as against a subpoena essential to enforcement of criminal statutes on no more than a generalized claim of the public interest in confidentiality of nonmilitary and nondiplomatic discussions would upset the constitutional balance of "a workable government" and gravely impair the role of the courts . . . .

The expectation of a President to the confidentiality of his conversations and correspondence, like the claim of confidentiality of judicial deliberations, for example, has all the values to which we accord deference for the privacy of all citizens and, added to those values, is the necessity for protection of the public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions in Presidential decisionmaking. A President and those who assist him must be free to explore alternatives in the process of shaping policies and making decisions and to do so in a way many would be unwilling to express except privately. These are the considerations justifying a presumptive privilege for Presidential communications. The privilege is fundamental to the operation of Government and inextricably rooted in the separation of powers under the Constitution. In \textit{Nixon v. Sirica}, 487 F.2d 700 (1973), the Court of Appeals held that such Presidential communications are "presumptively privileged," id., at 717, and this position is accepted by both parties in the present litigation. We agree with Mr. Chief Justice Marshall's observation, therefore, that "[i]n no case of this kind would a court be required to proceed against the president as against an ordinary individual." \textit{United States v. Burr}, 25 F. Cas., at 192.

But this presumptive privilege must be considered in light of our historic commitment to the rule of law. This is nowhere more profoundly manifest than in our view that "the twofold aim [of criminal justice] is that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer." \textit{Berger v. United States}, 295 U.S., at 88. We have elected to employ an adversary system of criminal justice in which the parties contest all issues before a court of law. The need to develop all relevant facts in the adversary system is both fundamental and comprehensive. The ends of criminal justice would be defeated if judgments were to be founded on a partial or speculative presentation of the facts. The very integrity of the judicial system and public confidence in the system depend on full disclosure of all the facts, within the framework of the rules of evidence.
The right to the production of all evidence at a criminal trial similarly has constitutional dimensions. The Sixth Amendment explicitly confers upon every defendant in a criminal trial the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" and "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Moreover, the Fifth Amendment also guarantees that no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law. It is the manifest duty of the courts to vindicate those guarantees, and to accomplish that it is essential that all relevant and admissible evidence be produced.

In this case we must weigh the importance of the general privilege of confidentiality of Presidential communications in performance of the President's responsibilities against the inroads of such a privilege on the fair administration of criminal justice. The interest in preserving confidentiality is weighty indeed and entitled to great respect. However, we cannot conclude that advisers will be moved to temper the candor of their remarks by the infrequent occasions of disclosure because of the possibility that such conversations will be called for in the context of a criminal prosecution.

On the other hand, the allowance of the privilege to withhold evidence that is demonstrably relevant in a criminal trial would cut deeply into the guarantee of due process of law and gravely impair the basic function of the courts. A President's acknowledged need for confidentiality in the communications of his office is general in nature, whereas the constitutional need for production of relevant evidence in a criminal proceeding is specific and central to the fair adjudication of a particular criminal case in the administration of justice. Without access to specific facts a criminal prosecution may be totally frustrated. The President's broad interest in confidentiality of communications will not be vitiatingly disposed of by disclosure of a limited number of conversations preliminarily shown to have any bearing on the pending criminal cases.

We conclude that when the ground for asserting privilege as to subpoenaed materials sought for use in a criminal trial is based only on the generalized interest in confidentiality, it cannot prevail over the fundamental demands of due process of law in the fair administration of criminal justice. The generalized assertion of privilege must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial.

Enforcement of the subpoena duces tecum was stayed pending this Court's [decision]. Those issues now having been disposed of, the matter of implementation will rest with the District Court. . . . Statements that meet the test of admissibility and relevance must be isolated; all other material must be excised. At this stage the District Court is not limited to representations of the Special Prosecutor as to the evidence sought by the subpoena; the material will be available to the District Court. It is elementary that in camera inspection of evidence is always a procedure calling for scrupulous protection against any release or publication of material not found by the court, at that stage, probably admissible in evidence and relevant to the issues of the trial for which it is sought. That being true of an ordinary situation, it is obvious that the District Court has a very heavy responsibility to see to it that Presidential conversations, which are either not relevant or not admissible, are accorded that high degree of respect due the President of the United States.

Justice REHNQUIST took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.
Presidential authority in the area of executive privilege was enhanced by \textit{Cheney v. United States District Court for the District of Columbia}.\textsuperscript{54} In this case, a 7-2 Court held Vice President Cheney and other members of an National Energy Policy Development Group were not required to assert executive privilege before separation of powers arguments regarding Presidential confidentiality could be considered. The Court noted that executive privilege is an extraordinary assertion of power "not to be lightly invoked" and that "there is sound precedent in the District of Columbia itself for district courts to explore other avenues, short of forcing the Executive to invoke privilege, when they are asked to enforce against the Executive Branch unnecessarily broad subpoenas."

On the merits, the Court noted that the balance here regarding the need for information versus the President’s need for confidentiality was different than in \textit{Nixon}. The Court noted:

[W]hen compared against \textit{United States v. Nixon}'s criminal subpoenas, which did involve the President, the civil discovery here militates against respondents' position. The observation in \textit{Nixon} that production of confidential information would not disrupt the functioning of the Executive Branch cannot be applied in a mechanistic fashion to civil litigation. In the criminal justice system, there are various constraints, albeit imperfect, to filter out insubstantial legal claims. The decision to prosecute a criminal case, for example, is made by a publicly accountable prosecutor subject to budgetary considerations and under an ethical obligation, not only to win and zealously to advocate for his client but also to serve the cause of justice. The rigors of the penal system are also mitigated by the responsible exercise of prosecutorial discretion. In contrast, there are no analogous checks in the civil discovery process here. Although under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, sanctions are available, and private attorneys also owe an obligation of candor to the judicial tribunal, these safeguards have proved insufficient to discourage the filing of meritless claims against the Executive Branch. "In view of the visibility of" the Offices of the President and the Vice President and "the effect of their actions on countless people," they are "easily identifiable targets for suits for civil damages."

[T]he narrow subpoena orders in \textit{United States v. Nixon} stand on an altogether different footing from the overly broad discovery requests approved by the District Court in this case. The criminal subpoenas in \textit{Nixon} were required to satisfy exacting standards of "(1) relevancy; (2) admissibility; (3) specificity." They were "not intended to provide a means of discovery." The burden of showing these standards were met . . . fell on the party requesting the information.\textsuperscript{55}
\end{quote}

Numerous commentators have explored the separation of powers issues involved in these cases, including whether or not executive privilege is officially invoked, and such issues have naturally arisen in both Republican and Democratic Administrations.\textsuperscript{56}

2. Immunity from Damage Actions

With respect to damage claims for official presidential acts, even those within the "outer perimeter" of official responsibility, a 5-4 Court adopted a test of absolutely immunity in Nixon v. Fitzgerald, excerpted below, rather than a balancing test. The Court reserved the question whether Congress could create a damage action against the President on behalf of wronged individuals. In a concurrence, Chief Justice Burger indicated that he believed the question of whether Congress could create such a damage award was implicitly settled by the majority in the negative, since the decision in Fitzgerald was based on constitutional grounds and Congress cannot overrule a constitutional decision by statute. For a formalist judge, like Burger, who places little weight in constitutional decisionmaking on legislative and executive practice, this conclusion would appear warranted. His conclusion is also consistent with the conservative predisposition toward the executive branch in checks and balances cases, as discussed at § 9.1.1 n.14. However, for non-formalist judges, if there were legislative practice supporting a damage award against the President, that practice would need to be considered in the Court’s constitutional analysis of the doctrine regarding presidential immunities. Perhaps for this reason, the majority in Fitzgerald reserved the question of congressional power to create a damage action against the President.

A further issue of presidential immunity involves the question whether the President has an immunity from having to defend, while President, civil damages in litigation arising out of events that occurred before he took office, or events while in office which are not part of his “official” responsibilities. In 1997, the Supreme Court considered Clinton v. Jones, excerpted below, a case involving both of these elements. As the alleged activity, sexual harassment, occurred before President Clinton became President, there was no question of ultimate presidential immunity from lawsuit. The only issue was whether President Clinton had immunity while President from being sued, as the lawsuit might distract the President from presidential obligations.

It seems the critical point of difference between Jones and Fitzgerald in the Jones Court’s view was the official or non-official character of the activities being the subject of the lawsuit, rather than the activities in Jones occurring before Clinton became President. Under this interpretation, a sitting President who was alleged to engage in sexual harassment while President could also have this kind of lawsuit brought while serving as President. Despite this conclusion, language in Fitzgerald indicated that it “would deprive absolute immunity of its intended effect” if the President could be subjected to trial on “virtually every allegation that an action was unlawful, or was taken for a forbidden purpose.” The Court in Fitzgerald thus indicated that possibly a case for damages could not be brought against the President for a “forbidden purpose” even if the President’s action was not based on official authority to act.\textsuperscript{59} A later Supreme Court wishing to limit the \textit{Jones} decision predominantly to cases of activities that occurred before the President took office, the core holding of \textit{Jones} given its facts, could use this language in \textit{Fitzgerald} to limit inquiry into almost all activities of a sitting President, although such an interpretation would seem to be at odds with the general reasoning given in the \textit{Jones} opinion that \textit{Fitzgerald’s} reasoning “provides no support for an immunity for \textit{unofficial} conduct.”\textsuperscript{60}

\textbf{Nixon v. Fitzgerald}
\textit{457 U.S. 731 (1982)}

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff in this lawsuit seeks relief in civil damages from a former President of the United States. The claim rests on actions allegedly taken in the former President's official capacity during his tenure in office. The issue before us is the scope of the immunity possessed by the President of the United States.

In January 1970 the respondent A. Ernest Fitzgerald lost his job as a management analyst with the Department of the Air Force. Fitzgerald's dismissal occurred in the context of a departmental reorganization and reduction in force, in which his job was eliminated. In announcing the reorganization, the Air Force characterized the action as taken to promote economy and efficiency in the Armed Forces.

Respondent's discharge attracted unusual attention in Congress and in the press. Fitzgerald had attained national prominence approximately one year earlier, during the waning months of the Presidency of Lyndon B. Johnson. On November 13, 1968, Fitzgerald appeared before the Subcommittee on Economy in Government of the Joint Economic Committee of the United States Congress. To the evident embarrassment of his superiors in the Department of Defense, Fitzgerald testified that cost-overruns on the C-5A transport plane could approximate $2 billion. He also revealed that unexpected technical difficulties had arisen during the development of the aircraft.

In an internal memorandum of January 20, 1970, White House aide Alexander Butterfield reported to Haldeman that “‘Fitzgerald is no doubt a top-notch cost expert, but he must be given very low marks in loyalty; and after all, loyalty is the name of the game.’” Butterfield therefore recommended that “‘[W]e should let him bleed, for a while at least.’” There is no evidence of White House efforts to reemploy Fitzgerald subsequent to the Butterfield memorandum.

The President occupies a unique position in the constitutional scheme. Article II, § 1, of the Constitution provides that “[t]he executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States. . . .” This grant of authority establishes the President as the chief constitutional officer of the Executive Branch, entrusted with supervisory and policy responsibilities of utmost discretion and sensitivity. These include the enforcement of federal law—it is the President who is charged constitutionally to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed”; the conduct of foreign affairs—a realm in which the Court has recognized that “[i]t would be intolerable that courts, without the relevant information, should review and perhaps nullify actions of the Executive taken on information properly held secret”; and management of the Executive Branch—a task for which “imperative reasons require [e] an unrestricted power [in the President] to remove the most important of his subordinates in their most important duties.”

Because of the singular importance of the President's duties, diversion of his energies by concern with private lawsuits would raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government. As is the case with prosecutors and judges—for whom absolute immunity now is established—a President must concern himself with matters likely to “arouse the most intense feelings.” Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S., at 554. Yet, as our decisions have recognized, it is in precisely such cases that there exists the greatest public interest in providing an official “the maximum ability to deal fearlessly and impartially with” the duties of his office. Ferri v. Ackerman, 444 U.S. 193, 203 (1979). This concern is compelling where the officeholder must make the most sensitive and far-reaching decisions entrusted to any official under our constitutional system. Nor can the sheer prominence of the President's office be ignored. In view of the visibility of his office and the effect of his actions on countless people, the President would be an easily identifiable target for suits for civil damages. Cognizance of this personal vulnerability frequently could distract a President from his public duties, to the detriment of not only the President and his office but also the Nation that the Presidency was designed to serve.

A rule of absolute immunity for the President will not leave the Nation without sufficient protection against misconduct on the part of the Chief Executive. There remains the constitutional remedy of impeachment. In addition, there are formal and informal checks on Presidential action that do not apply with equal force to other executive officials. The President is subjected to constant scrutiny by the press. Vigilant oversight by Congress also may serve to deter Presidential abuses of office, as well as to make credible the threat of impeachment. Other incentives to avoid misconduct may include a desire to earn reelection, the need to maintain prestige as an element of Presidential influence, and a President's traditional concern for his historical stature.

We have previously stated that “the law of privilege as a defense to damages actions against officers of Government has ‘in large part been of judicial making.’” Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S., at 501-502, quoting Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 569 (1959). But this does not mean that the Court has simply “enacted” its own view of the best public policy. No doubt judicial convictions about public policy—whether and what kind of immunity is necessary or wise—have played a part, but the courts have been guided and constrained by common-law tradition, the relevant statutory background, and our constitutional structure and history. Our cases dealing with the immunity of Members of Congress are constructions of the Speech or Debate Clause and are guided by the history of such privileges at common law. The decisions dealing with the immunity of state officers involve the question of whether and to what extent Congress intended to abolish the common-law privileges by providing a remedy in the predecessor of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for constitutional violations by state officials. Our decisions respecting immunity for federal officials—including absolute immunity for judges, prosecutors, and those officials doing similar work—also in large part reflect common-law views, as well as judicial conclusions as to what privileges are necessary if particular functions are to be performed in the public interest.

Unfortunately, there is little of this approach in the Court's decision today. The Court casually, but candidly, abandons the functional approach to immunity that has run through all of our decisions. Indeed, the majority turns this rule on its head by declaring that because the functions of the President's office are so varied and diverse and some of them so profoundly important, the office is unique and must be clothed with officewide, absolute immunity. This is policy, not law, and in my view, very poor policy.

Clinton v. Jones

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case raises a constitutional and a prudential question concerning the Office of the President of the United States. Respondent, a private citizen, seeks to recover damages from the current occupant of that office based on actions allegedly taken before his term began. The President submits that in all but the most exceptional cases the Constitution requires federal courts to defer such litigation until his term ends and that, in any event, respect for the office warrants such a stay. Despite the force of the arguments supporting the President's submissions, we conclude that they must be rejected.

Petitioner, William Jefferson Clinton, was elected to the Presidency 1992, and re-elected in 1996. His term of office expires on January 20, 2001. In 1991 he was the Governor of the State of Arkansas. Respondent, Paula Corbin Jones, is a resident of California. In 1991 she lived in Arkansas, and was an employee of the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission.

On May 6, 1994, she commenced this action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas by filing a complaint naming petitioner and Danny Ferguson, a former Arkansas State Police officer, as defendants. The complaint alleges two federal claims, and two state law claims over which the federal court has jurisdiction because of the diverse citizenship of the parties. As the case comes to us, we are required to assume the truth of the detailed – but as yet untested – factual allegations in the complaint.
Those allegations principally describe events that are said to have occurred on the afternoon of May 8, 1991, during an official conference held at the Excelsior Hotel in Little Rock, Arkansas. The Governor delivered a speech at the conference; respondent – working as a state employee – staffed the registration desk. She alleges that Ferguson persuaded her to leave her desk and to visit the Governor in a business suite at the hotel, where he made "abhorrent" sexual advances that she vehemently rejected. She further claims that her superiors at work subsequently dealt with her in a hostile and rude manner, and changed her duties to punish her for rejecting those advances. Finally, she alleges that after petitioner was elected President, Ferguson defamed her by making a statement to a reporter that implied she had accepted petitioner's alleged overtures, and that various persons authorized to speak for the President publicly branded her a liar by denying that the incident had occurred.

The District Judge denied the motion to dismiss on immunity grounds and ruled that discovery in the case could go forward, but ordered any trial stayed until the end of petitioner's Presidency. 869 F. Supp. 690 (E.D Ark. 1994). Although she recognized that a "thin majority" in Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982), had held that "the President has absolute immunity from civil damage actions arising out of the execution of official duties of office," she was not convinced that "a President has absolute immunity from civil causes of action arising prior to assuming the office." She was, however, persuaded by some of the reasoning in our opinion in Fitzgerald that deferring the trial if one were required would be appropriate. 869 F. Supp. at 699-700. Relying in part on the fact that respondent had failed to bring her complaint until two days before the 3-year period of limitations expired, she concluded that the public interest in avoiding litigation that might hamper the President in conducting the duties of his office outweighed any demonstrated need for an immediate trial. Id., at 698-699.

Both parties appealed. A divided panel of the Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of the motion to dismiss, but because it regarded the order postponing the trial until the President leaves office as the "functional equivalent" of a grant of temporary immunity, it reversed that order.

The President, represented by private counsel, filed a petition for certiorari. The Solicitor General, representing the United States, supported the petition, arguing that the decision of the Court of Appeals was "fundamentally mistaken" and created "serious risks for the institution of the Presidency." In her brief in opposition to certiorari, respondent argued that this "one-of-a-kind case is singularly inappropriate" for the exercise of our certiorari jurisdiction because it did not create any conflict among the Courts of Appeals, it "does not pose any conceivable threat to the functioning of the Executive Branch," and there is no precedent supporting the President's position.

While our decision to grant the petition expressed no judgment concerning the merits of the case, it does reflect our appraisal of its importance. The representations made on behalf of the Executive Branch as to the potential impact of the precedent established by the Court of Appeals merit our respectful and deliberate consideration.

[W]hen defining the scope of an immunity for acts clearly taken within an official capacity, we have applied a functional approach. "Frequently our decisions have held that an official's absolute immunity should extend only to acts in performance of particular functions of his office." [Fitzgerald, 457 U.S.] at 755. Hence, for example, a judge's absolute immunity does not extend to actions performed in a purely administrative capacity. See Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 229-230 (1988). As our opinions have made clear, immunities are grounded in "the nature of the function performed, not the identity of the actor who performed it." Id., at 229.

Petitioner's effort to construct an immunity from suit for unofficial acts grounded purely in the identity of his office is unsupported by precedent.

Petitioner's strongest argument supporting his immunity claim is based on the text and structure of the Constitution. He does not contend that the occupant of the Office of the President is "above the law," in the sense that his conduct is entirely immune from judicial scrutiny. The President argues merely for a postponement of the judicial proceedings that will determine whether he violated any law. His argument is grounded in the character of the office that was created by Article II of the Constitution, and relies on separation of powers principles that have structured our constitutional arrangement since the founding.

As a starting premise, petitioner contends that he occupies a unique office with powers and responsibilities so vast and important that the public interest demands that he devote his undivided time and attention to his public duties. He submits that – given the nature of the office – the doctrine of separation of powers places limits on the authority of the Federal Judiciary to interfere with the Executive Branch that would be transgressed by allowing this action to proceed.

Rather than arguing that the decision of the case will produce either an aggrandizement of judicial power or a narrowing of executive power, petitioner contends that – as a by-product of an otherwise traditional exercise of judicial power – burdens will be placed on the President that will hamper the performance of his official duties. . . . As a factual matter, petitioner contends that this particular case – as well as the potential additional litigation that an affirrnance of the Court of Appeals judgment might spawn – may impose an unacceptable burden on the President's time and energy, and thereby impair the effective performance of his office.

Petitioner's predictive judgment finds little support in either history or the relatively narrow compass of the issues raised in this particular case. As we have already noted, in the more than 200-year history of the Republic, only three sitting Presidents have been subjected to suits for their private actions. If the past is any indicator, it seems unlikely that a deluge of such litigation will ever engulf the Presidency. As for the case at hand, if properly managed by the District Court, it appears to us highly unlikely to occupy any substantial amount of petitioner's time.

[O]f greater significance, petitioner errs by presuming that interactions between the Judicial Branch and the Executive, even quite burdensome interactions, necessarily rise to the level of constitutionally forbidden impairment of the Executive's ability to perform its constitutionally mandated functions. "Our . . . system imposes upon the Branches a degree of overlapping responsibility, a duty of interdependence as well as independence the absence of which 'would preclude the establishment of a Nation capable of governing itself effectively.'" Mistretta, 488 U.S. at 381 (quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 121). As Madison explained, separation of powers does not mean that the branches "ought to have no partial agency in, or no control over the acts of each other." The fact that a federal court's exercise of its traditional Article III jurisdiction may significantly burden the time and attention of the Chief Executive is not sufficient to establish a violation of the Constitution. Two long-settled propositions, first announced by Chief Justice Marshall, support that conclusion.

First, we have long held that when the President takes official action, the Court has the authority to determine whether he has acted within the law. Perhaps the most dramatic example of such a case is our holding that President Truman exceeded his constitutional authority when he issued an order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the Nation's steel mills in order to avert a national catastrophe. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). Despite the serious impact of that decision on the ability of the Executive Branch to accomplish its assigned mission, and the substantial time that the President must necessarily have devoted to the matter as a result of judicial involvement, we exercised our Article III jurisdiction to decide whether his official conduct conformed to the law. Our holding was an application of the principle established in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803), that "it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Id., at 177.

Second, it is also settled that the President is subject to judicial process in appropriate circumstances. Although Thomas Jefferson apparently thought otherwise, Chief Justice Marshall, when presiding in the treason trial of Aaron Burr, ruled that a subpoena duces tecum could be directed to the President. United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30 (No. 14,692d) (CC Va. 1807). We unequivocally and emphatically endorsed Marshall's position when we held that President Nixon was obligated to comply with a subpoena commanding him to produce certain tape recordings of his conversations with his aides. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974). As we explained, "neither the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances." Id., at 706.

Sitting Presidents have responded to court orders to provide testimony and other information with sufficient frequency that such interactions between the Judicial and Executive Branches can scarcely be thought a novelty. President Monroe responded to written interrogatories, see Rotunda, Presidents and Ex-Presidents as Witnesses: A Brief Historical Footnote, 1975 U. Ill. L. F. 1, 5-6, President Nixon – as noted above – produced tapes in response to a subpoena duces tecum, see United States v. Nixon, President Ford complied with an order to give a deposition in a criminal trial, United States v. Fromme, 405 F. Supp. 578 (ED Cal. 1975), and President Clinton has twice given videotaped testimony in criminal proceedings, see United States v. McDougal, 934 F. Supp. 296 (ED Ark. 1996); United States v. Bransecum, No., LRP-CR-96-49 (ED Ark., June 7, 1996). Moreover, sitting Presidents have also voluntarily complied with judicial requests for testimony. President Grant gave a lengthy deposition in a criminal case under such circumstances, R. Rotunda & J. Nowak, Treatise on Constitutional Law § 7.1 (2d ed. 1992), and President Carter similarly gave videotaped testimony for use at a criminal trial, ibid.
In sum, "it is settled law that the separation-of-powers doctrine does not bar every exercise of jurisdiction over the President of the United States." Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. at 753-754. If the Judiciary may severely burden the Executive Branch by reviewing the legality of the President's official conduct, and if it may direct appropriate process to the President himself, it must follow that the federal courts have power to determine the legality of his unofficial conduct. The burden on the President's time and energy that is a mere by-product of such review surely cannot be considered as onerous as the direct burden imposed by judicial review and the occasional invalidation of his official actions. We therefore hold that the doctrine of separation of powers does not require federal courts to stay all private actions against the President until he leaves office.

The reasons for rejecting such a categorical rule apply as well to a rule that would require a stay "in all but the most exceptional cases." Brief for Petitioner I. Indeed, if the Framers of the Constitution had thought it necessary to protect the President from the burdens of private litigation, we think it far more likely that they would have adopted a categorical rule than a rule that required the President to litigate the question whether a specific case belonged in the "exceptional case" subcategory. In all events, the question whether a specific case should receive exceptional treatment is more appropriately the subject of the exercise of judicial discretion than an interpretation of the Constitution. Accordingly, we turn to the question whether the District Court's decision to stay the trial until after petitioner leaves office was an abuse of discretion.

The Court of Appeals described the District Court's discretionary decision to stay the trial as the "functional equivalent" of a grant of temporary immunity. 72 F.3d at 1361, n.9. Concluding that petitioner was not constitutionally entitled to such an immunity, the court held that it was error to grant the stay. Ibid. Although we ultimately conclude that the stay should not have been granted, we think the issue is more difficult than the opinion of the Court of Appeals suggests.

Strictly speaking the stay was not the functional equivalent of the constitutional immunity that petitioner claimed, because the District Court ordered discovery to proceed. Moreover, a stay of either the trial or discovery might be justified by considerations that do not require the recognition of any constitutional immunity. The District Court has broad discretion to stay proceedings as an incident to its power to control its own docket. See, e.g., Landis v. North American Co., 299 U.S. 248, 254 (1936). As we have explained, "especially in cases of extraordinary public moment, [a plaintiff] may be required to submit to delay not immoderate in extent and not oppressive in its consequences if the public welfare or convenience will thereby be promoted." Id., at 256. Although we have rejected the argument that the potential burdens on the President violate separation of powers principles, those burdens are appropriate matters for the District Court to evaluate in its management of the case. The high respect that is owed to the office of the Chief Executive, though not justifying a rule of categorical immunity, is a matter that should inform the conduct of the entire proceeding, including the timing and scope of discovery.

Nevertheless, we are persuaded that it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to defer the trial until after the President leaves office. Such a lengthy and categorical stay takes no account whatever of the respondent's interest in bringing the case to trial. The complaint was filed within the statutory limitations period – albeit near the end of that period – and delaying trial would increase the danger of prejudice resulting from the loss of evidence, including the inability of witnesses to recall specific facts, or the possible death of a party.

We add a final comment on two matters that are discussed at length in the briefs: the risk that our decision will generate a large volume of politically motivated harassing and frivolous litigation, and the danger that national security concerns might prevent the President from explaining a legitimate need for a continuance.

We are not persuaded that either of these risks is serious. Most frivolous and vexatious litigation is terminated at the pleading stage or on summary judgment, with little if any personal involvement by the defendant. See Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. 12, 56. Moreover, the availability of sanctions provides a significant deterrent to litigation directed at the President in his unofficial capacity for purposes of political gain or harassment. History indicates that the likelihood that a significant number of such cases will be filed is remote. Although scheduling problems may arise, there is no reason to assume that the District Courts will be either unable to accommodate the President's needs or unfaithful to the tradition—especially in matters involving national security—of giving "the utmost deference to Presidential responsibilities." Several Presidents, including petitioner, have given testimony without jeopardizing the Nation's security. In short, we have confidence in the ability of our federal judges to deal with both of these concerns.

If Congress deems it appropriate to afford the President stronger protection, it may respond with appropriate legislation. As petitioner notes in his brief, Congress has enacted more than one statute providing for the deferral of civil litigation to accommodate important public interests. Brief for Petitioner 34-36. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 362 (litigation against debtor stayed upon filing of bankruptcy petition); Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 501-525 (provisions governing, inter alia, tolling or stay of civil claims by or against military personnel during course of active duty). If the Constitution embodied the rule that the President advocates, Congress, of course, could not repeal it. But our holding today raises no barrier to a statutory response to these concerns.

The Federal District Court has jurisdiction to decide this case. Like every other citizen who properly invokes that jurisdiction, respondent has a right to an orderly disposition of her claims. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

With respect to potential burdens litigation might impose on a President, Justice Stevens concluded that "most frivolous and vexatious litigation is terminated at the pleading stage or on summary judgment, with little if any personal involvement by the defendant." The accuracy of this statement is somewhat belied by Clinton v. Jones, which was dismissed by the district court on a summary judgment motion, and then settled by the parties while that summary judgment was on appeal to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. Despite this truncated process, defending the case cost President Clinton more than $5 million in legal fees, and since the case did not involve his official actions as President, the government might not have been legally required to pay the cost of Clinton’s defense.
The predominant view, and the consistent view of the Department of Justice, is that the President cannot be criminally indicted while in office, as that would inevitably too greatly interfere with the President’s ability to run effectively his Administration. Thus, the prosecutor would have wait until the President left office, with any applicable statute of limitations tolled during the period of immunity from indictment. Under this view, if the alleged criminal conduct of the President was sufficiently serious, Congress would have to impeach and convict the President first, and then the criminal indictment could proceed. A minority of commentators have taken the opposing view.61

In the case of President’s Clinton’s alleged perjury and obstruction of justice in the Paula Jones case, noted at § 10.2.2 n.36, the Independent Prosecutor struck a deal with President Clinton on Clinton’s last day in office which dropped any indictment in exchange for President Clinton acknowledging in a published January 19, 2001 letter that he “knowingly violated Judge Wright’s discovery orders in my deposition in that case”; promising not to “seek any legal fees incurred as a result of the Lewinsky investigation to which I might otherwise become entitled under the Independent Counsel Act”; and signing a consent order in a lawsuit brought by the Arkansas Committee on Professional Conduct dismissing a disbarment suit in exchange for Clinton agreeing to a five-year suspension of his law license in Arkansas, $25,000 in fines, and “acknowledging a violation of one of the Arkansas model rules of professional conduct because of testimony in my Paula Jones case deposition.”

3. Immunities of Other Government Actors from Legal Action

A. Lower Federal Officials and State Officials Sued Under § 1983

During the formalist era, federal officials were granted an absolute immunity from damages for official actions, similar to the immunity later granted to the President in Nixon v. Fitzgerald. Drawing upon principles of immunity developed by English courts at common law, the Court concluded in 1896 in Spalding v. Vilas62 that the “interests of the public” required a grant of absolute immunity so that executive officials would not hesitate to take bold action for fear of lawsuits that would “seriously cripple the proper and effective administration of public affairs.” The doctrine did not apply to actions that violated the Constitution, however, since an unconstitutional act could not be one the official was authorized to commit.63 These decisions reflected the conservative pro-executive mindset of the formalist-era Justices, as well as their preference for clear bright-line rules.

61 See Randall K. Miller, Presidential Sanctuaries After the Clinton Sex Scandals, 22 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol’y 647, 678-82 (1999) (if the Constitution does not grant immunity from prosecution while in office, Congress should provide for immunity by statute); Eric M. Freedman, The Law as King and the King as Law: Is a President Immune From Criminal Prosecution Before Impeachment, 20 Hastings L.Q. 7 (1992) (President not immune). President Franklin Pierce was arrested in 1853 for running over an old woman with his horse, but the case was dropped due to insufficient evidence.

This doctrine of immunity was continued during the Holmesian era, based on the Holmesian posture of deference to government. Indeed, during the first part of the instrumentalist era, a four-Justice Holmesian plurality in 1959 followed Spalding in Barr v. Matteo to immunize an agency director from being sued for defamation. Formalist Justice Black concurred with the majority’s result, also citing Spalding as authority.64 Liberal instrumentalists Chief Justice Warren and Justices Douglas and Brennan dissented, foreshadowing the instrumentalist approach towards executive immunity of the 1970s. Holmesian Justice Stewart, while agreeing with the majority’s statement of the correct legal test, disagreed that the agency director was acting within the scope of his official responsibilities when he issued the press release on which the claim of defamation was based.65

During the 1970s, an instrumentalist-inspired majority in 1974 and 1978 rejected the categorical approach of Spalding, and instead adopted a functional test that grants to federal officials other than the President only a qualified immunity, except where it is shown that their functions are so sensitive as to require absolute immunity.66 As applied in 1978 in Butz v. Economou,67 the Court determines whether a function is so sensitive under the so-called “special functions” exception by weighing the factors of the historical or common-law basis for the immunity, asking whether the task is sufficiently analogous to judicial or quasi-judicial activity for which absolute immunity is granted, and whether other checks exist on official misconduct. Under Butz, if absolute immunity does not attach, there is only a qualified immunity from being sued for damages, which applies unless the official’s conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established statutory and constitutional law at the time the act was performed.68 In applying the Butz test, conservative judges tend to favor a finding in close cases that the conduct was objectively reasonable or that the law was not clearly established, thus granting immunity to the executive official. Liberal judges tend to make the opposite findings, thus being more willing to impose liability.69

64 360 U.S. 564, 571-755 (1959) (plurality opinion of Harlan, J., joined by Frankfurter, Clark & Whittaker, JJ.); id. at 576 (Black, J., concurring).

65 Id. at 578 (Warren, C.J., joined by Douglas, J., dissenting); id. at 586 (Brennan, J., dissenting); id. at 586 (Stewart, J., dissenting).

68 Id. at 506-08.

In applying the Butz test, the Court has had to decide whether “objective reasonableness” should be determined only by looking to objective evidence of whether a reasonable person would have known the actions violated statutory or constitutional requirements, or whether subjective evidence of the party’s actual mental state can be used to show that the party understood the actions violated statutory or constitutional law. In 1982, the Court held in Harlow v. Fitzgerald\(^{70}\) that because resolving evidence concerning the party’s subjective mental state would often preclude the ability to decide immunity issues at summary judgment, and this would subject the executive branch to greater costs in defending litigation, the test is a pure objective one concerning what “a reasonable person would have known” and that “allegations of malice” are not relevant.

In a case with important implications in the era of terrorism after September 11, 2001, the Court held in 1985 in Mitchell v. Forsyth that the Attorney General does not have absolute immunity in authorizing a warrantless wiretap on grounds of national security. The Court stated:

First, in deciding whether officials performing a particular function are entitled to absolute immunity, we have generally looked for a historical or common-law basis for the immunity in question. The legislative immunity . . . was rooted in the long struggle in both England and America for legislative independence, a presupposition of our scheme of representative government. The immunities for judges, prosecutors, and witnesses established by our cases have firm roots in the common law. Mitchell points to no analogous historical or common-law basis for an absolute immunity for officers carrying out tasks essential to national security.

Second, the performance of national security functions does not subject an official to the same obvious risks of entanglement in vexatious litigation as does the carrying out of the judicial or "quasi-judicial" tasks that have been the primary wellsprings of absolute immunities. . . . National security tasks . . . are carried out in secret; open conflict and overt winners and losers are rare. Under such circumstances, it is far more likely that actual abuses will go uncovered than that fancied abuses will give rise to unfounded and burdensome litigation. Whereas the mere threat of litigation may significantly affect the fearless and independent performance of duty by actors in the judicial process, it is unlikely to have a similar effect [in this case].

Third, most of the officials who are entitled to absolute immunity from liability for damages are subject to other checks that help to prevent abuses of authority from going unredressed. Legislators are accountable to their constituents, and the judicial process is largely self-correcting: procedural rules, appeals, and the possibility of collateral challenges obviate the need for damages actions . . . . Similar built-in restraints on the Attorney General’s activities in the name of national security, however, do not exist . . . . The danger that high federal officials will disregard constitutional rights in their zeal to protect the national security is sufficiently real to counsel against affording such officials an absolute immunity.\(^{71}\)

Thus, only a qualified immunity protected the Attorney General, and it would not apply if there was a violation of clearly established statutory or constitutional rights. In Mitchell, the Attorney General was held not liable because the law was unclear when the action was taken.

Under the Harlow test, whether (1) the law was clearly established and (2) whether an objectively reasonable official should have known the behavior was unlawful, are questions of law for the court, not fact questions for a jury, and decisions regarding immunity are immediately appealable, so the government does not have to endure the costs of a trial before an adverse decision on immunity can be appealed. This qualified immunity for lower federal officials also applies to state officials, such as when such officials are sued for constitutional violations under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

B. Judicial Immunity and Congressional Interference with Courts

Both federal and state court judges are immune from federal lawsuits, even if bad faith or malice is alleged, except for actions not taken in the judge's official capacity, such as taking a bribe, or actions taken in the complete absence of jurisdiction. For example, in Mireles v. Waco, the Court held there was no action under § 1983 even if the state court judge ordered police officers, in a criminal proceeding, to "forcibly and with excessive force seize and bring plaintiff into his courtroom." The Court reasoned that the judge's action was taken in aid of his jurisdiction over a matter before him. State supreme courts provide similar judicial immunity for state court judges rendering decisions on state law.

A second kind of protection that Article III federal judges have involves the life-tenure and salary protections of Article III. Under Article III, § 1, “the Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behavior, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.” Regarding the “no diminution in salary” provision, the Court held in United States v. Will that Congress could repeal a cost-of-living increase for judicial salaries that had not yet taken effect. This suggests that Congress does not have to account for the devaluation effects of inflation upon judicial compensation, at least in normal circumstances. In a time of hyperinflation, the Court might read the Clause in light of its purpose to provide a reasonable, non-punitive salary be paid. While proposals have occasionally been made to limit these constitutional protections, no serious momentum exists for any constitutional amendment along these lines. The life-tenure provision is relatively unique among countries in the world, with most European constitutional courts limiting appointment from 6-12 years, as noted at § 1.4 n.60.

C. Legislative Immunities from Suit

Article I, § 6, cl.1 of the Constitution provides that “Senators and Representatives . . . shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.” The main issues regarding the Privilege from Arrest and Speech or Debate Clauses concern whether to give them a literal interpretation, or whether to read them in light of their purposes to support checks and balances theory. The basic purpose of these clauses is to permit the legislative process to function without the threat of executive-inspired and judicially-supported investigations.

Not surprisingly, the Court has rejected a formalist, literal interpretation of these clauses, and read them in light of their evident purposes, an interpretation also supported by history. Regarding the Arrest Clause, such an interpretation has resulted in a narrower interpretation of the Clause than would be obtained from a literal interpretation. In 1972, the Court stated in Gravel v. United States:

History reveals, and prior cases so hold, that this part of the Clause exempts Members from arrest in civil cases only. “When the Constitution was adopted, arrests in civil suits were still common in America. It is only to such arrests that the provision applies.” “[T]he term treason, felony, and breach of the peace, as used in the constitutional provision relied upon, excepts from the operation of the privilege all criminal offenses . . . .” Nor does freedom from arrest confer immunity on a Member from service of process as a defendant in civil matters, or as a witness in a criminal case. . . . It is, therefore, sufficiently plain that the constitutional freedom from arrest does not exempt Members of Congress from the operation of ordinary criminal laws, even though imprisonment may prevent or interfere with the performance of their duties as Members. Indeed, implicit in the narrow scope of the privilege of freedom from arrest is, as Jefferson noted, the judgment that legislators ought not to stand above the law they create but ought generally to be bound by it as are ordinary persons.76

With regard to the Speech or Debate Clause, the Court has similarly rejected a literal interpretation. In this case, however, such an interpretation has expanded the scope of the Clause. For example, while literally the Speech or Debate Clause only applies to “Senators and Representatives,” the Court noted in Gravel that it also applies to the Senator’s or Representative’s staff, because without staff the legislative process could not effectively function; further, while the Clause literally applies only to “Speech or Debate in either House,” the Court has held that it applies equally to other aspects of the legislative process, such as speech in Committee hearings.77 The Court has never decided whether this immunity is personal to the individual, or could be waived institutionally by the Congress, but concern with possible retaliation by one party in control of both houses of Congress against the other party suggest that right should be personal to the member of Congress. A similar doctrine confers absolute immunity from liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to state or local legislators, or regional legislators acting pursuant to interstate compacts, for legislative activities.

In Hutchinson v. Proxmire, the Court held that the Speech and Debate Clause does not immunize a Senator from suit for defamatory statements made in press releases or newsletters, or when stated in person on television interview programs, as that kind of activity is not part of the legislative process. In addition, while the Speech or Debate Clause might protect telephone calls from a member of Congress to an executive agency seeking information, it “does not protect attempts to influence the conduct of executive agencies or libelous comments made during the conversations.” Justice Stewart dissented from this part of the majority’s analysis. As he did in Gravel, Justice Brennan dissented from all of the majority’s reasoning, viewing each of Senator Proxmire’s acts as protected as part of his legislative responsibilities, and thus part of “Speech or Debate.”

Based upon the same kind of reasoning as in Gravel and Hutchinson, a member of Congress can be prosecuted for accepting a bribe in exchange for a promise to perform a legislative act in the future, as bribery is not part of the legislative process. Evidence relating to the member’s actual voting record is protected, however, since that involves legislative activities.

D. Sovereign Immunity of the United States from Suit

When suing the United States, a plaintiff must show a waiver of the federal government's sovereign immunity. Absent such waiver, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. As has been noted:

82 United States v. Helstoski, 442 U.S. 477, 487-92 (1979). See also United States v. Renzi, 769 F.3d 731 (9th Cir. 2014) (if a member of Congress offers evidence of legislative acts, government narrowly confined rebuttal evidence does not constitute “questioning” under Speech or Debate Clause); Reeder v. Madigan, 780 F.3d 799 (7th Cir. 2015) (decision to grant or deny a reporter press credentials is legislative); Menendez v. United States, 831 F.3d 155, 166-69 (3rd Cir. 2016) (alleged illegal lobbying activities by Senator Menendez not protected, because considering “content, purpose, and motive” the district court found Senator Menendez had not met his burden to show by a preponderance of the evidence that his lobbying activities were legitimate legislative “oversight” of the executive branch, rather than a non-legislative attempt to influence executive branch action; that factual decision is not “clearly erroneous” – and thus affirmed on appeal – and consideration of “motive” is appropriate where the act is not clearly legislative or non-legislative, but “ambiguously legislative.”).
[The Supreme Court has stated that] “waiver[s] of the Federal Government's sovereign immunity must be unequivocally expressed in statutory text”; they may not be implied or inferred. "Waivers of immunity must be construed strictly in favor of the sovereign, and not enlarge[d] . . . beyond what the language requires." [As with state immunity] any waiver must appear clearly in the statutory text[;] legislative history cannot be used to clarify an ambiguity.

While many federal statutes waive the government's immunity from suit, several are notable. The Tucker Act of 1887, one of the first broad waivers of the United States' sovereign immunity, authorizes suits seeking damages against the United States based on the Constitution, statutes, regulations, or contracts. The Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946 (FTCA) waives the United States' sovereign immunity from certain tort claims arising from the conduct of federal employees. The Quiet Title Act of 1972 (QTA) waives the government's immunity from "civil actions to adjudicate title disputes involving real property in which the United States claims an interest." The most notable of the many statutes . . . is the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). When Congress eliminated the amount in controversy requirement from suits against federal agencies and officers in 1976, it also added a waiver of sovereign immunity to § 702 of the APA. The APA now provides both a cause of action and a waiver of sovereign immunity in suits against federal agencies seeking relief other than money damages.83

In addition, as Professor Kovacs noted, the plaintiff must identify a cause of action – a "source of substantive law . . . [that] provides an avenue for relief."84 Also, the court must have subject matter jurisdiction, usually supplied by 28 U.S.C. § 1331, dealing with jurisdiction for federal questions.

While Congress has enacted many statutory waivers of sovereign immunity, those waivers have holes through which a plaintiff might fall. The doctrine of “nonstatutory review" fills those gaps by allowing suits against officers of the United States for injunctive relief in the absence of a statutory waiver of immunity. For example, the Court held in Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad Co.85 that a federal official may be enjoined where he has acted "ultra vires, and beyond the scope of his authority." In addition, "[i]f he has no power at all to do the act complained of, he is as much subject to an injunction as he would be to a mandamus if he refused to do an act which the law plainly required him to do." Since the inclusion of a broad waiver of sovereign immunity in the APA in 1976, nonstatutory review has fallen into disuse. The modern Court will likely ground any waivers of federal sovereign immunity on congressional action, as in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain.86

CHAPTER 11: FOREIGN POLICY MATTERS

§ 11.1 Text of the Constitution and Cases Before 1937 ................................. 495

§ 11.2 Managing Foreign Policy in the Modern Post-1937 Era ............................ 501

§ 11.3 The Treaty Power .................................................................................... 510

§ 11.4 Power to Make Executive Agreements and Additional Considerations ........ 522

§ 11.1 Text of the Constitution and Cases Before 1937

Many of the enumerated powers relating to foreign affairs are granted to Congress. In Article I, § 8, cl. 1, Congress has power to tax and spend for the common defense of the United States. Congress can influence foreign affairs with its powers in Article I, § 8, cl. 3 to “regulate commerce with foreign Nations . . . and with the Indian Tribes”; in Article I, § 8, cl. 4 to “establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization”; and in Article I, § 8, cl. 10 to “define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations.” Congress also has the power Article I, § 8, cl. 11-16: “To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water”; “To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a term longer than two Years”; “To provide and maintain a Navy”; “To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces”; “To provide for calling forth the Militia [today termed the state National Guards] to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions”; and “To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.” Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the Senate can refuse to consent to treaties by less than a 2/3 vote of those present.

Under Article II, § 2, cl. 1, the President is “Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States when called into the actual Service of the United States.” Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the President “shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors” The President is the repository for all information coming from United States Ambassadors, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the National Security Council, the CIA, as well as other federal agencies. Under Article II, § 3, the President receives “Ambassadors and other public Ministers” of foreign countries. Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the President has the power to negotiate treaties, which then become ratified if “two thirds of the Senators present concur.”

In addition, it can be argued that the President enjoys a "residual" foreign affairs power under Article II, § 1's grant of "the executive Power." It has been noted, “the ordinary eighteenth-century meaning of executive power – as reflected, for example, in the works of leading political writers known to the constitutional generation, such as Locke, Montesquieu, and Blackstone – included foreign affairs powers. . . . To slight the foreign affairs meaning of executive power is to downplay Locke, Montesquieu, Blackstone, Washington, Jay, Jefferson, Hamilton, and even Madison.”1 On the other hand, it has been noted that Locke and other 18th-century natural law writers distinguished the “executive power,” which was the power to execute laws, from the “federative” power, or other such term, which was a power over foreign affairs. While Article II did vest “executive” power in the President, the “federative” power was split between Congress and the President in various constitutional provisions dealing with declaring war, negotiating and ratifying treaties, nomination and confirmation of Ambassadors, and the like.2

In practice, Congress has often allowed the President to take the lead in foreign affairs. In terms of judicial precedents, there are a few cases, particularly from the formalist era, that speak in terms of broad presidential power in the foreign affairs realm. For example, in 1936, in a case where Congress had in any event authorized the President to embargo arms sales to certain countries, the Court said in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Co. that the President has great power to negotiate with foreign countries even without congressional directive. The Court described the President as “the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations.”

Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. v. United States 299 U.S. 304 (1936)

Justice SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

On January 27, 1936, an indictment was returned in the court below, the first count of which charges that appellees, beginning with the 29th day of May, 1934, conspired to sell in the United States certain arms of war, namely fifteen machine guns, to Bolivia, a country then engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco, in violation of the Joint Resolution of Congress approved May 28, 1934, and the provisions of a proclamation issued on the same day by the President of the United States pursuant to authority conferred by § 1 of the resolution. In pursuance of the conspiracy, the commission of certain overt acts was alleged, details of which need not be stated. The Joint Resolution (chapter 365, 48 Stat. 811) follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if the President finds that the prohibition of the sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and if after consultation with the governments of other American Republics and with their cooperation, as well as that of such other governments as he may deem necessary, he makes proclamation to that effect, it shall be unlawful to sell, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war in any place in the United States to the countries now engaged in that armed conflict, or to any person, company, or association acting in the interest of either country, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

"Sec. 2. Whoever sells any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both."

The President's proclamation (48 Stat. 1744, No. 2087), after reciting the terms of the Joint Resolution, declares:

"Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority conferred in me by the said joint resolution of Congress, do hereby declare and proclaim that I have found that the prohibition of the sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and that I have consulted with the governments of other American Republics and have been assured of the cooperation of such governments as I have deemed necessary as contemplated by the said joint resolution; and I do hereby admonish all citizens of the United States and every person to abstain from every violation of the provisions of the joint resolution above set forth, hereby made applicable to Bolivia and Paraguay, and I do hereby warn them that all violations of such provisions will be rigorously prosecuted.

Whether, if the Joint Resolution had related solely to internal affairs it would be open to the challenge that it constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the Executive, we find it unnecessary to determine. The whole aim of the resolution is to affect a situation entirely external to the United States, and falling within the category of foreign affairs. The determination which we are called to make, therefore, is whether the Joint Resolution, as applied to that situation, is vulnerable to attack under the rule that forbids a delegation of the law-making power. In other words, assuming (but not deciding) that the challenged delegation, if it were confined to internal affairs, would be invalid, may it nevertheless be sustained on the ground that its exclusive aim is to afford a remedy for a hurtful condition within foreign territory?

It will contribute to the elucidation of the question if we first consider the differences between the powers of the federal government in respect of foreign or external affairs and those in respect of domestic or internal affairs. That there are differences between them, and that these differences are fundamental, may not be doubted.
The two classes of powers are different, both in respect of their origin and their nature. The broad statement that the federal government can exercise no powers except those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, is categorically true only in respect of our internal affairs. In that field, the primary purpose of the Constitution was to carve from the general mass of legislative powers then possessed by the states such portions as it was thought desirable to vest in the federal government, leaving those not included in the enumeration still in the states. Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 294. That this doctrine applies only to powers which the states had, is self evident. And since the states severally never possessed international powers, such powers could not have been carved from the mass of state powers but obviously were transmitted to the United States from some other source. During the colonial period, those powers were possessed exclusively by and were entirely under the control of the Crown. By the Declaration of Independence, "the Representatives of the United States of America" declared the United [not the several] Colonies to be free and independent states, and as such to have "full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do."

As a result of the separation from Great Britain by the colonies acting as a unit, the powers of external sovereignty passed from the Crown not to the colonies severally, but to the colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States of America. Even before the Declaration, the colonies were a unit in foreign affairs, acting through a common agency – namely the Continental Congress, composed of delegates from the thirteen colonies. That agency exercised the powers of war and peace, raised an army, created a navy, and finally adopted the Declaration of Independence. Rulers come and go; governments end and forms of government change; but sovereignty survives. A political society cannot endure without a supreme will somewhere. Sovereignty is never held in suspense. When, therefore, the external sovereignty of Great Britain in respect of the colonies ceased, it immediately passed to the Union. See Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. 54, 80-81. That fact was given practical application almost at once. The treaty of peace, made on September 23, 1783, was concluded between his Brittanic Majesty and the "United States of America." 8 Stat., European Treaties, 80.

The Union existed before the Constitution, which was ordained and established among other things to form "a more perfect Union." Prior to that event, it is clear that the Union, declared by the Articles of Confederation to be "perpetual," was the sole possessor of external sovereignty and in the Union it remained without change save in so far as the Constitution in express terms qualified its exercise. The Framers' Convention was called and exerted its powers upon the irrefutable postulate that though the states were several their people in respect of foreign affairs were one. Compare The Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. 581, 604, 606. In that convention, the entire absence of state power to deal with those affairs was thus forcefully stated by Rufus King:

"The states were not 'sovereigns' in the sense contended for by some. They did not possess the peculiar features of sovereignty, – they could not make war, nor peace, nor alliances, nor treaties. Considering them as political beings, they were dumb, for they could not speak to any foreign sovereign whatever. They were deaf, for they could not hear any propositions from such sovereign. They had not even the organs or faculties of defence or offence, for they could not of themselves raise troops, or equip vessels, for war." 5 Elliott's Debates 212.

It results that the investment of the federal government with the powers of external sovereignty did not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution. The powers to declare and wage war, to conclude peace, to make treaties, to maintain diplomatic relations with other sovereignties, if they had never been mentioned in the Constitution, would have vested in the federal government as necessary concomitants of nationality. Neither the Constitution nor the laws passed in pursuance of it have any force in foreign territory unless in respect of our own citizens (see American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U.S. 347, 356); and operations of the nation in such territory must be governed by treaties, international understandings and compacts, and the principles of international law. As a member of the family of nations, the right and power of the United States in that field are equal to the right and power of the other members of the international family. Otherwise, the United States is not completely sovereign. The power to acquire territory by discovery and occupation (Jones v. United States, 137 U.S. 202, 212), the power to expel undesirable aliens (Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 705 et seq.), the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense (Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U.S. 583, 600-601; Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement, 2d ed., p. 102 and note 1), none of which is expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exist as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality. This the court recognized, and in each of the cases cited found the warrant for its conclusions not in the provisions of the Constitution, but in the law of nations.

In Burnet v. Brooks, 288 U.S. 378, 396, we said, "As a nation with all the attributes of sovereignty, the United States is vested with all the powers of government necessary to maintain an effective control of international relations." Cf. Carter v. Carter Coal Co., supra, p. 295.

Not only, as we have shown, is the federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at a very early day in our history (February 15, 1816), reported to the Senate, among other things, as follows:

"The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success. For his conduct he is responsible to the Constitution. The committee consider this responsibility the surest pledge for the faithful discharge of his duty. They think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety. The nature of transactions with foreign nations, moreover, requires caution and unity of design, and their success frequently depends on secrecy and dispatch. U.S. Senate, Reports, Committee on Foreign Relations, vol. 8, p. 24.

It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations – a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment – perhaps serious embarrassment – is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results. Indeed, so clearly is this true that the first President refused to accede to a request to lay before the House of Representatives the instructions, correspondence and documents relating to the negotiation of the Jay Treaty – a refusal the wisdom of which was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted. In his reply to the request, President Washington said:

"The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent." 1 Messages and Papers of the Presidents, p. 194.

The marked difference between foreign affairs and domestic affairs in this respect is recognized by both houses of Congress in the very form of their requisitions for information from the executive departments. In the case of every department except the Department of State, the resolution directs the official to furnish the information. In the case of the State Department, dealing with foreign affairs, the President is requested to furnish the information "if not incompatible with the public interest." A statement that to furnish the information is not compatible with the public interest rarely, if ever, is questioned.
Practically every volume of the United States Statutes contains one or more acts or joint resolutions of Congress authorizing action by the President in respect of subjects affecting foreign relations, which either leave the exercise of the power to his unrestricted judgment, or provide a standard far more general than that which has always been considered requisite with regard to domestic affairs. Many, though not all, of these acts are designated in the footnote.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

Justice McREYNOLDS does not agree. He is of opinion that the court below reached the right conclusion and its judgment ought to be affirmed.

Justice STONE took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

§ 11.2 Managing Foreign Policy in the Post-1937 Era

Deference to presidential leadership in foreign affairs has continued since 1937. Based upon practice and precedent, the Holmesian-era Court held in United States v. Belmont and United States v. Pink that presidents have the constitutional power to enter into presidential executive agreements and other such international “compacts” with foreign nations without obtaining the Advice and Consent of the Senate, as is required for treaties, and that such agreements, like treaties, supercede contrary state laws. The language of these opinions reflect strong deference to President Roosevelt during the 1930s and 1940s.

Reflecting a slightly less deferential approach toward the executive than during the Roosevelt presidency, in 1981 an instrumentalist Court stated in Dames & Moore v. Regan, excerpted below, that the President only has "some measure of power" to enter into executive agreements without obtaining the Advice and Consent of the Senate. The Court held very narrowly, “Critical to our decision today is the conclusion that Congress has implicitly authorized the practice of claim settlement by executive agreement... Where, as here, the settlement of claims has been determined to be a necessary incident to the resolution of a major foreign policy dispute between our country and another, and where, as here, we can conclude that Congress acquiesced in the President's action, we are not prepared to say that the President lacks the power to settle such claims.”

Nonetheless, many cases from the instrumentalist era suggest broad Presidential power over foreign affairs matters. Even those commentators who tend to have a bias more toward the legislative branch acknowledge the growth of presidential power in foreign affairs and resulting changes as a matter of legislative and executive practice in constitutional practice. Of course, in terms of court decisions, many specific issues of congressional versus executive power concerning foreign affairs, including the difficult issue, never squarely litigated, of presidential authority to enter into executive agreements absent any congressional authorization, may be viewed as political questions, as a 4-Justice plurality of the Court concluded in Goldwater v. Carter regarding the President’s power unilaterally to terminate a treaty, noted at § 4.3.1(D) nn.56-60. Resolution of such issues would then turn on non-judicial factors, like congressional control over appropriations for the Department of Defense or State, Senate control over confirmation of executive nominations, impact of public opinion, or, in extreme cases, the congressional impeachment power.

Dames & Moore v. Regan

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The questions presented by this case touch fundamentally upon the matter in which our Republic is to be governed. Throughout the nearly two centuries of our Nation's existence under the Skinner, 943 F.2d 157, 160 (1st Cir. 1991) (Breyer, C.J.) (arguing that "the Constitution makes the Executive Branch . . . primarily responsible" for the "foreign affairs power")).

Constitution, this subject has generated considerable debate. We have had the benefit of commentators such as John Jay, Alexander Hamilton, and James Madison writing in The Federalist Papers at the Nation's very inception, the benefit of astute foreign observers of our system such as Alexis de Tocqueville and James Bryce writing during the first century of the Nation's existence, and the benefit of many other treatises as well as more than 400 volumes of reports of decisions of this Court. As these writings reveal it is doubtless both futile and perhaps dangerous to find any epigrammatical explanation of how this country has been governed. Indeed, as Justice Jackson noted, “[a] judge . . . may be surprised at the poverty of really useful and unambiguous authority applicable to concrete problems of executive power as they actually present themselves.” Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 634 (1952) (concurring opinion).

Our decision today will not dramatically alter this situation, for the Framers “did not make the judiciary the overseer of our government.” Id., at 594 (Frankfurter, J., concurring). We are confined to a resolution of the dispute presented to us. That dispute involves various Executive Orders and regulations by which the President nullified attachments and liens on Iranian assets in the United States, directed that these assets be transferred to Iran, and suspended claims against Iran that may be presented to an International Claims Tribunal. This action was taken in an effort to comply with an Executive Agreement between the United States and Iran. We granted certiorari before judgment in this case, and set an expedited briefing and argument schedule, because lower courts had reached conflicting conclusions on the validity of the President's actions and, as the Solicitor General informed us, unless the Government acted by July 19, 1981, Iran could consider the United States to be in breach of the Executive Agreement.

But before turning to the facts and law which we believe determine the result in this case, we stress that the expeditious treatment of the issues involved by all of the courts which have considered the President's actions makes us acutely aware of the necessity to rest decision on the narrowest possible ground capable of deciding the case. Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 347 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). This does not mean that reasoned analysis may give way to judicial fiat. It does mean that the statement of Justice Jackson – that we decide difficult cases presented to us by virtue of our commissions, not our competence – is especially true here. We attempt to lay down no general “guidelines” covering other situations not involved here, and attempt to confine the opinion only to the very questions necessary to decision of the case.

On November 4, 1979, the American Embassy in Tehran was seized and our diplomatic personnel were captured and held hostage. In response to that crisis, President Carter, acting pursuant to the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 91 Stat. 1626, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701-1706 (1976 ed., Supp. III) (hereinafter IEEPA), declared a national emergency on November 14, 1979, and blocked the removal or transfer of “all property and interests in property of the Government of Iran, its instrumentalities and controlled entities and the Central Bank of Iran which are or become subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. . . .” Exec. Order No. 12170, 3 CFR 457 (1980), note following 50 U.S.C. § 1701 (1976 ed., Supp. III). President Carter authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to promulgate regulations carrying out the blocking order. On November 15, 1979, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control issued a regulation providing that “[u]nless licensed or authorized . . . any attachment, judgment, decree, lien, execution, garnishment, or other judicial process is null and void with respect to any property in which on or since [November 14, 1979,] there existed an interest of Iran.” 31 CFR § 535.203(e) (1980). The regulations also made clear that any licenses or authorizations granted could be “amended, modified, or revoked at any time.” § 535.805.

On November 26, 1979, the President granted a general license authorizing certain judicial proceedings against Iran but which did not allow the “entry of any judgment or of any decree or order of similar or analogous effect . . . .” § 535.504(a). On December 19, 1979, a clarifying regulation was issued stating that “the general authorization for judicial proceedings contained in § 535.504(a) includes pre-judgment attachment.” § 535.418.

On December 19, 1979, petitioner Dames & Moore filed suit in the United States District Court for the Central District of California against the Government of Iran, the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, and a number of Iranian banks. In its complaint, petitioner alleged that its wholly owned subsidiary, Dames & Moore International, S. R. L., was a party to a written contract with the Atomic Energy Organization, and that the subsidiary's entire interest in the contract had been assigned to petitioner. Under the contract, the subsidiary was to conduct site studies for a proposed nuclear power plant in Iran. As provided in the terms of the contract, the Atomic Energy Organization terminated the agreement for its own convenience on June 30, 1979. Petitioner contended, however, that it was owed $3,436,694.30 plus interest for services performed under the contract prior to the date of termination. The District Court issued orders of attachment directed against property of the defendants, and the property of certain Iranian banks was then attached to secure any judgment that might be entered against them.

On January 20, 1981, the Americans held hostage were released by Iran pursuant to an Agreement entered into the day before and embodied in two Declarations of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria (App. to Pet. for Cert. 21-29), and Declaration of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria Concerning the Settlement of Claims by the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran (id., at 30-35). The Agreement stated that “[i]t is the purpose of [the United States and Iran] . . . to terminate all litigation as between the Government of each party and the nationals of the other, and to bring about the settlement and termination of all such claims through binding arbitration.” Id., at 21-22. In furtherance of this goal, the Agreement called for the establishment of an Iran-United States Claims Tribunal which would arbitrate any claims not settled within six months. Awards of the Claims Tribunal are to be “final and binding” and “enforceable . . . in the courts of any nation in accordance with its laws.” Id., at 32. Under the Agreement, the United States is obligated “to terminate all legal proceedings in United States courts involving claims of United States persons and institutions against Iran and its state enterprises, to nullify all attachments and judgments obtained therein, to prohibit all further litigation based on such claims, and to bring about the termination of such claims through binding arbitration.” Id., at 22.

In addition, the United States must “act to bring about the transfer” by July 19, 1981, of all Iranian assets held in this country by American banks. Id., at 24-25. One billion dollars of these assets will be deposited in a security account in the Bank of England, to the account of the Algerian Central Bank, and used to satisfy awards rendered against Iran by the Claims Tribunal. Ibid.

On January 19, 1981, President Carter issued a series of Executive Orders implementing the terms of the agreement. Exec. Orders Nos. 12276-12285, 46 Fed. Reg. 7913-7932. These Orders revoked all licenses permitting the exercise of “any right, power, or privilege” with regard to Iranian funds, securities, or deposits; “nullified” all non-Iranian interests in such assets acquired subsequent to the blocking order of November 14, 1979; and required those banks holding Iranian assets to transfer them “to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, to be held or transferred as directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.” Exec. Order No. 12279, 46 Fed. Reg. 7919.

On February 24, 1981, President Reagan issued an Executive Order in which he “ratified” the January 19th Executive Orders. Exec. Order No. 12294, 46 Fed. Reg. 14111. Moreover, he “suspended” all “claims which may be presented to the . . . Tribunal” and provided that such claims “shall have no legal effect in any action now pending in any court of the United States.” Ibid. The suspension of any particular claim terminates if the Claims Tribunal determines that it has no jurisdiction over that claim; claims are discharged for all purposes when the Claims Tribunal either awards some recovery and that amount is paid, or determines that no recovery is due. Ibid.

The parties and the lower courts, confronted with the instant questions, have all agreed that much relevant analysis is contained in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). Justice Black's opinion for the Court in that case, involving the validity of President Truman's effort to seize the country's steel mills in the wake of a nationwide strike, recognized that “[t]he President's power, if any, to issue the order now pending in any court of the United States.” Ibid. The suspension of any particular claim terminates if the Claims Tribunal determines that it has no jurisdiction over that claim; claims are discharged for all purposes when the Claims Tribunal either awards some recovery and that amount is paid, or determines that no recovery is due. Ibid.

Although we have in the past found and do today find Justice Jackson's classification of executive actions into three general categories analytically useful, we should be mindful of Justice Holmes' admonition, quoted by Justice Frankfurter in Youngstown, supra, at 597 (concurring opinion), that “[t]he great ordinances of the Constitution do not establish and divide fields of black and white.”
Springer v. Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 209 (1928) (dissenting opinion). Justice Jackson himself recognized that his three categories represented “a somewhat over-simplified grouping,” 343 U.S., at 635, and it is doubtless the case that executive action in any particular instance falls, not neatly in one of three pigeonholes, but rather at some point along a spectrum running from explicit congressional authorization to explicit congressional prohibition. This is particularly true as respects cases such as the one before us, involving responses to international crises the nature of which Congress can hardly have been expected to anticipate in any detail.

[Ed.: The Court first concluded that the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) constituted specific congressional authorization to the President to nullify the attachments and order the transfer of Iranian assets, but noted that there remained the question of the President's authority to suspend claims pending in American courts.]

Such claims have, of course, an existence apart from the attachments which accompanied them. In terminating these claims through Executive Order No. 12294 the President purported to act under authority of both the IEEPA and 22 U.S.C. § 1732, the so-called “Hostage Act.” 46 Fed. Reg. 14111 (1981).

We conclude that although the IEEPA authorized the nullification of the attachments, it cannot be read to authorize the suspension of the claims. The claims of American citizens against Iran are not in themselves transactions involving Iranian property or efforts to exercise any rights with respect to such property. An in personam lawsuit, although it might eventually be reduced to judgment and that judgment might be executed upon, is an effort to establish liability and fix damages and does not focus on any particular property within the jurisdiction. The terms of the IEEPA therefore do not authorize the President to suspend claims in American courts. This is the view of all the courts which have considered the question. Chas. T. Main Int'l, Inc. v. Khuzestan Water & Power Authority, 651 F.2d, at 809-814; American Int'l Group, Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 657 F.2d, at 443, n.15; The Marschalk Co. v. Iran National Airlines Corp., 518 F.Supp. 69, 79 (SDNY 1981); Electronic Data Systems Corp. v. Social Security Organization of Iran, 508 F.Supp. 1350, 1361 (ND Tex. 1981).

The Hostage Act, passed in 1868, provides:

“Whenever it is made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.” Rev. Stat. § 2001, 22 U.S.C. § 1732.
We are reluctant to conclude that this provision constitutes specific authorization to the President to suspend claims in American courts. Although the broad language of the Hostage Act suggests it may cover this case, there are several difficulties with such a view. The legislative history indicates that the Act was passed in response to a situation unlike the recent Iranian crisis. Congress in 1868 was concerned with the activity of certain countries refusing to recognize the citizenship of naturalized Americans traveling abroad, and repatriating such citizens against their will. See, e.g., Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., 4331 (1868) (Sen. Fessenden); id., at 4354 (Sen. Conness); see also 22 U.S.C. § 1731. These countries were not interested in returning the citizens in exchange for any sort of ransom. This also explains the reference in the Act to imprisonment “in violation of the rights of American citizenship.” Although the Iranian hostage-taking violated international law and common decency, the hostages were not seized out of any refusal to recognize their American citizenship – they were seized precisely because of their American citizenship.

Concluding that neither the IEEPA nor the Hostage Act constitutes specific authorization of the President's action suspending claims, however, is not to say that these statutory provisions are entirely irrelevant to the question of the validity of the President's action. We think both statutes highly relevant in the looser sense of indicating congressional acceptance of a broad scope for executive action in circumstances such as those presented in this case. [T]he IEEPA delegates broad authority to the President to act in times of national emergency with respect to property of a foreign country. The Hostage Act similarly indicates congressional willingness that the President have broad discretion when responding to the hostile acts of foreign sovereigns.

Not infrequently in affairs between nations, outstanding claims by nationals of one country against the government of another country are “sources of friction” between the two sovereigns. United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 225 (1942). To resolve these difficulties, nations have often entered into agreements settling the claims of their respective nationals. As one treatise writer puts it, international agreements settling claims by nationals of one state against the government of another “are established international practice reflecting traditional international theory.” L. Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution 262 (1972). . . . [FN 8: . . . In fact, during the period of 1817-1917, “no fewer than eighty executive agreements were entered into by the United States looking toward the liquidation of claims of its citizens.” W. McClure, International Executive Agreements 53 (1941).] Under such agreements, the President has agreed to renounce or extinguish claims of United States nationals against foreign governments in return for lump-sum payments or the establishment of arbitration procedures. To be sure, many of these settlements were encouraged by the United States claimants themselves, since a claimant's only hope of obtaining any payment at all might lie in having his Government negotiate a diplomatic settlement on his behalf. But it is also undisputed that the “United States has sometimes disposed of the claims of its citizens without their consent, or even without consultation with them, usually without exclusive regard for their interests, as distinguished from those of the nation as a whole.” Henkin, supra, at 262-263. Accord, Restatement (Second) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 213 (1965) (President “may waive or settle a claim against a foreign state . . . [even] without the consent of the [injured] national”). It is clear that the practice of settling claims continues today. Since 1952, the President has entered into at least 10 binding settlements with foreign nations, including an $80 million settlement with the People's Republic of China. [FN 9: Those agreements are [1979] 30 U.S.T. 1957 (People's Republic Crucial to our decision today is the conclusion that Congress has implicitly approved the practice of claim settlement by executive agreement. This is best demonstrated by Congress' enactment of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, 64 Stat. 13, as amended, 22 U.S.C. § 1621 et seq. (1976 ed. and Supp. IV). The Act had two purposes: (1) to allocate to United States nationals funds received in the course of an executive claims settlement with Yugoslavia, and (2) to provide a procedure whereby funds resulting from future settlements could be distributed. To achieve these ends Congress created the International Claims Commission, now the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission, and gave it jurisdiction to make final and binding decisions with respect to claims by United States nationals against settlement funds. 22 U.S.C. § 1623(a). By creating a procedure to implement future settlement agreements, Congress placed its stamp of approval on such agreements. Indeed, the legislative history of the Act observed that the United States was seeking settlements with countries other than Yugoslavia and that the bill contemplated settlements of a similar nature in the future. H.R.Rep. No. 770, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., 4, 8 (1949).

In addition to congressional acquiescence in the President's power to settle claims, prior cases of this Court have also recognized that the President does have some measure of power to enter into Executive agreements without obtaining the advice and consent of the Senate. In United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203 (1942), for example, the Court upheld the validity of the Litvinov Assignment, which was part of an Executive Agreement whereby the Soviet Union assigned to the United States amounts owed to it by American nationals so that outstanding claims of other American nationals could be paid. The Court explained that the resolution of such claims was integrally connected with normalizing United States’ relations with a foreign state: “Power to remove such obstacles to full recognition as settlement of claims of our nationals . . . certainly is a modest implied power of the President. . . . No such obstacle can be placed in the way of rehabilitation of relations between this country and another nation, unless the historic conception of the powers and responsibilities ... is to be drastically revised.” Id., at 229-230.

Petitioner raises two arguments in opposition to the proposition that Congress has acquiesced in this longstanding practice of claims settlement by executive agreement. First, it suggests that all pre-1952 settlement claims, and corresponding court cases such as Pink, should be discounted because of the evolution of the doctrine of sovereign immunity. Petitioner observes that prior to 1952 the United States adhered to the doctrine of absolute sovereign immunity, so that absent action by the Executive there simply would be no remedy for a United States national against a foreign government. When the United States in 1952 adopted a more restrictive notion of sovereign immunity, by means of the so-called “Tate” letter, it is petitioner's view that United States nationals no longer needed executive aid to settle claims and that, as a result, the President's authority to settle such claims in some sense “disappeared.” Though petitioner's argument is not wholly without merit, it is refuted by the fact that since 1952 there have been at least 10 claims settlements by executive agreement. Thus, even if the pre-1952 cases should be disregarded, congressional acquiescence in settlement agreements since that time supports the President's power to act here.

In light of all of the foregoing – the inferences to be drawn from the character of the legislation Congress has enacted in the area, such as the IEEPA and the Hostage Act, and from the history of acquiescence in executive claims settlement – we conclude that the President was authorized to suspend pending claims pursuant to Executive Order No. 12294. As Justice Frankfurter pointed out in Youngstown, 343 U.S., at 610-611, “a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned . . . may be treated as a gloss on ‘Executive Power’ vested in the President by § 1 of Art. II.” Past practice does not, by itself, create power, but “long-continued practice, known to and acquiesced in by Congress, would raise a presumption that the [action] had been [taken] in pursuance of its consent. . . .” United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U.S. 459, 474 (1915). See Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S., at 291, 292. Such practice is present here and such a presumption is also appropriate. In light of the fact that Congress may be considered to have consented to the President's action in suspending claims, we cannot say that action exceeded the President's powers.

In Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Secretary of State, 135 S. Ct. 2076, 2083-96 (2015), the Court considered the constitutionality of a congressional statute which provides that Americans born in Jerusalem may elect to have “Israel” listed as their place of birth on their passports, which the State Department declined to follow, citing its long-standing policy of not taking a position on the political status of Jerusalem. Although acknowledging the President and State Department’s acts were inconsistent with congressional policy, the Court held that the President’s power to decide whether and on what terms to recognize foreign governments was “exclusive” and “conclusive” on the matter, based on text, long-standing practice of congressional acquiescence, Court precedents, and functional considerations of the need for nation to “speak with one voice.” Three Justices dissented from this conclusion. Id. at 2116-17 (Scalia, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., and Alito, J., dissenting) (Act proper exercise of Congress’ power over Naturalization, which “enables Congress to furnish the people it makes citizens with papers verifying their citizenship”); id. at 2113 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Alito, J., dissenting) (“Today’s decision is a first: Never before has this Court accepted a President’s direct defiance of an Act of Congress in the field of foreign affairs.”). See also id. at 2096-97 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (President has exclusive power over passports, which is part of President’s power to recognize foreign governments, but not over consular reports used for naturalization status, which is Congress’ power over Naturalization).

§ 11.3 The Treaty Power

1. Introduction to the Treaty Power

Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the President has the power, with the approval of 2/3 of the Senate present in favor, to make treaties. Regarding the President’s power unilaterally to terminate a treaty, scholars have disagreed. The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States maintains that the President of the United States has the power, among other things, "[T]o suspend or terminate an agreement in accordance with its terms." 8 In contrast, in 1979, Senator Goldwater's attorney in Goldwater v. Carter noted that "of 55 treaties terminated by the United States, 52 were broken with congressional approval." 9 Reflecting the pro-Presidential power approach, on December 13, 2001, the United States Ambassador to Moscow delivered a message to Russia that President Bush was giving 6 months notice of United States termination of the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty, invoking Article XV of that document. The notice of termination came without the consent or concurrence of either house of Congress. 10

Under the Supremacy Clause of Article VI, § 2, treaties are part of the “supreme Law of the Land.” Thus, there is no 10th Amendment states’ rights limit on the treaty power. 11 The Court has stated, “If state action could defeat or alter our foreign policy, serious consequences might ensue.” 12 States have no right to enter into any “Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation” pursuant to Article I, § 10, cl. 1. State laws that conflict with federal foreign policy, including state laws that burden foreign commerce, such as barring state or local governments’ procurement of goods or services from persons doing business with pariah governments, are typically viewed as preempted by Congress, discussed at § 13.2.2 nn.23-24, or trigger a dormant commerce clause analysis, including the market participant exception, noted at § 13.4.2 n.66. Under Article I, § 10, cl. 2, no state, without Congress' consent, may lay any impost or duty on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing inspection laws. An executive agreement between the President and a foreign power also supersedes conflicting state policy.

2. Self-Executing versus Non-Self-Executing Treaties

In Medellin v. Texas, the Court held 6-3 that a treaty which comprises an international commitment is not domestic law enforceable by American courts unless Congress has: (1) enacted implementing statutes; or (2) the treaty itself conveys an intention that it is “self-executing” and is ratified on those terms. Justice Breyer’s dissent, joined by Justices Souter and Ginsburg, disagreed with the majority on how to determine whether a treaty is self-executing, the majority placing greater reliance on text.

Medellin v. Texas

Chief Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The International Court of Justice (ICJ), located in the Hague, is a tribunal established pursuant to the United Nations Charter to adjudicate disputes between member states. In the Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex.v.U.S.), 2004 I.C.J. 12 (Judgment of Mar. 31) (Avena), that tribunal considered a claim brought by Mexico against the United States. The ICJ held that, based on violations of the Vienna Convention, 51 named Mexican nationals were entitled to review and reconsideration of their state-court convictions and sentences in the United States. This was so regardless of any forfeiture of the right to raise Vienna Convention claims because of a failure to comply with generally applicable state rules governing challenges to criminal convictions.

In Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, 548 U.S. 331 (2006) – issued after Avena but involving individuals who were not named in the Avena judgment – we held that, contrary to the ICJ's determination, the Vienna Convention did not preclude the application of state default rules. After the Avena decision, President George W. Bush determined, through a Memorandum to the Attorney General (Feb. 28, 2005), App. to Pet. for Cert. 187a (Memorandum or President's Memorandum), that the United States would “discharge its international obligations” under Avena “by having State courts give effect to the decision.”

13 552 U.S. 491, 497-98 (2008). Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment, but did not join Roberts’ majority opinion. He viewed that opinion as potentially creating a presumption of treaties being non-self-executing, a presumption that he did not share. Id. at 533-36 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment); id. at 547-51 (Breyer, J., joined by Souter & Ginsburg, JJ., dissenting).
Petitioner José Ernesto Medellín, who had been convicted and sentenced in Texas state court for murder, is one of the 51 Mexican nationals named in the Avena decision. Relying on the ICJ's decision and the President's Memorandum, Medellín filed an application for a writ of habeas corpus in state court. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals dismissed Medellin's application as an abuse of the writ under state law, given Medellin's failure to raise his Vienna Convention claim in a timely manner under state law. . . . We conclude that neither Avena nor the President's Memorandum constitutes directly enforceable federal law that pre-empt state limitations on the filing of successive habeas petitions.

Medellín first contends that the ICJ's judgment in Avena constitutes a “binding” obligation on the state and federal courts of the United States. He argues that “by virtue of the Supremacy Clause, the treaties requiring compliance with the Avena judgment are already the ‘Law of the Land’ by which all state and federal courts in this country are ‘bound.’” Reply Brief for Petitioner 1. Accordingly, Medellín argues, Avena is a binding federal rule of decision that pre-empt contrary state limitations on successive habeas petitions.

No one disputes that the Avena decision – a decision that flows from the treaties through which the United States submitted to ICJ jurisdiction with respect to Vienna Convention disputes – constitutes an international law obligation on the part of the United States. But not all international law obligations automatically constitute binding federal law enforceable in United States courts. The question we confront here is whether the Avena judgment has automatic domestic legal effect such that the judgment of its own force applies in state and federal courts.

This Court has long recognized the distinction between treaties that automatically have effect as domestic law, and those that – while they constitute international law commitments – do not by themselves function as binding federal law. The distinction was well explained by Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Foster v. Neilson, [27 U.S. (2 Pet.)] 253, 315 (1829), overruled on other grounds, United States v. Percheman, [32 U.S. (7 Pet.)] 51 (1833), which held that a treaty is “equivalent to an act of the legislature,” and hence self-executing, when it “operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision.” Foster, supra, at 314. When, in contrast, “[treaty] stipulations are not self-executing they can only be enforced pursuant to legislation to carry them into effect.” Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190, 194 (1888). In sum, while treaties “may comprise international commitments . . . they are not domestic law unless Congress has either enacted implementing statutes or the treaty itself conveys an intention that it be ‘self-executing’ and is ratified on these terms.” Igartua–De La Rosa v. United States, 417 F.3d 145, 150 (C.A.1 2005) (en banc) (Boudin, C. J.).

As a signatory to the Optional Protocol, the United States agreed to submit disputes arising out of the Vienna Convention to the ICJ. The Protocol provides: “Disputes arising out of the interpretation or application of the [Vienna] Convention shall lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice.” Art. I, 21 U.S.T., at 326. Of course, submitting to jurisdiction and agreeing to be bound are two different things. A party could, for example, agree to compulsory nonbinding arbitration. Such an agreement would require the party to appear before the arbitral tribunal without obligating the party to treat the tribunal's decision as binding. See, e.g., North American Free Trade Agreement, U.S.-Can.-Mex., Art.2018(1), Dec. 17, 1992, 32 I.L.M. 605, 697 (1993) (“On receipt of the final report of [the arbitral panel requested by a Party to the agreement], the disputing Parties shall agree on the resolution of the dispute, which normally shall conform with the determinations and recommendations of the panel”).

The most natural reading of the Optional Protocol is as a bare grant of jurisdiction. It provides only that “[d]isputes arising out of the interpretation or application of the [Vienna] Convention shall lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice” and “may accordingly be brought before the [ICJ] . . . by any party to the dispute being a Party to the present Protocol.” Art. I, 21 U.S.T., at 326. The Protocol says nothing about the effect of an ICJ decision and does not itself commit signatories to comply with an ICJ judgment.

If ICJ judgments were instead regarded as automatically enforceable domestic law, they would be immediately and directly binding on state and federal courts pursuant to the Supremacy Clause. Mexico or the ICJ would have no need to proceed to the Security Council to enforce the judgment in this case. Noncompliance with an ICJ judgment through exercise of the Security Council veto – always regarded as an option by the Executive and ratifying Senate during and after consideration of the U.N. Charter, Optional Protocol, and ICJ Statute – would no longer be a viable alternative. There would be nothing to veto. In light of the U.N. Charter's remedial scheme, there is no reason to believe that the President and Senate signed up for such a result.

In sum, Medellín's view that ICJ decisions are automatically enforceable as domestic law is fatally undermined by the enforcement structure established by Article 94. His construction would eliminate the option of noncompliance contemplated by Article 94(2), undermining the ability of the political branches to determine whether and how to comply with an ICJ judgment. Those sensitive foreign policy decisions would instead be transferred to state and federal courts charged with applying an ICJ judgment directly as domestic law. And those courts would not be empowered to decide whether to comply with the judgment – again, always regarded as an option by the political branches – any more than courts may consider whether to comply with any other species of domestic law. This result would be particularly anomalous in light of the principle that “[t]he conduct of the foreign relations of our Government is committed by the Constitution to the Executive and Legislative – ‘the political’ – Departments.” Oetjen v. Central Leather Co., 246 U.S. 297, 302 (1918).

It is, moreover, well settled that the United States' interpretation of a treaty “is entitled to great weight.” Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 457 U.S. 176, 184-185 (1982); see also El Al Israel Airlines, Ltd. v. Tsui Yuan Tseng, 525 U.S. 155, 168 (1999). The Executive Branch has unfailingly adhered to its view that the relevant treaties do not create domestically enforceable federal law. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 4, 27-29.

Our conclusion that Avena does not by itself constitute binding federal law is confirmed by the “postratification understanding” of signatory nations. See Zicherman, 516 U.S., at 226. There are currently 47 nations that are parties to the Optional Protocol and 171 nations that are parties to the Vienna Convention. Yet neither Medellín nor his amici have identified a single nation that treats ICJ judgments as binding in domestic courts.

[W]e reiterated in Sanchez-Llamas what we held in Breard, that “‘absent a clear and express statement to the contrary, the procedural rules of the forum State govern the implementation of the treaty in that State.’” 548 U.S., at 351 (quoting Breard, 523 U.S., at 375). Given that ICJ judgments may interfere with state procedural rules, one would expect the ratifying parties to the relevant treaties to have clearly stated their intent to give those judgments domestic effect, if they had so intended. Here there is no statement in the Optional Protocol, the U.N. Charter, or the ICJ Statute that supports the notion that ICJ judgments displace state procedural rules.

Justice STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

There is a great deal of wisdom in Justice Breyer's dissent. I agree that the text and history of the Supremacy Clause, as well as this Court's treaty-related cases, do not support a presumption against self-execution. I also endorse the proposition that the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Apr. 24, 1963, [1970] 21 U.S.T. 77, T.I.A.S. No. 6820, “is itself self-executing and judicially enforceable.” Moreover, I think this case presents a closer question than the Court's opinion allows. In the end, however, I am persuaded that the relevant treaties do not authorize this Court to enforce the judgment of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in Case Concerning Avena and Other Mexican Nationals (Mex.v.U.S.), 2004 I.C.J. 12 (Judgment of Mar. 31) (Avena).

The source of the United States' obligation to comply with judgments of the ICJ is found in Article 94(1) of the United Nations Charter, which was ratified in 1945. Article 94(1) provides that “[e]ach Member of the United Nations undertakes to comply with the decision of the [ICJ] in any case to which it is a party.” 59 Stat. 1051, T.S. No. 993 (emphasis added). In my view, the words “undertakes to comply” – while not the model of either a self-executing or a non-self-executing commitment – are most naturally read as a promise to take additional steps to enforce ICJ judgments.

Justice BREYER, with whom Justice SOUTER and Justice GINSBURG join, dissenting.

The Constitution's Supremacy Clause provides that “all Treaties ... which shall be made ... under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby.” Art. VI, cl. 2. The Clause means that the “courts” must regard “a treaty ... as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision.” Foster v. Neilson 2 Pet. 253, 314 (1829) (majority opinion of Marshall, C. J.).
Supreme Court case law stretching back more than 200 years helps explain what, for present purposes, the Founders meant when they wrote that “all Treaties . . . shall be the supreme Law of the Land.” Art. VI, cl. 2. In 1796, for example, the Court decided the case of Ware v. Hylton, [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 199 (1976)]. A British creditor sought payment of an American's Revolutionary War debt. The debtor argued that he had, under Virginia law, repaid the debt by complying with a state statute enacted during the Revolutionary War that required debtors to repay money owed to British creditors into a Virginia state fund. Id., at 220-221 (opinion of Chase, J.). The creditor, however, claimed that this state-sanctioned repayment did not count because a provision of the 1783 Paris Peace Treaty between Britain and the United States said that “‘the creditors of either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value . . . of all bona fide debts, theretofore contracted’”; and that provision, the creditor argued, effectively nullified the state law. Id., at 203-204 (Reporter's Summary). The Court, with each Justice writing separately, agreed with the British creditor, held the Virginia statute invalid. Id., at 285.

Justice Iredell pointed out that some Treaty provisions, those, for example, declaring the United States an independent Nation or acknowledging its right to navigate the Mississippi River, were “executed,” taking effect automatically upon ratification. 3 Dall., at 272. Other provisions were “executory,” in the sense that they were “to be carried into execution” by each signatory nation “in the manner which the Constitution of that nation prescribes.” Ibid. Before adoption of the U.S. Constitution, all such provisions would have taken effect as domestic law only if Congress on the American side, or Parliament on the British side, had written them into domestic law. Id., at 274-277.

But, Justice Iredell adds, after the Constitution's adoption, while further parliamentary action remained necessary in Britain (where the “practice” of the need for an “act of parliament” in respect to “any thing of a legislative nature” had “been constantly observed,” id., at 275-276), . . . legislative action in respect to the treaty's debt-collection provision was no longer necessary in the United States. Id., at 276-277. The ratification of the Constitution with its Supremacy Clause means that treaty provisions that bind the United States may (and in this instance did) also enter domestic law without further congressional action and automatically bind the States and courts as well. Id., at 277.

Some 30 years later, the Court returned to the “self-execution” problem. In Foster, [27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829)], the Court examined a provision in an 1819 treaty with Spain ceding Florida to the United States; the provision said that “'grants of land made’” by Spain before January 24, 1818, “'shall be ratified and confirmed’” to the grantee. Id., at 310. Chief Justice Marshall, writing for the Court, noted that, as a general matter, one might expect a signatory nation to execute a treaty through a formal exercise of its domestic sovereign authority (e.g., through an act of the legislature). Id., at 314. But in the United States “a different principle” applies. Ibid. (emphasis added). The Supremacy Clause means that, here, a treaty is “the law of the land . . . to be regarded in Courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature” and “operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision” unless it specifically contemplates execution by the legislature and thereby “addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department.” Ibid. (emphasis added). The Court decided that the treaty provision in question was not self-executing; in its view, the words “shall be ratified” demonstrated that the provision foresaw further legislative action. Id., at 315.
The Court, however, changed its mind about the result in Foster four years later, after being shown a less legislatively oriented, less tentative, but equally authentic Spanish-language version of the treaty. See United States v. Percheman, [32 U.S. (7 Pet.)] 51, 88-89 (1833). And by 1840, instances in which treaty provisions automatically became part of domestic law were common enough for one Justice to write that “it would be a bold proposition” to assert “that an act of Congress must be first passed” in order to give a treaty effect as “a supreme law of the land.” Lessee of Pollard's Heirs v. Kibbe, 14 Pet. 353, 388 (1840) (Baldwin, J., concurring).

Since Foster and Pollard, this Court has frequently held or assumed that particular treaty provisions are self-executing, automatically binding the States without more. See Appendix A, infra (listing, as examples, 29 such cases, including 12 concluding that the treaty provision invalidates state or territorial law or policy as a consequence). See also Wu, Treaties' Domains, 93 Va. L. Rev. 571, 583-584 (2007) (concluding “enforcement against States is the primary and historically most significant type of treaty enforcement in the United States”).

The case law provides no simple magic answer to the question whether a particular treaty provision is self-executing. But the case law does make clear that, insofar as today's majority looks for language about “self-execution” in the treaty itself and insofar as it erects “clear statement” presumptions designed to help find an answer, it is misguided. See, e.g., ante, at 1363-1364 (expecting “clea[r] state[ment]” of parties' intent where treaty obligation “may interfere with state procedural rules”); ante, at 1368 (for treaty to be self-executing, Executive should at drafting “ensur[e] that it contains language plainly providing for domestic enforceability”).

The many treaty provisions that this Court has found self-executing contain no textual language on the point (see Appendix A, infra ). Few, if any, of these provisions are clear. See, e.g., Ware, [3 U.S. (3 Dall.)], at 273 (opinion of Iredell, J.). Those that displace state law in respect to such quintessential state matters as, say, property, inheritance, or debt repayment, lack the “clea[r] state[ment]” that the Court today apparently requires. This is also true of those cases that deal with state rules roughly comparable to the sort that the majority suggests require special accommodation. See, e.g., Hopkirk v. Bell, 3 Cranch 454, 457-458 (1806) (treaty pre-empts Virginia state statute of limitations). These many Supreme Court cases finding treaty provisions to be self-executing cannot be reconciled with the majority's demand for textual clarity.

[Ed.: Applying a balancing approach based on weighing a number of factors, Justice Breyer then considered seven reasons which, taken together, gave the ICJ judgment domestic effect. These seven reasons were: while the language of the treaty does not explicitly say it is self-executing, it does suggest the treaty should be “as binding” as possible; the underlying dispute involves the meaning of a Vienna Convention provision that itself is “self-executing”; the objective of the ICJ Protocol was to provide a forum for compulsory settlement; imposing the majority’s clear statement rule has “negative practical implications” because it might effect the enforceability of many other similarly drafted treatises; this case concerns the kind of matter with which judges are familiar; the Court will not need to create a new cause of action; and neither the President nor Congress had expressed concern about judicial enforcement of the ICJ decision.]
Given that a judgment by the International Court of Justice was not self-executing, the Court then rejected a contention that an ICJ judgment had become domestic law binding on state and federal courts as the result of a Presidential Memorandum. For himself and Justices Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito, Chief Justice Roberts wrote that the executive cannot unilaterally execute a non-self-enforcing treaty by giving it domestic effect. The Court distinguished cases based on Justice Frankfurter’s famous passage that “a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of Congress and never before questioned” may create a “gloss” on executive power under Article II. Here, there was not a single prior instance of acquiescence in a Presidential directive issued to state courts. Also rejected was an argument that the President’s Memorandum was an exercise of authority to resolve foreign claims pursuant to an executive agreement. The Court said that the claims settlement cases involved a narrow set of circumstances: the making of executive agreements to settle civil claims between American citizens and foreign governments or foreign nations. Following this case, Texas moved forward applying the death penalty to inmates who were Mexican nationals, despite the Mexican consulate not having been informed of their detention initially, as the ICJ judgment said was required under international law. Jose Medellin, the inmate involved in Medellin v. Texas, was executed on August 5, 2008. The Court allowed another prisoner in similar circumstances to be executed on July 7, 2011.

3. Constitutional Limits on the Treaty Power

The Court has made it clear that treaties or executive agreements, or laws enacted pursuant to treaties or executive agreements, will not be enforced in American domestic courts if they violate constitutional prohibitions. This is based on the Constitution being “the supreme Law of the Land,” and the view that the President and Congress have no authority to negotiate and ratify any treaty provision or executive agreement that is in conflict with the Constitution, such as providing for trial of civilian military dependents by court-martial in violation of the jury trial provisions of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments, as held in Reid v. Covert. As with other government powers, the treaty power is subject to Bill of Rights prohibitions, subject to a limited exception, recognized at the turn of the 20th century, initially in a 5-4 opinion, in the so-called The Insular Cases, for United States action involving “non-fundamental” constitutional rights over “recently” acquired territories, including the Philippines, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, with “entirely different cultures and traditions” from the United States. 17 While this exception was of greater importance during the formalist and Holmesian eras, when fewer Bill of Rights provisions were viewed as “fundamental,” discussed at § 14.3.1(B) & 14.3.1(C), this exception has limited impact today given the fact that most Bill of Rights provisions became viewed as “fundamental” during the instrumentalist era, discussed at § 14.3.1(D), and remain “fundamental” today, addressed at § 14.3.2.

14 552 U.S. at 528-32. Justice Stevens agreed that unilateral Presidential action could not make a non-self-executing treaty binding law in American courts. Id. at 536 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment). Three Justices did not address the issue because they concluded that the treaty was self-executing. Id. at 566 (Breyer, J., joined by Souter & Ginsburg, JJ., dissenting).

Additionally, treaty or executive agreement obligations may be superseded by later federal legislation. Under well-established doctrine, treaties and executive agreements, like statutes, stand on the same constitutional footing, and in case of a conflict, whichever was passed last controls. 18 In determining whether a conflict exists, the Court has stated that “an act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other construction remains.” 19 In addition, there is a maxim of construction that “courts should interpret treaties liberally and in good faith so as to preserve amity among nations.” 20

Despite this doctrine applicable to United States domestic courts, for purposes of international law, such as decisions by the International Court of Justice at the Hague in the Netherlands, valid treaty obligations are superior to the domestic constitutional law of any nation. 21 Thus, there is a possibility of conflicting rulings if a treaty provision enacted by the United States is viewed as violating the United States Constitution. In such a case, United States domestic courts will base 18 See Chae Chan Ping v. United States (The Chinese Exclusion Case), 130 U.S. 581, 599-603 (1889). For an article adopting the novel view that treaty provisions should trump even later-passed statutes, departing from the normal, well-established rule that whichever one is passed last controls, see Scott A. Penner, Note, Changing the Balance of Power: Why a Treaty-Trump Presumption Should Replace the Later-in-Time Rule When Interpreting Conflicting Treaties and Statutes, 34 Hastings Const. L.Q. 355 (2007). While not likely to be adopted in practice, the article is useful in challenging the premises of the current well-established rule on the topic.

their decision on the Constitution. The international court will base its decision on the treaty, although in interpreting the treaty international courts would take into account constitutional requirements in deciding what the United States government actually adopted in ratifying the treaty. Depending on what enforcement mechanisms are present, and few direct enforcement mechanisms exist at international law, the United States government would have to decide how to proceed if met with conflicting rulings from the different tribunals. It might be good in theory to follow international law, but domestic political pressures might counsel a different practice.

4. Use of the Treaty Power to Expand Federal Domestic Power

To implement a treaty or executive agreement, the question has arisen whether Congress may pass a law it could not enact in the absence of the treaty or agreement. In Missouri v. Holland, the Court appeared to say "yes," at least if the treaty does not violate any constitutional prohibition and is a good faith attempt to address a national problem with which the states cannot effectively cope.

Missouri v. Holland

Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the State of Missouri to prevent a game warden of the United States from attempting to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of July 3, 1918, c. 128, 40 Stat. 755, and the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance of the same. The ground of the bill is that the statute is an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, and that the acts of the defendant done and threatened under that authority invade the sovereign right of the State and contravene its will manifested in statutes. The State also alleges a pecuniary interest, as owner of the wild birds within its borders and otherwise, admitted by the Government to be sufficient, but it is enough that the bill is a reasonable and proper means to assert the alleged quasi sovereign rights of a State. Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U.S. 125, 142. Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 237. A motion to dismiss was sustained by the District Court on the ground that the [Act] is constitutional. 258 Fed. Rep. 479. Acc. United States v. Thompson, 258 Fed. Rep. 257; United States v. Rockefeller, 260 Fed. Rep. 346.

On December 8, 1916, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain was proclaimed by the President. It recited that many species of birds in their annual migrations traversed certain parts of the United States and of Canada, that they were of great value as a source of food and in destroying insects injurious to vegetation, but were in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection. It therefore provided for specified close seasons and protection in other forms, and agreed that the two powers would take or propose to their law-making bodies the necessary measures for carrying the treaty out. 39 Stat. 1702. The above mentioned Act of July 3, 1918, entitled an act to give effect to the convention, prohibited the killing, capturing or selling any of the migratory birds included in the terms of the treaty except as permitted by regulations compatible with those terms, to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture. Regulations were proclaimed on July 31, and October 25, 1918. 40 Stat. 1812; 1863. It is unnecessary to go into any details, because, as we have said, the question raised is the general one whether the treaty and statute are void as an interference with the rights reserved to the States.

To answer this question it is not enough to refer to the Tenth Amendment, reserving the powers not delegated to the United States, because by Article II, § 2, the power to make treaties is delegated expressly, and by Article VI treaties made under the authority of the United States, along with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are declared the supreme law of the land. If the treaty is valid there can be no dispute about the validity of the statute under Article I, § 8, as a necessary and proper means to execute the powers of the Government. The language of the Constitution as to the supremacy of treaties being general, the question before us is narrowed to an inquiry into the ground upon which the present supposed exception is placed.

It is said that a treaty cannot be valid if it infringes the Constitution, that there are limits, therefore, to the treaty-making power, and that one such limit is that what an act of Congress could not do unaided, in derogation of the powers reserved to the States, a treaty cannot do. An earlier act of Congress that attempted by itself and not in pursuance of a treaty to regulate the killing of migratory birds within the States had been held bad in the District Court. United States v. Shauver, 214 Fed. Rep. 154. United States v. McCullagh, 221 Fed. Rep. 288. Those decisions were supported by arguments that migratory birds were owned by the States in their sovereign capacity for the benefit of their people, and that under cases like Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U.S. 519, this control was one that Congress had no power to displace.

Whether the two cases cited were decided rightly or not they cannot be accepted as a test of the treaty power. Acts of Congress are the supreme law of the land only when made in pursuance of the Constitution, while treaties are declared to be so when made under the authority of the United States.
It is open to question whether the authority of the United States means more than the formal acts prescribed to make the convention. We do not mean to imply that there are no qualifications to the treaty-making power; but they must be ascertained in a different way. It is obvious that there may be matters of the sharpest exigency for the national well being that an act of Congress could not deal with but that a treaty followed by such an act could, and it is not lightly to be assumed that, in matters requiring national action, "a power which must belong to and somewhere reside in every civilized government" is not to be found. Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U.S. 14, 33. What was said in that case with regard to the powers of the States applies with equal force to the powers of the nation in cases where the States individually are incompetent to act. We are not yet discussing the particular case before us but only are considering the validity of the test proposed. With regard to that we may add that when we are dealing with words that also are a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation. The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago. The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution. The only question is whether it is forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment. We must consider what this country has become in deciding what that Amendment has reserved.

The State as we have intimated founds its claim of exclusive authority upon an assertion of title to migratory birds, an assertion that is embodied in statute. No doubt it is true that as between a State and its inhabitants the State may regulate the killing and sale of such birds, but it does not follow that its authority is exclusive of paramount powers. To put the claim of the State upon title is to lean upon a slender reed. Wild birds are not in the possession of anyone; and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the State's rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another State and in a week a thousand miles away. If we are to be accurate we cannot put the case of the State upon higher ground than that the treaty deals with creatures that for the moment are within the state borders, that it must be carried out by officers of the United States within the same territory, and that but for the treaty the State would be free to regulate this subject itself.

As most of the laws of the United States are carried out within the States and as many of them deal with matters which in the silence of such laws the State might regulate, such general grounds are not enough to support Missouri's claim. Valid treaties of course "are as binding within the territorial limits of the States as they are elsewhere throughout the dominion of the United States." Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U.S. 678, 683. No doubt the great body of private relations usually fall within the control of the State, but a treaty may override its power. We do not have to invoke the later developments of constitution law for this proposition; it was recognized as early as Hopkirk v. Bell, 3 Cranch, 454 [(1806)], with regard to statutes of limitation, and even earlier, as to confiscation, in Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199 [(1796)]. It was assumed by Chief Justice Marshall with regard to the escheat of land to the State in Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259, 275 [(1817)]. So as to a limited jurisdiction of foreign consuls within a State. Wildenhus's Case, 120 U.S. 1 [(1887)].
Here a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved. It can be protected only by national action in concert with that of another power. The subject-matter is only transitorily within the State and has no permanent habitat therein. But for the treaty and the statute there soon might be no birds for any powers to deal with. [Ed.: For example, Passenger Pigeons, once numbering in the billions in the United States, were rendered extinct between 1870-1914, due to habitat destruction and commercial hunting for a cheap source of food, accentuated by a “fad” for “squab” (pigeon meat) at the end of the 19th century.] We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forests and our crops are destroyed. It is not sufficient to rely upon the States. The reliance is vain, and were it otherwise, the question is whether the United States is forbidden to act. We are of opinion that the treaty and statute must be upheld. Carey v. South Dakota, 250 U.S. 118.

Justice VAN DEVANTER and Justice PITNEY dissent. [Ed.: No dissenting opinion filed.]

In Bond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2077, 2083 (2014), the Court dodged the issue of a whether a treaty could ever augment congressional enforcement power by ruling that the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 did not reach an attempt by a wife to injure her husband’s lover with a chemical compound that gave her “a minor thumb burn.” A three-Justice concurrence concluded the statute applied, but was unconstitutional as outside Congress’ domestic power, and not justified as part of treaty enforcement, which is limited to international matters. Id. at 2102 (Thomas, J., joined by Scalia, J., & Alito, J., as to Parts I, II and III, concurring in the judgment).

§ 11.4 Power to Make Executive Agreements and Additional Considerations

As discussed in Dames & Moore v. Regan, excerpted at § 11.2, the President has the power to enter into executive agreements with the Chief Executives of foreign nations. These agreements bind the United States just as would a treaty, as discussed at § 11.3.3 nn.18-20. It has been noted:

There has been congressional-executive agreements since early in U.S. history. In 1792, Congress authorized the Postmaster General to conclude international agreements concerning the exchange of mail. Congressional-executive agreements have been especially common in the area of international trade, in part because of the perception that this area falls within the prerogatives of the full Congress to regulate foreign commerce and raise revenues.

The number of congressional-executive agreements rose dramatically in the twentieth century. The establishment of the United Nations at the end of World War II prompted a substantial growth in international agreements, and the increased global role of the United States during and after the war prompted greater U.S. involvement in such agreements.26

While in theory the ability of Presidents to sign executive agreements without the 2/3 approval of the Senate may appear to give the President a large measure of sovereign authority, in practice many separation of powers concerns are mitigated by viewing the executive agreements as non-self-executing, and thus enforceable only if Congress supports the agreement by passing enabling legislation. Particularly in the area of international trade, such as many trade agreements, like NAFTA (North American Free Trade Agreement) and GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade), Congress gives the President the ability to negotiate based on “fast track” approval, which requires Congress to vote up-or-down on any proposed agreement without amendment. Such “fast track” approval makes it possible for the President to negotiate such trade agreements knowing that further negotiations will not have to take place based on any congressional amendments to the initial agreement. At the end of the day, however, Congress must approve the proposed executive agreement and pass implementing legislation or else the agreement will have no domestic effect.27

During the first part of the 19th century, the Marshall Court adopted the traditional view that Native American tribes were “domestic, dependent nations.”28 Rights “reserved” to the tribes were thus the subject of treaty negotiations, the tribes being “sovereign nations” for this purpose.29 In 1871, Congress altered this understanding by stating that treaties would no longer be used to regulate Native American tribes, but that regulation would be done pursuant to congressional statutes and executive implementation. This was done to ensure that the House of Representatives would have an equal say in making policy regarding Native Americans and management of federal lands, rather than policy made by the President and 2/3 of the Senate under the treaty power.30

Some commentators have questioned whether some delegations of sovereign power to international tribunals, such as the United Nations, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the International Labour Organization, or the World Trade Organization violate implied structural principles in the Constitution regarding federal sovereignty.31 The Supreme Court has never indicated any interest in developing doctrine along those lines.

Cases involving international relations, not governed directly by the federal Constitution, statutes, treaties, or executive agreements, are an area of federal common law. This notion of federal common law also applies to cases involving the propriety rights of Native Americans, and the role of the federal judiciary in determining the proper extent of jurisdiction of state courts over aliens. It has been noted:

Under Chief Justices Jay and Marshall, the Court heard more than 1300 cases between 1791 and 1835. . . . 323 of these cases, or one in four, involved the foreign affairs of the United States. Nearly two in five cases heard by the Jay Court involved international issues. During John Marshall's thirty-five-year term as Chief Justice, only one year, 1803, failed to see a single foreign relations case reach the Supreme Court.

More than half of all foreign affairs cases involved a foreign party or transaction. . . . A larger number involved foreign or international laws, though international laws outnumbered foreign ones almost five to one. Cases involving the extraterritorial application of U.S. law reached the Supreme Court 110 times. The vast majority of these cases involved nonintercourse or embargo acts or the prohibition against slave trading.

In addition, Article I, § 8, cl. 10 grants to Congress the power, among other things, "[t]o define and punish . . . Offenses against the Law of Nations . . . ." This clause grants Congress power to incorporate international law into federal law, even when such norms infringe upon areas otherwise regulated by the states. Further, as the Court noted in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, where Congress has passed a jurisdictional statute, such as the Alien Tort Claims Act, which creates on its own no new causes of action, the reasonable inference is that the statute was intended to have practical effect the moment it became law and federal common law would provide some causes of action for international law violations with a potential for personal liability.

CHAPTER 12: MILITARY MATTERS

§ 12.1 Text of the Constitution and Cases Before 1937 Regarding Military Matters

1. Text of the Constitution

Under Article I, § 8, cl. 11, Congress has the power “To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water.” While the matter is not without dispute, it has been argued that the best understanding of the historical evidence suggests that military theory at the time of the Framing focused “on the theories of both declared and undeclared wars, with a declaration being regarded as necessary to commence an offensive war, but none being necessary for a purely defensive war. Further, military theory of the time had also developed the concept of ‘perfect’ and ‘imperfect’ war. A ‘perfect’ war was one which was complete, while an ‘imperfect’ war was more limited, and accomplished through use of ‘reprisals.’” On this understanding, Congress is granted the power to initiate both major and minor military actions, not the President, because Congress is granted both powers over “war” and “reprisal.”

This view of the balance of power between Congress and the President is supported by reading the congressional power to grant “letters of marque and reprisal” in Article I, § 8, cl. 11 as including the power to authorize the President to undertake “reprisals” as a form of minor military action. This is the traditional view of congressional power in this area, and is consistent with 18th-century political doctrine. For example, as phrased by 18th century natural law writer Burlamanqui, “By reprisals then we mean that imperfect kind of war, or those acts of hostility which sovereigns exercise against each other, or, with their consent, their subjects, by seizing the persons or effects of the subjects of a foreign commonwealth, that refuseth to do us justice.”

Ply. 361, 369 (2003) (discussing the views of 17th and 18th century natural law philosophers, such as Hugo Grotius, Samuel Pufendorf, and Emmerich de Vattel, on the subject of war).

2 On this view, see generally Charles A. Lofgren, War-Making Under the Constitution: The Original Understanding, 81 Yale L.J. 672, 689-702 (1972) (citing Burlamanqui, at 692 n.90).
On the other hand, literally the power of “letters of marque and reprisal” involved the sovereign directing private parties, so-called “privateers,” to seize or destroy property or persons in the name of the sovereign. Famous English examples of that power included Sir Francis Drake being given that power regarding Spanish galleons. While that practice had diminish during the 18th century, and colloquially “reprisal” had come to have the broader meaning of limited offensive military action, it is possible to read the congressional grant of power over “letters of marque and reprisal” as limited to its core literal meaning of direction to private parties. So read, that would leave a gap between Congress’ power to initiate major military action through declaring “war,” and authorizing private “reprisals.” That gap would be filled by the President’s Commander-in-Chief power to initiate minor military action without congressional authorization.3

This result would be consistent with a conservative predisposition to favor executive power, noted at § 9.1.1 n.14. However, a fuller analysis would have to explain why the Constitution is properly read to create this gap in power, and then filled by unilateral Presidential action, without any specific textual language supporting that reading. Under a core literal meaning approach, the term “Commander in Chief” is a power to command when called into service by Congress, not a power to initiate military action. Regarding the term “letters of marque and reprisal,” during the 19th century the 1856 Declaration of Paris banned letters of marque, defined as directed to private parties. Although the United States did not sign that treaty, the United States has abided by its terms.

Under Article I, § 8, cl. 12-16, Congress also has the powers: “To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a term longer than two Years”; “To provide and maintain a Navy”; “To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces”; “To provide for calling forth the Militia [today termed the state National Guards] to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions”; and “To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.” As a matter of purposive interpretation, and legislative practice, the provisions regarding the army and navy also give Congress the power to provide for and maintain an air force and the marines. Under the Necessary and Proper Clause, Congress also has the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers.

Under Article II, § 1 of the Constitution, the President has “the executive Power.” This includes, as listed in Article II, § 3, the duty to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.” Under Article II, § 2, cl. 1, the President is the “Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States.” Under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, the President has the “Power by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate to make Treatises, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur.”

The Constitution makes the war power almost exclusively federal. Under Article I, § 10, cls. 1 & 3, states cannot grant letters of marque and reprisal, cannot keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, unless Congress consents; and cannot “engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.” This language also suggests a distinction between offensive military action, to which consent by Congress is needed, and the right, even absent a declaration, to undertake defensive military action in emergency circumstances.

World War II restrictions on persons of Japanese ancestry were sustained under the war powers of Congress and the President, including a curfew for American citizens of Japanese descent, and later forced internment. The Court said that the war power is all power needed to wage war successfully. It includes steps to prevent espionage and sabotage and all other matters so related to war as substantially to affect its conduct and progress. War powers do not end with the end of hostilities. Congress may deal with continuing evils arising from a war, such as a federal rent control law upheld in 1948 because World War II, though ending in 1945, had contributed to a housing deficit.

As with other government powers, the war power is subject to Bill of Rights prohibitions, subject to a limited early 20th century exception, discussed at § 11.3.3 n.17, in The Insular Cases, for United States action involving “non-fundamental” constitutional rights over “recently” acquired territories, including the Philippines, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, with “entirely different cultures and traditions” from the United States.

2. Cases Before 1937 Regarding Military Matters

There has always been a debate over how much power the President has as Commander-in-Chief to order military personnel into action without first seeking a congressional declaration of war or other means of congressional support. A classic example of this issue arising in the Supreme Court occurred in 1862 in The Prize Cases, excerpted below. Even though the 5-4 Court approved President Lincoln’s use of military force against rebels he considered to be belligerents after Fort Sumter was fired upon on April 12, 1861, it was unclear whether the power to act rested entirely on presidential power as Commander in Chief or whether it was authorized under Acts of Congress passed in 1795 and 1807. The point was not critical for the outcome, as the Court said that even if the President’s actions needed further congressional approval, it had been given by ratification on July 13, 1861. Four Justices in dissent said that only Congress could declare war, and that the congressional ratification was invalid as applied to acts before July 13, 1861.

It has been noted that Congress’ power for “calling forth” the state Militias, and providing for their “organizing, arming, and disciplining,” as well as “governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States” suggests the framers and ratifiers believed in a limited view of the President’s Commander-in-Chief power to authorize military action on his own, since if the President was not given the power to order the state Militias into action, it is even less likely the President would have been given the greater power to order the United States military into action.7

The Prize Cases
67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863)

Justice GRIER delivered the opinion of the court.

There are certain propositions of law which must necessarily affect the ultimate decision of these cases, and many others, which it will be proper to discuss and decide before we notice the special facts peculiar to each.

They are, 1st. Had the President a right to institute a blockade of ports in possession of persons in armed rebellion against the Government, on the principles of international law, as known and acknowledged among civilized States?

2d. Was the property of persons domiciled or residing within those States a proper subject of capture on the sea as "enemies' property?"

Neutrals have a right to challenge the existence of a blockade de facto, and also the authority of the party exercising the right to institute it. They have a right to enter the ports of a friendly nation for the purposes of trade and commerce, but are bound to recognize the rights of a belligerent engaged in actual war, to use this mode of coercion, for the purpose of subduing the enemy.

That a blockade de facto actually existed, and was formally declared and notified by the President on the 27th and 30th of April, 1861, is an admitted fact in these cases.

That the President, as the Executive Chief of the Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, was the proper person to make such notification, has not been, and cannot be disputed.

The right of prize and capture has its origin in the "jus belli," and is governed and adjudged under the law of nations. To legitimate the capture of a neutral vessel or property on the high seas, a war must exist de facto, and the neutral must have a knowledge or notice of the intention of one of the parties belligerent to use this mode of coercion against a port, city, or territory, in possession of the other.

Let us enquire whether, at the time this blockade was instituted, a state of war existed which would justify a resort to these means of subduing the hostile force.

As a civil war is never publicly proclaimed, eo nomine, against insurgents, its actual existence is a fact in our domestic history which the Court is bound to notice and to know.

The true test of its existence, as found in the writings of the sages of the common law, may be thus summarily stated: “When the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the Courts of Justice cannot be kept open, civil war exists and hostilities may be prosecuted on the same footing as if those opposing the Government were foreign enemies invading the land.”

By the Constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State, or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole Executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. He has no power to initiate or declare a war either against a foreign nation or a domestic State. But by the Acts of Congress of February 28th, 1795, and 3d of March, 1807, he is authorized to [call] out the militia and use the military and naval forces of the United States in case of invasion by foreign nations, and to suppress insurrection against the government of a State or of the United States.

If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorized but bound to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority. And whether the hostile party be a foreign invader, or States organized in rebellion, it is none the less a war, although the declaration of it be “unilateral.” Lord Stowell (1 Dodson, 247) observes, “It is not the less a war on that account, for war may exist without a declaration on either side. It is so laid down by the best writers on the law of nations. A declaration of war by one country only, is not a mere challenge to be accepted or refused at pleasure by the other.”

The battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma had been fought before the passage of the Act of Congress of May 13th, 1846, which recognized “a state of war as existing by the act of the Republic of Mexico.” This act not only provided for the future prosecution of the war, but was itself a vindication and ratification of the Act of the President in accepting the challenge without a previous formal declaration of war by Congress.

Whether the President in fulfilling his duties, as Commander-in-Chief, in suppressing an insurrection, has met with such armed hostile resistance, and a civil war of such alarming proportions as will compel him to accord to them the character of belligerents, is a question to be decided by him, and this Court must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department of the Government to which this power was entrusted. "He must determine what degree of force the crisis demands." The proclamation of blockade is itself official and conclusive evidence to the Court that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized a recourse to such a measure, under the circumstances peculiar to the case.

The correspondence of Lord Lyons with the Secretary of State admits the fact and concludes the question.

If it were necessary to the technical existence of a war, that it should have a legislative sanction, we find it in almost every act passed at the extraordinary session of the Legislature of 1861, which was wholly employed in enacting laws to enable the Government to prosecute the war with vigor and efficiency. And finally, in 1861, we find Congress "ex major cautela" and in anticipation of such astute objections, passing an act "approving, legalizing, and making valid all the acts, proclamations, and orders of the President, &c., as if they had been issued and done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress of the United States."

Without admitting that such an act was necessary under the circumstances, it is plain that if the President had in any manner assumed powers which it was necessary should have the authority or sanction of Congress, that on the well known principle of law, "omnis ratification retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur," this ratification has operated to perfectly cure the defect. In the case of Brown vs. United States, (8 Cr., 131, 132, 133,) Mr. Justice Story treats of this subject, and cites numerous authorities to which we may refer to prove this position, and concludes, "I am perfectly satisfied that no subject can commence hostilities or capture property of an enemy, when the sovereign has prohibited it. But suppose he did, I would ask if the sovereign may not ratify his proceedings, and thus by a retroactive operation give validity to them?"

Although Mr. Justice Story dissented from the majority of the Court on the whole case, the doctrine stated by him on this point is correct and fully substantiated by authority.

The objection made to this act of ratification, that it is ex post facto, and therefore unconstitutional and void, might possibly have some weight on the trial of an indictment in a criminal Court. But precedents from that source cannot be received as authoritative in a tribunal administering public and international law.

On this first question therefore we are of the opinion that the President had a right, jure belli, to institute a blockade of ports in possession of the States in rebellion, which neutrals are bound to regard.

We now proceed to notice the facts peculiar to the several cases submitted for our consideration. The principles which have just been stated apply alike to all of them.

I. The case of the brig Amy Warwick.

This vessel was captured upon the high seas by the United States gunboat Quaker City, and with her cargo was sent into the district of Massachusetts for condemnation. The brig was claimed by David Currie and others. The cargo consisted of coffee, and was claimed, four hundred bags by Edmund Davenport & Co., and four thousand seven hundred bags by Dunlap Moncure & Co. The title of these parties as respectively claimed was conceded. All the claimants at the time of the capture, and for a long time before, were residents of Richmond, Va., and were engaged in business there. Consequently, their property was justly condemned as "enemies' property."

The claim of Phipps & Co. for their advance was allowed by the Court below. That part of the decree was not appealed from and is not before us. The case presents no question but that of enemies' property.

The decree below is affirmed with costs.

Justice NELSON, dissenting. Chief Justice TANEY, Justice CATRON and Justice CLIFFORD, concurred in the dissenting opinion of Justice NELSON.

The Acts of 1795 and 1807 did not, and could not under the Constitution, confer on the President the power of declaring war against a State of this Union, or of deciding that war existed, and upon that ground authorize the capture and confiscation of the property of every citizen of the State whenever it was found on the waters. The laws of war, whether the war be civil or inter gents, as we have seen, convert every citizen of the hostile State into a public enemy, and treat him accordingly, whatever may have been his previous conduct. This great power over the business and property of the citizen is reserved to the legislative department by the express words of the Constitution. It cannot be delegated or surrendered to the Executive. Congress alone can determine whether war exists or should be declared; and until they have acted, no citizen of the State can be punished in his person or property, unless he had committed some offence against a law of Congress passed before the act was committed, which made it a crime, and defined the punishment. The penalty of confiscation for the acts of others with which he had no concern cannot lawfully be inflicted.

Congress on the 6th of August, 1862, passed an Act confirming all acts, proclamations, and orders of the President, after the 4th of March, 1861, respecting the army and navy, and legalizing them, so far as was competent for that body, and it has been suggested, but scarcely argued, that this legislation on the subject had the effect to bring into existence an ex post facto civil war with all the rights of capture and confiscation, jure belli, from the date referred to. An ex post facto law is defined, when, after an action, indifferent in itself, or lawful, is committed, the Legislature then, for the first time, declares it to have been a crime and inflicts punishment upon the person who committed it. The principle is sought to be applied in this case. Property of the citizen or foreign subject engaged in lawful trade at the time, and illegally captured, which must be taken as true if a confirmatory act be necessary, may be held and confiscated by subsequent legislation. In other words trade and commerce authorized at the time by acts of Congress and treaties, may, by ex post facto legislation, be changed into illicit trade and commerce with all its penalties and forfeitures annexed and enforced. The instance of the seizure of the Dutch ships in 1803 by Great Britain before the war, and confiscation after the declaration of war, which is well known, is referred to as an authority. But there the ships were seized by the war power, the orders of the Government, the seizure being a partial exercise of that power, and which was soon after exercised in full.
The precedent is one which has not received the approbation of jurists, and is not to be followed. See W. B. Lawrence, 2d ed. Wheaton's Element of Int. Law, pt. 4, ch. 1. sec. 11, and note. But, admitting its full weight, it affords no authority in the present case. Here the captures were without any Constitutional authority, and void; and, on principle, no subsequent ratification could make them valid.

Upon the whole, after the most careful consideration of this case which the pressure of other duties has admitted, I am compelled to the conclusion that no civil war existed between this Government and the States in insurrection till recognized by the Act of Congress 13th of July, 1861; that the President does not possess the power under the Constitution to declare war or recognize its existence within the meaning of the law of nations, which carries with it belligerent rights, and thus change the country and all its citizens from a state of peace to a state of war; that this power belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, and, consequently, that the President had no power to set on foot a blockade under the law of nations, and that the capture of the vessel and cargo in this case, and in all cases before us in which the capture occurred before the 13th of July, 1861, for breach of blockade, or as enemies' property, are illegal and void, and that the decrees of condemnation should be reversed and the vessel and cargo restored.

The Supreme Court’s opinion in the Prize Cases can be read as limited to holding that President Lincoln was authorized by 1795 and 1807 legislation to declare a blockade in the event of an insurrection or that, in any event, Congress could and did ratify the President's action by later legislation in 1861. Some of the reasoning of the majority opinion, however, can be interpreted to say that even without congressional approval the President has power to resist armed force with force, and that whether armed resistance calls for others to be treated as belligerents is a question to be decided by the President.

§ 12.2 Starting Military Matters in the Modern Post-1937 Era

In our Nation’s history, Presidents have called troops into action over 200 times, both for large-scale actions, such as in Korea in the 1950s and Vietnam in the 1960s and 1970s, or smaller-scale actions, such as invading Grenada in the 1980s. Congress has formally declared war only five times: the War of 1812, the Mexican-American War in 1846, the Spanish-American War in 1898, World War I in 1917, and World War II in 1941. Other military actions have been based on more limited congressional authorization. For example, for the Vietnam War, one can cite the 1954 Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty (SEATO), that treaty earlier ratified by the Senate; the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, passed by Congress in 1964, which provided authority for military personnel to defend themselves against attack in the Vietnam theater of operations; and implied congressional authorization through Congress continuing to fund Department of Defense requests for money to continue the military action.9

When it came to dealing with the Vietnam hostilities, the Supreme Court manifested considerable reluctance to take a case in which the issue was whether, war not having been formally declared by Congress, the military action of the United States was "illegal."10 The Second Circuit Court of Appeals did decide in 1971 that Congress had sufficiently authorized the South-East Asian commitments of the United States, including the furnishing of manpower and materials of war for protracted military operations in Vietnam.11

In 1973, Congress passed the War Powers Act over the veto of President Nixon. Among other things, the law requires consultation between Congress and the President "in every possible instance" before introducing United States Armed Forces into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. That Act provides that the President may commit United States military personnel into circumstances of "imminent hostilities" for a brief period of time, but the Act also calls for a report within 48 hours on the introduction of armed forces in such a situation, and requires the termination of the use of such forces whenever Congress so directs by concurrent resolution (basically a two-house veto of the President’s action), or within 60 days unless Congress has declared war, or has extended by law such 60-day period, or is physically unable to meet as a result of an armed attack upon the United States. The President can trigger an additional 30-day grace period if “unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety” of the troops requires continued presence “in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of such forces.” The Act also provides that the President has authority to act in times of a “national emergency” created by a sudden attack on the United States, its territories and possessions, or its armed forces.12

There is continuing controversy over the constitutionality of the War Powers Act, often termed the War Powers Resolution. Each President since the Act was passed has maintained the Act is an unconstitutional infringement on the President’s constitutional power as Commander in Chief, although each President has attempted to comply with the Act’s provisions in practice. Congress has always taken the view that the Act is constitutional as part of Congress’ power in Article I, § 8, cl. 11 to declare war.

Based upon the Chadha case, excerpted at § 9.3, the two-house legislative veto contained within this law is almost certainly invalid. However, the broader question of whether the other provisions of the War Powers Resolution are constitutional is more questionable. That issue has not come before the Court. Presidents have tended to avoid a direct conflict with Congress by reporting various use of the armed forces, but saying that action was taken in accord with a desire to inform Congress and “consistent with the War Powers Resolution.” Congress has also authorized presidential action in circumstances which might otherwise trigger the Act. For example, over the last twenty years, the presence of American troops at various times in South Korea, Bosnia, Saudi Arabia, Kosovo, Afghanistan, and Iraq have been approved by Congress, so troop presence there, including any continued presence, does not raise serious constitutional questions.

Since 1973, the only technical failure to comply with the War Powers Act occurred in 1999, when President Clinton continued bombing Serbia for 19 days longer than the 60 days permitted by the Act, as part of a NATO-authorized response to Serbia’s pattern of ethnic cleansing in Kosovo. That continued bombing was not approved by the House of Representatives, based upon a 213-213 tie vote. When a member of the House brought suit against President Clinton challenging his actions, lower federal courts dismissed the complaint on grounds of standing, and the case was not appealed to the Supreme Court.13

A similar issue was raised in the Summer of 2011, when President Obama authorized United States participation, along with France and Great Britain, in support of the rebels fighting against the Khadafi regime in Libya. In that case, President Obama claimed that the War Powers Resolution was not triggered, since the United States role was merely to provide back-up for France and British bombing runs and other military action, and thus United States forces were not introduced in a position of imminent hostilities themselves. Although members of Congress complained about this justification at the time, and there is a legitimate issue whether imminent hostilities existed, no congressional lawsuit was filed. The issue became functionally moot with the fall of the Libyan regime and the end of on-going U.S. military support obligations by the end of 2011.14

Although the matter is not beyond dispute, probably the best analysis is that the major provisions of the War Powers Resolution are constitutional. In considering Congress’ power over military matters, the Framers’ first draft gave Congress the power to “make war.” At the suggestion of James Madison, this was amended to give Congress the power to “declare war” in order to make it clear that the President should have the power to repel sudden attacks, while Congress has the power to “declare” war and reprisals, that is, to authorize major or minor offensive military action, as opposed to defensive military action. The shift in terminology also made it clear that the President had the Commander-in-Chief power to direct, or “make” war, while Congress had the power to trigger military action, that is, “declare” war. The War Powers Resolution provisions explicitly authorizing Presidential action to respond to sudden attacks is consistent with this understanding of congressional versus presidential constitutional powers.15

Where the President commits armed forces in an effort to rescue American hostages, the President can invoke the Hostage Act of 1868. Codified at 22 U.S.C. § 2272, it provides:

Whenever it is made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of the government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizens, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizens, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release, and all the facts and proceedings relating thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

The Act raises a number of unanswered questions. For example, in this context what are acts of war, as opposed to mere reprisals? How about President Carter’s attempt to rescue hostages in Iran? Was President Reagan’s invasion of Grenada, based on rescuing American citizens at a medical school there, an act of war? Probably both were limited military actions properly viewed as reprisals, not acts of war. A closer question, which became moot, was raised when there was the possibility during the Clinton Administration of an invasion of Haiti to restore democratic government, end human rights abuses, and protect American citizens.

§ 12.3 Managing Military Matters, Including Authorizing Military Tribunals

Even where the presence of troops in foreign countries does not raise serious constitutional concerns, collateral questions of executive power can arise from those occupations. One of the most serious of these concerns is the ability to create military commissions to oversee the occupation and prosecute various individuals held by military forces. In Ex parte Milligan, Ex parte Mitsuye Endo, and Duncan v. Kahanamoku,\(^\text{16}\) the Court "insisted that military power to detain civilians (or those who claimed to be civilians) within the United States must remain subordinate to the Article III courts and the safeguards of the Bill of Rights."\(^\text{17}\) In contrast, in a case involving enemy combatants, the Court held in Ex parte Quirin,\(^\text{18}\) excerpted below, that enemy combatants could constitutionally be tried in military courts. In Johnson v. Eisentrager,\(^\text{19}\) the Court denied foreign nationals, held outside the United States, the right to petition for habeas corpus in American federal courts.

In Rasul v. Bush,\(^\text{20}\) decided in 2004, the detainees were foreign nationals seized abroad and held outside United States borders. The petitioners were held at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for a seemingly indefinite period. The Court framed the issue as “whether United States courts lack jurisdiction to consider challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured abroad in connection with hostilities and incarcerated at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, Cuba.” By a 6-3 vote, the Court held that the federal courts do have such jurisdiction.

For a 5-Justice majority opinion, Justice Stevens distinguished Johnson v. Eisentrager on the grounds that Eisentrager involved consideration of whether foreign nationals have a constitutional right of habeas corpus, absent a statutory grant of jurisdiction to the federal courts. Justice Stevens then noted, “Because subsequent decisions of this Court have filled the statutory gap that had occasioned Eisentrager’s resort to ‘fundamentals,’ persons detained outside the territorial jurisdiction of any federal district court no longer need rely on the Constitution as the source of their right to federal habeas review.” Justice Stevens continued:

> In Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court of Ky., this Court held . . . that the prisoner's presence within the territorial jurisdiction of the district court is not “an invariable prerequisite” to the exercise of district court jurisdiction under the federal habeas statute. Rather, because “the writ of habeas corpus does not act upon the prisoner who seeks relief, but upon the person who holds him in what is alleged to be unlawful custody,” a district court acts “within [its] respective jurisdiction” within the meaning of [28 U.S.C.] § 2241 [the general habeas statute] as long as “the custodian can be reached by service of process.”\(^\text{21}\)

\(^{16}\) Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1866); Ex parte Mitsuye Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944); Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946).

\(^{21}\) Id. at 478-79, citing Braden, 410 U.S. 484, 494-95 (1973).
In dissent, Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justice Thomas, concluded that Braden did not clearly overrule Eisentrager. He said, “This is an irresponsible overturning of settled law in a matter of extreme importance to our forces currently in the field. I would leave it to Congress to change § 2241, and dissent from the Court's unprecedented holding.”

Concurring in the judgment, Justice Kennedy agreed that it was not clear that Braden overruled Eisentrager. Nonetheless, he concluded that “the facts here are distinguishable from those in Eisentrager in two critical ways, leading to the conclusion that a federal court may entertain the petitions.” Kennedy stated:

First, Guantanamo Bay is in every practical respect a United States territory, and it is one far removed from any hostilities. . . . From a practical perspective, the indefinite lease of Guantanamo Bay has produced a place that belongs to the United States, extending the “implied protection” of the United States to it. The second critical set of facts is that the detainees at Guantanamo Bay are being held indefinitely, and without benefit of any legal proceeding to determine their status. In Eisentrager, the prisoners were tried and convicted by a military commission of violating the laws of war and were sentenced to prison terms. Having already been subject to procedures establishing their status, they could not justify “a limited opening of our courts” to show that they were “of friendly personal disposition” and not enemy aliens. Indefinite detention without trial or other proceeding presents altogether different considerations. It allows friends and foes alike to remain in detention. It suggests a weaker case of military necessity and much greater alignment with the traditional function of habeas corpus. Perhaps, where detainees are taken from a zone of hostilities, detention without proceedings or trial would be justified by military necessity for a matter of weeks; but as the period of detention stretches from months to years, the case for continued detention to meet military exigencies becomes weaker.

Ex parte Quirin

Chief Justice STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question for decision is whether the detention of petitioners by respondent for trial by Military Commission, appointed by Order of the President of July 2, 1942, on charges preferred against them purporting to set out their violations of the law of war and of the Articles of War, is in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

23 Id. at 487 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment).
All the petitioners were born in Germany; all have lived in the United States. All returned to Germany between 1933 and 1941. All except petitioner Haupt are admittedly citizens of the German Reich, with which the United States is at war. Haupt came to this country with his parents when he was five years old; it is contended that he became a citizen of the United States by virtue of the naturalization of his parents during his minority and that he has not since lost his citizenship. The Government, however, takes the position that on attaining his majority he elected to maintain German allegiance and citizenship or in any case that he has by his conduct renounced or abandoned his United States citizenship. See Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325, 334; United States ex rel. Rojak v. Marshall, D.C., 34 F.2d 219; United States ex rel. Scimeca v. Husband, 2 Cir., 6 F.2d 957, 958; 8 U.S.C. § 801, 8 U.S.C.A. § 801, and compare 8 U.S.C. § 808, 8 U.S.C.A. § 808. For reasons presently to be stated we do not find it necessary to resolve these contentions.

After the declaration of war between the United States and the German Reich, petitioners received training at a sabotage school near Berlin, Germany, where they were instructed in the use of explosives and in methods of secret writing. Thereafter petitioners, with a German citizen, Dasch, proceeded from Germany to a seaport in Occupied France, where petitioners Burger, Heinck and Quirin, together with Dasch, boarded a German submarine which proceeded across the Atlantic to Amagansett Beach on Long Island, New York. The four were there landed from the submarine in the hours of darkness, on or about June 13, 1942, carrying with them a supply of explosives, fuses and incendiary and timing devices. While landing they wore German Marine Infantry uniforms or parts of uniforms. Immediately after landing they buried their uniforms and the other articles mentioned and proceeded in civilian dress to New York City.

The remaining four petitioners at the same French port boarded another German submarine, which carried them across the Atlantic to Ponte Vedra Beach, Florida. On or about June 17, 1942, they came ashore during the hours of darkness wearing caps of the German Marine Infantry and carrying with them a supply of explosives, fuses, and incendiary and timing devices. They immediately buried their caps and the other articles mentioned and proceeded in civilian dress to Jacksonville, Florida, and thence to various points in the United States. All were taken into custody in New York or Chicago by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. All had received instructions in Germany from an officer of the German High Command to destroy war industries and war facilities in the United States, for which they or their relatives in Germany were to receive salary payments from the German Government. They also had been paid by the German Government during their course of training at the sabotage school and had received substantial sums in United States currency, which were in their possession when arrested. The currency had been handed to them by an officer of the German High Command, who had instructed them to wear their German uniforms while landing in the United States.

The Constitution confers on the President the “executive Power,” Art II, § 1, cl. 1, and imposes on him the duty to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.” Art. II, § 3. It makes him the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, Art. II, § 2, cl. 1, and empowers him to appoint and commission officers of the United States. Art. II, § 3, cl. 1.
The Constitution thus invests the President as Commander in Chief with the power to wage war which Congress has declared, and to carry into effect all laws passed by Congress for the conduct of war and for the government and regulation of the Armed Forces, and all laws defining and punishing offences against the law of nations, including those which pertain to the conduct of war.

By the Articles of War, 10 U.S.C. §§ 1471-1593, Congress has provided rules for the government of the Army. It has provided for the trial and punishment, by courts martial, of violations of the Articles by members of the armed forces and by specified classes of persons associated or serving with the Army. Arts. 1, 2. But the Articles also recognize the “military commission” appointed by military command as an appropriate tribunal for the trial and punishment of offenses against the law of war not ordinarily tried by court martial. See Arts. 12, 15. Articles 38 and 46 authorize the President, with certain limitations, to prescribe the procedure for military commissions. Articles 81 and 82 authorize trial, either by court martial or military commission, of those charged with relieving, harboring or corresponding with the enemy and those charged with spying. And Article 15 declares that “the provisions of these articles conferring jurisdiction upon courts-martial shall not be construed as depriving military commissions . . . or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction in respect of offenders or offenses that by statute or by the law of war may be triable by such military commissions . . . or other military tribunals.” Article 2 includes among those persons subject to military law the personnel of our own military establishment. But this, as Article 12 provides, does not exclude from that class “any other person who by the law of war is subject to trial by military tribunals” and who under Article 12 may be tried by court martial or under Article 15 by military commission.

Similarly the Espionage Act of 1917, which authorizes trial in the district courts of certain offenses that tend to interfere with the prosecution of war, provides that nothing contained in the act “shall be deemed to limit the jurisdiction of the general courts-martial, military commissions, or naval courts-martial.” 50 U.S.C. § 38.

From the very beginning of its history this Court has recognized and applied the law of war as including that part of the law of nations which prescribes, for the conduct of war, the status, rights and duties of enemy nations as well as of enemy individuals. By the Articles of War, and especially Article 15, Congress has explicitly provided, so far as it may constitutionally do so, that military tribunals shall have jurisdiction to try offenders or offenses against the law of war in appropriate cases. Congress, in addition to making rules for the government of our Armed Forces, has thus exercised its authority to define and punish offenses against the law of nations by sanctioning, within constitutional limitations, the jurisdiction of military commissions to try persons for offenses which, according to the rules and precepts of the law of nations, and more particularly the law of war, are cognizable by such tribunals. And the President, as Commander in Chief, by his Proclamation in time of war his invoked that law. By his Order creating the present Commission he has undertaken to exercise the authority conferred upon him by Congress, and also such authority as the Constitution itself gives the Commander in Chief, to direct the performance of those functions which may constitutionally be performed by the military arm of the nation in time of war.
By universal agreement and practice the law of war draws a distinction between the armed forces and the peaceful populations of belligerent nations and also between those who are lawful and unlawful combatants. Lawful combatants are subject to capture and detention as prisoners of war by opposing military forces. Unlawful combatants are likewise subject to capture and detention, but in addition they are subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals for acts which render their belligerency unlawful. The spy who secretly and without uniform passes the military lines of a belligerent in time of war, seeking to gather military information and communicate it to the enemy, or an enemy combatant who without uniform comes secretly through the lines for the purpose of waging war by destruction of life or property, are familiar examples of belligerents who are generally deemed not to be entitled to the status of prisoners of war, but to be offenders against the law of war subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals. See Winthrop, Military Law, 2d Ed., pp. 1196-1197, 1219-1221; Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, approved by the President, General Order No. 100, April 24, 1863, sections IV and V.

The Court’s opinion in Ex parte Quirin upheld the President’s use of military commissions for enemy combatants where Congress had authorized such tribunals. In contrast, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, decided in 2006, the Court decided that the initial set of procedures adopted by the Bush Administration to try detainees at Guantanamo Bay, like Hamdan, were not expressly authorized by any congressional act. Absent congressional authorization, the procedures were held to violate existing statutory and treaty requirements: the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions was held to apply because it regulates any “conflict not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties.” The Court concluded that because acts by terrorists are not acts between “nations,” they are conflicts “not of an international character” as that phrase is used in the Geneva Conventions.

As Justice Kennedy pointed out in his concurrence, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, Congress required in the UCMJ, and Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions requires, that military commissions be “regularly established.” Such commissions are not so established, he said, unless any differences between their structure and procedures and those used by courts-martial are required by practical reasons which the government must be prepared to explain. Justice Kennedy supported this legal requirement in part by noting that the UCMJ provides that all rules and regulations made under the Act “shall be uniform so far as practicable.” Justice Kennedy supported this interpretation by reasoning that the separation of powers would be violated unless the commissions were more independent of the executive than was true in their present structure, which collected many functions (setting up commissions; determining how many judges will sit, with a minimum of 3, but not 5 as is typical for court-martial proceedings; selecting the presiding officer; and exercising supervisory power during the trial) in a single executive officer, the “Appointing Authority,” and created special review procedures rather than using review procedures created by Congress. Further, the procedures ordered to be used in the military commissions, such as admitting all evidence “having probative value to a reasonable person,” deviated from rules provided in the UCMJ, without the government having made a demonstration of practical need for the special rules either in this case or generally.

Justice Breyer wrote a concurring opinion, joined by Justices Kennedy, Souter, and Ginsburg. That concurrence underscored that while Congress had not given the President a “blank check” to create military tribunal procedures on his own, nothing prevents the President from going to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary to create military commissions of the kind he thinks necessary. As noted at § 11.3.3 nn.18-20, such later statutory action would trump any contrary provisions in the UCMJ or Geneva Conventions, since whichever is past last controls.

The three dissents in Hamdan are consistent with the conservative predisposition in separation of powers cases to favor broader grants of executive power, as noted at § 9.1.1 n.14. One conservative dissent by Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia and joined in part by Justice Alito, would have granted greater deference to the President’s judgment that his actions were authorized by Congress, did comply with the UCMJ, and did satisfy the Geneva Conventions. In part of his dissent, joined by Justice Scalia, Justice Thomas concluded that Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions did not apply, in part because the Court should defer to the President’s view that since the war on terrorism was of “international scope” it was a conflict “of an international character” for purposes of the Geneva Conventions.

In a separate dissent, Justice Alito noted that even if Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applied, it imposes only three requirements: sentences may be imposed only by (1) a “court,” (2) that is “regularly constituted,” and (3) that affords “all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples.” Relying on Webster’s Dictionary, Justice Alito said that “regularly constituted” means properly appointed, set up, or established. Whether that is so should be determined by the domestic law of the appointing country, and under United States law there is no basis for the majority’s conclusion that a military court cannot be regarded as “regularly established” unless a practical need explains why it deviates from conventional court-martial standards. Nor does Article 3 require that trials be held in military courts or courts similar in structure and composition, as its drafters certainly could, but did not, use language to express that thought more directly. Further, the commentary on Article 3 says that it is only “summary justice” which it is intended to prohibit. The commissions created by the President met this standard, concluded Justice Alito, and there is no basis for the Court to strike down the commissions because their rules can be changed from time to time by the Secretary of Defense.

As a preliminary matter, the Court held that it had jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the denial of a petition for habeas corpus by an alien detained at Guantanamo Bay, despite a recently enacted statute purporting to deprive federal courts of jurisdiction over habeas corpus applications filed by such persons. The Court held that the statute, properly interpreted, did not apply to actions, such as this one, which were pending when the statute was enacted.29 This conclusion is consistent with the Court’s predisposition, discussed at § 2.1.1 n.2, to read limitations on the Court’s jurisdiction narrowly. In his dissent, Justice Scalia, joined by Justices Thomas and Alito, concluded that the statutory exception was clear, and that the Court should not have heard the case at all.30 Chief Justice Roberts did not participate in Hamdan, having been part of the court of appeals panel that had heard the case, prior to his nomination and confirmation as Chief Justice. Justice Roberts’ views on that panel tracked the dissenting Justices in Hamdan.31

Given the Supreme Court’s precedents in Dames & Moore through Hamdan, it is unlikely that any future President would attempt to try “enemy combatants” without congressional authorization. While President Lincoln did unilaterally suspend the writ of habeas corpus at the beginning of the Civil War, a district court held that suspension unlawful in Ex parte Merryman32 concluding that suspension is for Congress, not the President. This view is supported by the placement of the clause authorizing suspension of habeas corpus in Article I, rather than Article II.

Similarly, unilateral action by President Bush prior to 2007 to evade procedures regarding warrantless wiretaps in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 raised serious constitutional concerns.33 Subsequent to the November 2006 elections, Congress did authorize warrantless wiretapping for national security reasons along the lines of existing executive practice by passing a bill in August, 2007, which President Bush signed, amending the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). Such congressional action removes the separation of powers challenge to the practice of warrantless wiretapping. A further version of a warrantless wire-tapping law, giving telecommunications companies immunity for following presidential directives issued before Congress acted, and thus acted possibly unlawfully, was passed by Congress and signed into law by President Bush in July, 2008. This law was upheld as constitutional in In re National Security Agency Telecommunications Records Litigation.34 Of course, even with congressional approval,

\section*{\S~12.4 ~Military Detention Issues and Related Matters}

\subsection{Detention for United States Citizens}

A few cases have come before the Supreme Court since 2001 concerning the due process rights of persons detained outside the regular criminal justice system, such as alleged terrorists captured after September 11, 2001 as part of the “war on terror,” or enemy combatants held as a result of other military action. In these cases, the Court has reached decisions on narrow grounds, not providing detailed guidance. However, certain principles seem reasonably clear. To the extent alleged terrorists or enemy combatants, whether United States citizens or aliens, are granted rights similar to military personnel in court-martial proceedings under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, due process concerns would easily be met.\footnote{See generally Major Jan E. Aldykiewicz & Major Geoffrey S. Corn, \textit{Authority to Court-Martial Non-U.S. Military Personnel for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed During Internal Armed Conflicts}, 167 Mil. L. Rev. 74 (2001).} Similarly, to the extent such individuals were treated as captured prisoners of war under the Geneva Conventions, due process would be met.\footnote{See Brett Shumate, \textit{New Rules for a New War: The Applicability of the Geneva Conventions to Al-Qaeda and Taliban Detainees Captured in Afghanistan}, 18 N.Y. Int'l L. Rev. 1 (2005).}

In \textit{Hamdi v. Rumsfeld},\footnote{542 U.S. 507, 509, 531 (2004) (plurality opinion of O’Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Kennedy & Breyer, JJ).} excerpted below, a plurality of Justice O’Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices Kennedy and Breyer, concluded that “although Congress authorized the detention of combatants in the narrow circumstances alleged here, due process demands that a citizen held in the United States as an enemy combatant be given a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decisionmaker.” Four Justices in \textit{Hamdi} disagreed with the plurality’s conclusion that Congress had authorized the military detention of citizens as enemy combatants through the “Force Resolution” passed after September 11, 2001. Justice Scalia read the Habeas Corpus Clause, Article I, § 9, cl. 2, to give the Congress no independent power to authorize military detentions of citizens absent suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus, a position joined by Justice Stevens.\footnote{Id. at 554 (Scalia, J., joined by Stevens, J., dissenting).} Adopting a less extreme position, Justices Souter and Ginsburg required a clear statement from Congress to authorize such detentions, which they said did not exist in this case. Justice Thomas agreed in Hamdi with the plurality that Congress had authorized military detention in these circumstances, providing a fifth vote for this conclusion. Reflecting the conservative predisposition to defer to the President, he would not have the Court impose any due process limitations on such military confinement. Justice Thomas noted, “Arguably, Congress could provide for additional procedural protections, but until it does, we have no right to insist upon them.” Following the Hamdi case, the government choose to release Mr. Hamdi, rather than prosecute him. His release was based on an agreement that he would give up his United States citizenship, relocate in another country, Saudi Arabia, and consent not to travel to an extensive list of countries, including Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq or Syria, where he could be presumably be recruited for terrorist activity.

Hamdi v. Rumsfeld

Justice O’CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice KENNEDY, and Justice BREYER, joined.

At this difficult time in our Nation's history, we are called upon to consider the legality of the Government's detention of a United States citizen on United States soil as an "enemy combatant" and to address the process that is constitutionally owed to one who seeks to challenge his classification as such. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held that petitioner's detention was legally authorized and that he was entitled to no further opportunity to challenge his enemy-combatant label. We now vacate and remand. We hold that although Congress authorized the detention of combatants in the narrow circumstances alleged here, due process demands that a citizen held in the United States as an enemy combatant be given a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decisionmaker.

On September 11, 2001, the al Qaeda terrorist network used hijacked commercial airliners to attack prominent targets in the United States. Approximately 3,000 people were killed in those attacks. One week later, in response to these "acts of treacherous violence," Congress passed a resolution authorizing the President to "use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks" or "harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." Authorization for Use of Military Force ("the AUMF"), 115 Stat 224. Soon thereafter, the President ordered United States Armed Forces to Afghanistan, with a mission to subdue al Qaeda and quell the Taliban regime that was known to support it.

This case arises out of the detention of a man whom the Government alleges took up arms with the Taliban during this conflict. His name is Yaser Esam Hamdi. Born an American citizen in Louisiana in 1980, Hamdi moved with his family to Saudi Arabia as a child. By 2001, the parties agree, he resided in Afghanistan. At some point that year, he was seized by members of the Northern Alliance, a coalition of military groups opposed to the Taliban government, and eventually was turned over to the United States military. The Government asserts that it initially detained and interrogated Hamdi in Afghanistan before transferring him to the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay in January 2002. In April 2002, upon learning that Hamdi is an American citizen, authorities transferred him to a naval brig in Norfolk, Virginia, where he remained until a recent transfer to a brig in Charleston, South Carolina. The Government contends that Hamdi is an "enemy combatant," and that this status justifies holding him in the United States indefinitely – without formal charges or proceedings – unless and until it makes the determination that access to counsel or further process is warranted.

In June 2002, Hamdi's father, Esam Fouad Hamdi, filed the present petition for a writ of habeas corpus under 28 U.S.C § 2241 in the Eastern District of Virginia, naming as petitioners his son and himself as next friend.

The threshold question before us is whether the Executive has the authority to detain citizens who qualify as "enemy combatants." There is some debate as to the proper scope of this term, and the Government has never provided any court with the full criteria that it uses in classifying individuals as such. It has made clear, however, that, for purposes of this case, the "enemy combatant" that it is seeking to detain is an individual who, it alleges, was "part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners" in Afghanistan and who "engaged in an armed conflict against the United States" there. Brief for Respondents 3. We therefore answer only the narrow question before us: whether the detention of citizens falling within that definition is authorized.

The Government maintains that no explicit congressional authorization is required, because the Executive possesses plenary authority to detain pursuant to Article II of the Constitution. We do not reach the question whether Article II provides such authority, however, because we agree with the Government's alternative position, that Congress has in fact authorized Hamdi's detention, through the AUMF.

Our analysis on that point, set forth below, substantially overlaps with our analysis of Hamdi's principal argument for the illegality of his detention. He posits that his detention is forbidden by 18 U.S.C. § 4001(a). Section 4001(a) states that "[n]o citizen shall be imprisoned or otherwise detained by the United States except pursuant to an Act of Congress." Congress passed § 4001(a) in 1971 as part of a bill to repeal the Emergency Detention Act of 1950, 50 U.S.C. § 811 et seq., which provided procedures for executive detention, during times of emergency, of individuals deemed likely to engage in espionage or sabotage. Congress was particularly concerned about the possibility that the Act could be used to reprise the Japanese internment camps of World War II. H.R. Rep. No.
The Government again presses two alternative positions. First, it argues that § 4001(a), in light of its legislative history and its location in Title 18, applies only to "the control of civilian prisons and related detentions," not to military detentions. Brief for Respondents 21. Second, it maintains that § 4001(a) is satisfied, because Hamdi is being detained "pursuant to an Act of Congress" – the AUMF. Id., at 21-22. Again, because we conclude that the Government's second assertion is correct, we do not address the first. In other words, for the reasons that follow, we conclude that the AUMF is explicit congressional authorization for the detention of individuals in the narrow category we describe (assuming, without deciding, that such authorization is required), and that the AUMF satisfied § 4001(a)'s requirement that a detention be "pursuant to an Act of Congress" (assuming, without deciding, that § 4001(a) applies to military detentions).

The AUMF authorizes the President to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against "nations, organizations, or persons" associated with the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. 115 Stat 224. There can be no doubt that individuals who fought against the United States in Afghanistan as part of the Taliban, an organization known to have supported the al Qaeda terrorist network responsible for those attacks, are individuals Congress sought to target in passing the AUMF. We conclude that detention of individuals falling into the limited category we are considering, for the duration of the particular conflict in which they were captured, is so fundamental and accepted an incident to war as to be an exercise of the "necessary and appropriate force" Congress has authorized the President to use.

The capture and detention of lawful combatants and the capture, detention, and trial of unlawful combatants, by "universal agreement and practice," are "important incident[s] of war." Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S., at 28. The purpose of detention is to prevent captured individuals from returning to the field of battle and taking up arms once again. Naqvi, Doubtful Prisoner-of-War Status, 84 Int'l Rev. Red Cross 571, 572 (2002) ("[C]aptivity in war is 'neither revenge, nor punishment, but solely protective custody, the only purpose of which is to prevent the prisoners of war from further participation in the war'" (quoting decision of Nuremberg Military Tribunal, reprinted in 41 Am. J. Int'l L. 172, 229 (1947)); W. Winthrop, Military Law and Precedents 788 (rev. 2d ed. 1920) ("The time has long passed when 'no quarter' was the rule on the battlefield . . . . It is now recognized that 'Captivity is neither a punishment nor an act of vengeance,' but 'merely a temporary detention which is devoid of all penal character.' . . . 'A prisoner of war is no convict; his imprisonment is a simple war measure.'" (citations omitted); cf. In re Territo, 156 F.2d 142, 145 (CA9 1946) ("The object of capture is to prevent the captured individual from serving the enemy. He is disarmed and from then on must be removed as completely as practicable from the front, treated humanely, and in time exchanged, repatriated, or otherwise released" (footnotes omitted)).

There is no bar to this Nation's holding one of its own citizens as an enemy combatant. In Quirin, one of the detainees, Haupt, alleged that he was a naturalized United States citizen. 317 U.S., at 20. We held that "[c]itizens who associate themselves with the military arm of the enemy government, and with its aid, guidance and direction enter this country bent on hostile acts, are enemy belligerents within the meaning of . . . the law of war." Id., at 37-38. While Haupt was tried for violations of the law of war, nothing in Quirin suggests that his citizenship would have precluded his mere detention for the duration of the relevant hostilities. See id., at 30-31. See also Lieber Code, P 153, Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, Gen. Order No. 100 (1863), reprinted in 2 Lieber, Miscellaneous Writings, p 273 (contemplating, in code binding the Union Army during the Civil War, that "captured rebels" would be treated "as prisoners of war"). Nor can we see any reason for drawing such a line here. A citizen, no less than an alien, can be "part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners" and "engaged in an armed conflict against the United States," Brief for Respondents 3; such a citizen, if released, would pose the same threat of returning to the front during the ongoing conflict.

In light of these principles, it is of no moment that the AUMF does not use specific language of detention. Because detention to prevent a combatant's return to the battlefield is a fundamental incident of waging war, in permitting the use of "necessary and appropriate force," Congress has clearly and unmistakably authorized detention in the narrow circumstances considered here.

Hamdi objects, nevertheless, that Congress has not authorized the indefinite detention to which he is now subject. The Government responds that "the detention of enemy combatants during World War II was just as 'indefinite' while that war was being fought." Id., at 16. We take Hamdi's objection to be not to the lack of certainty regarding the date on which the conflict will end, but to the substantial prospect of perpetual detention. We recognize that the national security underpinnings of the "war on terror," although crucially important, are broad and malleable. As the Government concedes, "given its unconventional nature, the current conflict is unlikely to end with a formal cease-fire agreement." Ibid. The prospect Hamdi raises is therefore not far-fetched. If the Government does not consider this unconventional war won for two generations, and if it maintains during that time that Hamdi might, if released, rejoin forces fighting against the United States, then the position it has taken throughout the litigation of this case suggests that Hamdi's detention could last for the rest of his life.

It is a clearly established principle of the law of war that detention may last no longer than active hostilities. See Article 118 of the Geneva Convention (III) Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, Aug. 12, 1949, [1955] 6 U. S. T. 3316, 3406, T. I. A. S. No. 3364 ("Prisoners of war shall be released and repatriated without delay after the cessation of active hostilities"). See also Article 20 of the Hague Convention (II) on Laws and Customs of War on Land, July 29, 1899, 32 Stat 1817 (as soon as possible after "conclusion of peace"); Hague Convention (IV), supra, Oct. 18, 1907, 36 Stat 2301 ("conclusion of peace" (Art. 20)); Geneva Convention, supra, July 27, 1929, 47 Stat 2055 (repatriation should be accomplished with the least possible delay after conclusion of peace (Art. 75)); Praust, Judicial Power to Determine the Status and Rights of Persons Detained without Trial, 44 Harv. Int'l L. J. 503, 510-511 (2003) (prisoners of war "can be detained during an armed conflict, but the detaining country must release and repatriate them 'without delay after the cessation of active hostilities,' unless they are being lawfully prosecuted or have been lawfully convicted of crimes and are serving sentences" (citing Arts. 118, 85, 99, 119, 129, Geneva Convention (III), 6 T. I. A. S., at 3384, 3392, 3406, 3418)).
Hamdi contends that the AUMF does not authorize indefinite or perpetual detention. Certainly, we agree that indefinite detention for the purpose of interrogation is not authorized. Further, we understand Congress' grant of authority for the use of "necessary and appropriate force" to include the authority to detain for the duration of the relevant conflict, and our understanding is based on longstanding law-of-war principles. If the practical circumstances of a given conflict are entirely unlike those of the conflicts that informed the development of the law of war, that understanding may unravel. But that is not the situation we face as of this date. Active combat operations against Taliban fighters apparently are ongoing in Afghanistan. See, e.g., Constable, U.S. Launches New Operation in Afghanistan, Washington Post, Mar. 14, 2004, p A22 (reporting that 13,500 United States troops remain in Afghanistan, including several thousand new arrivals); J. Abizaid, Dept. of Defense, Gen. Abizaid Central Command Operations Update Briefing, Apr. 30, 2004, http://www.defenselink.mil/transcripts/2004/tr20040430-1402.html (as visited June 8, 2004, and available in the Clerk of Court's case file) (media briefing describing ongoing operations in Afghanistan involving 20,000 United States troops). The United States may detain, for the duration of these hostilities, individuals legitimately determined to be Taliban combatants who "engaged in an armed conflict against the United States." If the record establishes that United States troops are still involved in active combat in Afghanistan, those detentions are part of the exercise of "necessary and appropriate force," and therefore are authorized by the AUMF.

Even in cases in which the detention of enemy combatants is legally authorized, there remains the question of what process is constitutionally due to a citizen who disputes his enemy-combatant status. Hamdi argues that he is owed a meaningful and timely hearing and that "extra-judicial detention [that] begins and ends with the submission of an affidavit based on third-hand hearsay" does not comport with the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Brief for Petitioners 16. The Government counters that any more process than was provided below would be both unworkable and "constitutionally intolerable." Brief for Respondents 46. Our resolution of this dispute requires a careful examination both of the writ of habeas corpus, which Hamdi now seeks to employ as a mechanism of judicial review, and of the Due Process Clause, which informs the procedural contours of that mechanism in this instance.

Though they reach radically different conclusions on the process that ought to attend the present proceeding, the parties begin on common ground. All agree that, absent suspension, the writ of habeas corpus remains available to every individual detained within the United States. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 9, cl. 2 ("The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it"). Only in the rarest of circumstances has Congress seen fit to suspend the writ. See, e.g., Act of Mar. 3, 1863, ch. 81, § 1, 12 Stat. 755; Act of April 20, 1871, ch 22, § 4, 17 Stat 14. At all other times, it has remained a critical check on the Executive, ensuring that it does not detain individuals except in accordance with law. See INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 301 (2001). All agree suspension of the writ has not occurred here. Thus, it is undisputed that Hamdi was properly before an Article III court to challenge his detention under 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Brief for Respondents 12. Further, all agree that § 2241 and its companion provisions provide at least a skeletal outline of the procedures to be afforded a petitioner in federal habeas review. Most notably, § 2243 provides that "the person detained may, under oath, deny any of the facts set forth in the return or allege any other material facts," and § 2246 allows the taking of evidence in habeas proceedings by deposition, affidavit, or interrogatories.

The simple outline of § 2241 makes clear both that Congress envisioned that habeas petitioners would have some opportunity to present and rebut facts and that courts in cases like this retain some ability to vary the ways in which they do so as mandated by due process.

The Government's second argument requires closer consideration. This is the argument that further factual exploration is unwarranted and inappropriate in light of the extraordinary constitutional interests at stake. Under the Government's most extreme rendition of this argument, "[r]espect for separation of powers and the limited institutional capabilities of courts in matters of military decision-making in connection with an ongoing conflict" ought to eliminate entirely any individual process, restricting the courts to investigating only whether legal authorization exists for the broader detention scheme. Brief for Respondents 26. At most, the Government argues, courts should review its determination that a citizen is an enemy combatant under a very deferential "some evidence" standard. Id., at 34 ("Under the some evidence standard, the focus is exclusively on the factual basis supplied by the Executive to support its own determination" (citing Superintendent, Mass. Correctional Institution at Walpole v. Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 455-457 (1985) (explaining that the some evidence standard "does not require" a "weighing of the evidence," but rather calls for assessing "whether there is any evidence in the record that could support the conclusion"). Under this review, a court would assume the accuracy of the Government's articulated basis for Hamdi's detention, as set forth in the Mobbs Declaration, and assess only whether that articulated basis was a legitimate one. Brief for Respondents 36; see also 316 F.3d at 473-474 (declining to address whether the "some evidence" standard should govern the adjudication of such claims, but noting that "[t]he factual averments in the [Mobbs] affidavit, if accurate, are sufficient to confirm" the legality of Hamdi's detention).

In response, Hamdi emphasizes that this Court consistently has recognized that an individual challenging his detention may not be held at the will of the Executive without recourse to some proceeding before a neutral tribunal to determine whether the Executive's asserted justifications for that detention have basis in fact and warrant in law. See, e.g., Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 69 (2001); Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 425-427 (1979). He argues that the Fourth Circuit inappropriately "ceded power to the Executive during wartime to define the conduct for which a citizen may be detained, judge whether that citizen has engaged in the proscribed conduct, and imprison that citizen indefinitely," Brief for Petitioners 21, and that due process demands that he receive a hearing in which he may challenge the Mobbs Declaration and adduce his own counter evidence. The District Court, agreeing with Hamdi, apparently believed that the appropriate process would approach the process that accompanies a criminal trial. It therefore disapproved of the hearsay nature of the Mobbs Declaration and anticipated quite extensive discovery of various military affairs. Anything less, it concluded, would not be "meaningful judicial review." App. 291.

Both of these positions highlight legitimate concerns. And both emphasize the tension that often exists between the autonomy that the Government asserts is necessary in order to pursue effectively a particular goal and the process that a citizen contends he is due before he is deprived of a constitutional right. The ordinary mechanism that we use for balancing such serious competing interests, and for determining the procedures that are necessary to ensure that a citizen is not "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," U.S. Const., Amdt. 5, is the test that we articulated in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976). Mathews dictates that the process due in any given instance is determined by weighing "the private interest that will be affected by the official action" against the Government's asserted interest, "including the function involved" and the burdens the Government would face in providing greater process. 424 U.S., at 335. The Mathews calculus then contemplates a judicious balancing of these concerns, through an analysis of "the risk of an erroneous deprivation" of the private interest if the process were reduced and the "probable value, if any, of additional or substitute safeguards." Ibid. We take each of these steps in turn.

It is beyond question that substantial interests lie on both sides of the scale in this case. Hamdi's "private interest . . . affected by the official action," ibid., is the most elemental of liberty interests – the interest in being free from physical detention by one's own government. Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 80 (1992) ("Freedom from bodily restraint has always been at the core of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause from arbitrary governmental action")

On the other side of the scale are the weighty and sensitive governmental interests in ensuring that those who have in fact fought with the enemy during a war do not return to battle against the United States. As discussed above, the law of war and the realities of combat may render such detentions both necessary and appropriate, and our due process analysis need not blink at those realities. Without doubt, our Constitution recognizes that core strategic matters of warmaking belong in the hands of those who are best positioned and most politically accountable for making them. Dep't of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 530 (1988) (noting the reluctance of the courts "to intrude upon the authority of the Executive in military and national security affairs"); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587 (1952) (acknowledging "broad powers in military commanders engaged in day-to-day fighting in a theater of war").

The Government also argues at some length that its interests in reducing the process available to alleged enemy combatants are heightened by the practical difficulties that would accompany a system of trial-like process. In its view, military officers who are engaged in the serious work of waging battle would be unnecessarily and dangerously distracted by litigation half a world away, and discovery into military operations would both intrude on the sensitive secrets of national defense and result in a futile search for evidence buried under the rubble of war. Brief for Respondents 46-49. To the extent that these burdens are triggered by heightened procedures, they are properly taken into account in our due process analysis.

Striking the proper constitutional balance here is of great importance to the Nation during this period of ongoing combat. But it is equally vital that our calculus not give short shrift to the values that this country holds dear or to the privilege that is American citizenship. It is during our most challenging and uncertain moments that our Nation's commitment to due process is most severely tested; and it is in those times that we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad. See Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 164-165 (1963) ("The imperative necessity for safeguarding these rights to procedural due process under the gravest of emergencies has existed throughout our constitutional history, for it is then, under the pressing exigencies of crisis, that there is the greatest temptation to dispense with guarantees which, it is feared, will inhibit government action"); see also United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 264 (1967) ("It would indeed be ironic if, in the name of national defense, we would sanction the subversion of one of those liberties . . . which makes the defense of the Nation worthwhile").

With due recognition of these competing concerns, we believe that neither the process proposed by the Government nor the process apparently envisioned by the District Court below strikes the proper constitutional balance when a United States citizen is detained in the United States as an enemy combatant. That is, "the risk of erroneous deprivation" of a detainee's liberty interest is unacceptably high under the Government's proposed rule, while some of the "additional or substitute procedural safeguards" suggested by the District Court are unwarranted in light of their limited "probable value" and the burdens they may impose on the military in such cases. Mathews, 424 U.S., at 335.

We therefore hold that a citizen-detainee seeking to challenge his classification as an enemy combatant must receive notice of the factual basis for his classification, and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government's factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker. See Cleveland Bd. of Ed. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 542 (1985) ("An essential principle of due process is that a deprivation of life, liberty, or property 'be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case'") (quoting Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 313 (1950)); Concrete Pipe & Products of Cal., Inc. v. Construction Laborers Pension Trust for Southern Cal., 508 U.S. 602, 617 (1993) ("due process requires a 'neutral and detached judge in the first instance'" (quoting Ward v. Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57, 61-62 (1972)). "For more than a century the central meaning of procedural due process has been clear: 'Parties whose rights are to be affected are entitled to be heard; and in order that they may enjoy that right they must first be notified.' It is equally fundamental that the right to notice and an opportunity to be heard 'must be granted at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner.'" Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67, 80 (1972) (quoting Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U.S. 223 (1864); Armstrong v. Manzo, 380 U.S. 545, 552 (1965) (other citations omitted)). These essential constitutional promises may not be eroded.

At the same time, the exigencies of the circumstances may demand that, aside from these core elements, enemy combatant proceedings may be tailored to alleviate their uncommon potential to burden the Executive at a time of ongoing military conflict. Hearsay, for example, may need to be accepted as the most reliable available evidence from the Government in such a proceeding. Likewise, the Constitution would not be offended by a presumption in favor of the Government's evidence, so long as that presumption remained a rebuttable one and fair opportunity for rebuttal were provided. Thus, once the Government puts forth credible evidence that the habeas petitioner meets the enemy-combatant criteria, the onus could shift to the petitioner to rebut that evidence with more persuasive evidence that he falls outside the criteria. A burden-shifting scheme of this sort would meet the goal of ensuring that the errant tourist, embedded journalist, or local aid worker has a chance to prove military error while giving due regard to the Executive once it has put forth meaningful support for its conclusion that the detainee is in fact an enemy combatant. In the words of Mathews, process of this sort would sufficiently address the "risk of erroneous deprivation" of a detainee's liberty interest while eliminating certain procedures that have questionable additional value in light of the burden on the Government. 424 U.S., at 335. [FN 2: Because we hold that Hamdi is constitutionally entitled to the process described above, we need not address at this time whether any treaty guarantees him similar access to a tribunal for a determination of his status.]

We think it unlikely that this basic process will have the dire impact on the central functions of warmaking that the Government forecasts. The parties agree that initial captures on the battlefield need not receive the process we have discussed here; that process is due only when the determination is made to continue to hold those who have been seized.

In sum, while the full protections that accompany challenges to detentions in other settings may prove unworkable and inappropriate in the enemy-combatant setting, the threats to military operations posed by a basic system of independent review are not so weighty as to trump a citizen's core rights to challenge meaningfully the Government's case and to be heard by an impartial adjudicator.

The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

Justice SOUTER, with whom Justice GINSBURG joins, concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in the judgment.

The plurality . . . accept[s] the Government's position that if Hamdi's designation as an enemy combatant is correct, his detention (at least as to some period) is authorized by an Act of Congress as required by § 4001(a), that is, by the Authorization for Use of Military Force, 115 Stat. 224 (hereinafter Force Resolution). Here, I disagree and respectfully dissent. The Government has failed to demonstrate that the Force Resolution authorizes the detention complained of here even on the facts the Government claims. If the Government raises nothing further than the record now shows, the Non-Detention Act entitles Hamdi to be released.

The threshold issue is how broadly or narrowly to read the Non-Detention Act, the tone of which is severe: No citizen shall be imprisoned or otherwise detained by the United States except pursuant to an Act of Congress.” 18 U.S.C. § 4001(a). Should the severity of the Act be relaxed when the Government's stated factual justification for incommunicado detention is a war on terrorism, so that the Government may be said to act “pursuant” to congressional terms that fall short of explicit authority to imprison individuals? With one possible though important qualification [stated later in the concurrence of “acting in accordance with customary law of war”], the answer has to be no. For a number of reasons, the prohibition within § 4001(a) has to be read broadly to accord the statute a long reach and to impose a burden of justification on the Government.

Congress's understanding of the need for clear authority before citizens are kept detained is itself therefore clear, and § 4001(a) must be read to have teeth in its demand for congressional authorization.
Next, there is the Government's claim, accepted by the plurality, that the terms of the Force Resolution are adequate to authorize detention of an enemy combatant under the circumstances described, a claim the Government fails to support sufficiently to satisfy § 4001(a) as read to require a clear statement of authority to detain. Since the Force Resolution was adopted one week after the attacks of September 11, 2001, it naturally speaks with some generality, but its focus is clear, and that is on the use of military power. It is fairly read to authorize the use of armies and weapons, whether against other armies or individual terrorists. But, like the statute discussed in Endo [323 U.S. 283 (1944)], it never so much as uses the word detention, and there is no reason to think Congress might have perceived any need to augment Executive power to deal with dangerous citizens within the United States, given the well-stocked statutory arsenal of defined criminal offenses covering the gamut of actions that a citizen sympathetic to terrorists might commit. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 2339A (material support for various terrorist acts); § 2339B (material support to a foreign terrorist organization); § 2332a (use of a weapon of mass destruction, including conspiracy and attempt); § 2332b(a)(1) (acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries,” including threats, conspiracy, and attempt); § 2339C (2000 ed., Supp. II) (financing of certain terrorist acts); see also 18 U.S.C. § 3142(e) (pretrial detention). See generally Brief for Janet Reno et al. as Amici Curiae in Rumsfeld v. Padilla, O.T.2003, No. 03-1027, pp. 14-19, and n.17 (listing the tools available to the Executive to fight terrorism even without the power the Government claims here); Brief for Louis Henkin et al. as Amici Curiae in Rumsfeld v. Padilla, O.T.2003, No. 03-1027, p. 23, n.27.

Because I find Hamdi's detention forbidden by § 4001(a) and unauthorized by the Force Resolution, I would not reach any questions of what process he may be due in litigating disputed issues in a proceeding under the habeas statute or prior to the habeas enquiry itself. For me, it suffices that the Government has failed to justify holding him in the absence of a further Act of Congress, criminal charges, a showing that the detention conforms to the laws of war, or a demonstration that § 4001(a) is unconstitutional. I would therefore vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remand for proceedings consistent with this view.

Since this disposition does not command a majority of the Court, however, the need to give practical effect to the conclusions of eight members of the Court rejecting the Government's position calls for me to join with the plurality in ordering remand on terms closest to those I would impose. See Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 134 (1945) (Rutledge, J., concurring in result). Although I think litigation of Hamdi's status as an enemy combatant is unnecessary, the terms of the plurality's remand will allow Hamdi to offer evidence that he is not an enemy combatant, and he should at the least have the benefit of that opportunity.

It should go without saying that in joining with the plurality to produce a judgment, I do not adopt the plurality's resolution of constitutional issues that I would not reach. It is not that I could disagree with the plurality's determinations (given the plurality's view of the Force Resolution) that someone in Hamdi's position is entitled at a minimum to notice of the Government's claimed factual basis for holding him, and to a fair chance to rebut it before a neutral decision maker; nor, of course, could I disagree with the plurality's affirmation of Hamdi's right to counsel. On the other hand, I do not mean to imply agreement that the Government could claim an evidentiary presumption casting the burden of rebuttal on Hamdi, or that an opportunity to litigate before a military tribunal might obviate or truncate enquiry by a court on habeas.

Subject to these qualifications, I join with the plurality in a judgment of the Court vacating the Fourth Circuit's judgment and remanding the case.

Justice SCALIA, with whom Justice STEVENS joins, dissenting.

Hamdi is entitled to a habeas decree requiring his release unless (1) criminal proceedings are promptly brought, or (2) Congress has suspended the writ of habeas corpus. A suspension of the writ could, of course, lay down conditions for continued detention, similar to those that today's opinion prescribes under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Act of Mar. 3, 1863, 12 Stat. 755. But there is a world of difference between the people's representatives' determining the need for that suspension (and prescribing the conditions for it), and this Court's doing so.

The plurality finds justification for Hamdi's imprisonment in the Authorization for Use of Military Force, 115 Stat. 224, which provides:

"That the President is authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." § 2(a).

This is not remotely a congressional suspension of the writ, and no one claims that it is. Contrary to the plurality's view, I do not think this statute even authorizes detention of a citizen with the clarity necessary to satisfy the interpretive canon that statutes should be construed so as to avoid grave constitutional concerns.

The Founders well understood the difficult tradeoff between safety and freedom. "Safety from external danger," Hamilton declared, "is the most powerful director of national conduct. Even the ardent love of liberty will, after a time, give way to its dictates. The violent destruction of life and property incident to war; the continual effort and alarm attendant on a state of continual danger, will compel nations the most attached to liberty, to resort for repose and security to institutions which have a tendency to destroy their civil and political rights. To be more safe, they, at length, become willing to run the risk of being less free." The Federalist No. 8, p. 33.

The Founders warned us about the risk, and equipped us with a Constitution designed to deal with it.

Many think it not only inevitable but entirely proper that liberty give way to security in times of national crisis — that, at the extremes of military exigency, inter arma silent leges. Whatever the general merits of the view that war silences law or modulates its voice, that view has no place in the interpretation and application of a Constitution designed precisely to confront war and, in a manner that accords with democratic principles, to accommodate it. Because the Court has proceeded to meet the current emergency in a manner the Constitution does not envision, I respectfully dissent.

Justice THOMAS, dissenting.

The Executive Branch, acting pursuant to the powers vested in the President by the Constitution and with explicit congressional approval, has determined that Yaser Hamdi is an enemy combatant and should be detained. This detention falls squarely within the Federal Government's war powers, and we lack the expertise and capacity to second-guess that decision. As such, petitioners' habeas challenge should fail, and there is no reason to remand the case. The plurality reaches a contrary conclusion by failing adequately to consider basic principles of the constitutional structure as it relates to national security and foreign affairs and by using the balancing scheme of Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976). I do not think that the Federal Government's war powers can be balanced away by this Court. Arguably, Congress could provide for additional procedural protections, but until it does, we have no right to insist upon them. But even if I were to agree with the general approach the plurality takes, I could not accept the particulars. The plurality utterly fails to account for the Government's compelling interests and for our own institutional inability to weigh competing concerns correctly. I respectfully dissent.

Congress, to be sure, has a substantial and essential role in both foreign affairs and national security. But it is crucial to recognize that judicial interference in these domains destroys the purpose of vesting primary responsibility in a unitary Executive. I cannot improve on Justice Jackson's words, speaking for the Court: "The President, both as Commander-in-Chief and as the Nation's organ for foreign affairs, has available intelligence services whose reports are not and ought not to be published to the world. It would be intolerable that courts, without the relevant information, should review and perhaps nullify actions of the Executive taken on information properly held secret. Nor can courts sit in camera in order to be taken into executive confidences. But even if courts could require full disclosure, the very nature of executive decisions as to foreign policy is political, not judicial. Such decisions are wholly confided by our Constitution to the political departments of the government, Executive and Legislative. They are delicate, complex, and involve large elements of prophecy. They are and should be undertaken only by those directly responsible to the people whose welfare they advance or imperil. They are decisions of a kind for which the Judiciary has neither aptitude, facilities nor responsibility and which has long been held to belong in the domain of political power not subject to judicial intrusion or inquiry." [Chicago & Southern Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111 (1948)].

Several points, made forcefully by Justice Jackson, are worth emphasizing. First, with respect to certain decisions relating to national security and foreign affairs, the courts simply lack the relevant information and expertise to second-guess determinations made by the President based on information properly withheld. Second, even if the courts could compel the Executive to produce the necessary information, such decisions are simply not amenable to judicial determination because "[t]hey are delicate, complex, and involve large elements of prophecy." Ibid. Third, the Court in Chicago & Southern Air Lines and elsewhere has correctly recognized the primacy of the political branches in the foreign-affairs and national-security contexts.

Undeniably, Hamdi has been deprived of a serious interest, one actually protected by the Due Process Clause. Against this, however, is the Government's overriding interest in protecting the Nation. If a deprivation of liberty can be justified by the need to protect a town, the protection of the Nation, a fortiori, justifies it.

I acknowledge that under the plurality's approach, it might, at times, be appropriate to give detainees access to counsel and notice of the factual basis for the Government's determination. But properly accounting for the Government's interests also requires concluding that access to counsel and to the factual basis would not always be warranted. Though common sense suffices, the Government thoroughly explains that counsel would often destroy the intelligence gathering function. See Brief for Respondents 42-43. See also App. 347-351 (affidavit of Col. D. Woolfolk). Equally obvious is the Government's interest in not fighting the war in its own courts, see, e.g., Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S., at 779, and protecting classified information, see, e.g., Dep't of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527 (1988) (President's "authority to classify and control access to information bearing on national security and to determine" who gets access "flows primarily from [the Commander-in-Chief Clause] and exists quite apart from any explicit congressional grant"); Agee, 453 U.S., at 307 (upholding revocation of former CIA employee's passport in large part by reference to the Government's need "to protect the secrecy of [its] foreign intelligence operations"). [FN 7: These observations cast still more doubt on the appropriateness and usefulness of Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), in this context. It is, for example, difficult to see how the plurality can insist that Hamdi unquestionably has the right to access to counsel in connection with the proceedings on remand, when new information could become available to the Government showing that such access would pose a grave risk to national security. In that event, would the Government need to hold a hearing before depriving Hamdi of his newly acquired right to counsel even if that hearing would itself pose a grave threat?]

2. Detention for an Alien Terrorist or Enemy Combatant

Following Hamdan and Hamdi, in October, 2006, Congress passed, and President Bush signed, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, setting out procedures to govern trial of alien unlawful enemy combatants. In the Act, enemy combatants were defined broadly as any individual determined by the President, or presidential designate, to have “purposefully and materially” supported anti-United States hostilities and is not part of a country’s regular armed forces – who are foreign nationals. The ad hoc nature of the existing process before this statute was passed had naturally caused due process problems. In the Act, Congress expanded the evidence that could be used at trial from traditional

See Haley A. Andrews, How Far is Too Far?: The Supreme Court’s Response to the Executive Attempt to Improvise Constitutional Procedures During the War on Terror, 36 Cumb. L. Rev. 123 (2005-2006); Randolph N. Jonakait, Rasul v. Bush: Unanswered Questions, 13 Wm. &
UCMJ procedures – both expanded hearsay evidence and evidence from coerced confessions, although not from torture, as long as the evidence meets a generic test of “probative value to a reasonable person.” The remaining procedures, which are reasonably close to the UCMJ and Geneva Conventions, particularly regarding the right of the accused to be present at trial and have access to information used to convict, likely satisfy due process concerns.

The provision which raised the greatest concern with constitutionality was the ban on any habeas corpus petition being filed by a detainee. As discussed at § 2.1.1 nn.1-2, prior cases have upheld Congress’ right to strip federal courts of habeas jurisdiction, but no prior statute had stripped federal court review of such a potentially large number of cases, a concern discussed at § 2.1.3 nn.7-10. In practice, foreign national unlawful enemy combatants could be indefinitely detained without any access to the judicial system for review of their status as enemy combatants. As discussed below at § 12.4.2 nn.44-52, while conservative formalist and Holmesian Justices deferred to the government in Boumediene v. Bush, a combination of natural law and liberal instrumentalist Justices caused the Court to strike down that part of the statute on structural separation of powers grounds. Of course, without regard to its constitutionality, one can question whether it is good policy, either from a domestic perspective, or in terms of standing in the world community, to remove the ancient writ of Habeas Corpus, which goes back to the Magna Carta in 1215, in this class of cases. A related issue that exists regards the right of public access, if any, to any tribunals which are ultimately created.43

In Boumediene v. Bush,44 the Court considered the due process and habeas rights of alien enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay. All parties agreed that Congress had not formally suspended the writ of habeas corpus in passing the Military Commissions Act. In that circumstance, a 5-4 Court held that aliens designated as enemy combatants and detained at Guantanamo Bay have the right of habeas corpus. Regarding habeas corpus for aliens detained in areas under United States control, Congress had passed the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (DTA). Section 1005(e) of that Act provided that “no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to . . . consider . . . an application for . . . habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained at Guantanamo.” The Act gave the D.C. Circuit “exclusive” jurisdiction to review decisions of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRT). Those Tribunals had been established by Congress to determine whether individuals detained at Guantanamo were “enemy combatants.” Under the Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA), the DTA removal of habeas jurisdiction was stated to apply to existing enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay, not merely those captured subsequent to the date of the Act.

43 See generally Jeffrey S. Koweek, Enemy Combatant Status Hearings: Predicting the Right of Access by the Press and the Public, 3 First Amendment L. Rev. 373 (2005).

In Boumediene, the Supreme Court held that the congressional action taken in CSRT, DTA, and MCA was an inadequate substitute for habeas corpus and, thus, improperly modified the writ. The reason for such inadequacy, given by Justice Kennedy, writing for himself and Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, was that the DTA does not permit the Court of Appeals to make the requisite findings of fact needed in a habeas corpus proceeding because the Act does not allow the detainee to present exculpatory evidence discovered after CSRT proceedings have concluded. Justice Kennedy left for future decision a number of questions, such as when other such cases might be channeled to the district court that will hear the cases currently before the Court, the evidentiary and right-to-counsel issues that may arise, and the content of the law that governs petitioners’ detention.\(^{45}\)

Justice Kennedy’s opinion cited history and precedent, as well as the literal words of the Constitution, but, ultimately, what appeared to carry the opinion were important general principles of separation of powers and adherence to the rule of law. Here are several quotations: (1) “The [Habeas Corpus] Clause protects the rights of the detained by a means consistent with the essential design of the Constitution. It ensures that, except during periods of formal suspension, the Judiciary will have a time-tested device, the writ, to maintain the ‘delicate balance of governance’ that is itself the surest safeguard of liberty.” (2) “[T]he writ of habeas corpus is itself an indispensable mechanism for monitoring the separation of powers.” (3) “The laws and Constitution are designed to survive, and remain in force, in extraordinary times. Liberty and security can be reconciled; and in our system they are reconciled within the framework of the law. The Framers decided that habeas corpus, a right of first importance, must be a part of that framework, a part of that law.”\(^{46}\)

Chief Justice Roberts was joined in dissent by Justice Scalia, Thomas, and Alito. Reflecting his Holmesian deference-to-government decisionmaking style, Roberts criticized Justice Kennedy’s opinion for not being sufficiently deferential to decisions by Congress and military authorities. Roberts criticized what he called the majority’s “ambitious opinion” as being really about control by the judiciary of federal policy regarding enemy combatants. Roberts said that the system created by Congress protects whatever rights the detainees may possess. As for use of later discovered exculpatory evidence, Roberts noted that the D.C. Circuit has power to remand a case to the tribunal below to allow that body to consider such evidence in the first instance.\(^{47}\)

Justice Scalia also dissented, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Alito. Uncharacteristically, Scalia began with an analysis of projected consequences. Henceforth, he said, “how to handle enemy prisoners in this war will ultimately lie with the branch that knows least about the national security concerns that the subject entails.”\(^{48}\) Most of Scalia’s opinion, however, was based on typical formalist focus on text and history. He concluded that the writ of habeas corpus does not, and never has, run in favor of aliens who have never been within the “territorial jurisdiction” of the United States, as supported by language in Johnson v. Eisentrager. Since Guantanamo Bay is not literally United States territory, Scalia said, that should end the matter.49

Justice Kennedy said in reply that the reference in Eisentrager to “territorial jurisdiction” was a reference to one of several factors used in a “functional” test to determine whether habeas corpus is available. Under that test the Court should consider the objective degree of control over the location, the practicability of having a trial there, and the availability of possible alternatives. Under this functional test, de jure sovereignty is a factor that bears on the applicability of constitutional guarantees, but questions of extraterritoriality turn on objective factors and practical concerns, not formalism – and the United States has practical control over Guantanamo Bay.50

Evaluating this case is not easy. On the one hand it is reassuring that the Court protected the writ of habeas corpus as a fundamental principle51 On the other hand, as Chief Justice Roberts noted in dissent, “So who has won? Not the detainees. The Court’s analysis leaves them with only the prospect of further litigation to determine the content of their new habeas rights . . . Not the Great Writ, whose majesty is hardly enhanced by its extension to a jurisdictionally quirky outpost, with no tangible benefit to anyone. Not the rule of law, unless by that is meant the rule of lawyers, who will now arguably have a greater role than military and intelligence officials in shaping policy for alien enemy combatants. And certainly not the American people, who today lose a bit more control over the conduct of this Nation’s foreign policy to unelected, politically unaccountable judges.”52

Since Boumediene, cases involving enemy combatants have been tried. In some of these cases, the detainees have been ordered released – officially designated as No Longer Enemy Combatant (NLEC) – due to a lack of evidence even under flexible evidentiary standards suggested in Hamdi and Boumediene. In other cases, individuals have been detained, and their cases appealed to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In these cases, the procedures adopted below have been held adequate to satisfy due process concerns, including shifting the burden to the detainee to prove innocence under a preponderance of the evidence standard; use of hearsay testimony, as long as it is “reliable”; and requiring the detainee to explain why any discovery request would not unduly burden the government. Of the more than 700 prisoners detained at Guantanamo Bay, 242 remained in January 2009 when President Obama took office; 116 remained as of June 2015; 81 remained as of June 2016; and only 41 remained by January 2017. Many of these had been cleared for release earlier, but remained due to difficulties repatriating them, including a Congressional requirement, eased in 2013, that the United States certify the prisoner will not engage in conduct against the United States if released. Estimates vary, but the Office of Director of National Intelligence estimated in July 2016 that of the prisoners then released from Guantanamo Bay (693: 532 under Bush and 161 under Obama) 122 have returned to terrorist activities (113 of 532 released under Bush (21.2%) and 9 of 161 released under Obama (5.6%)) and 86 more are suspected of so returning (75 of 532 released under Bush (14.1%) and 11 of 161 released under Obama (6.8%)).

Of the 41 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay when President Trump took office, 40 remain. One prisoner was transferred to Saudi Arabia in May 2018 for continued incarceration there. Of the remaining 40 prisoners, while accounts by human rights groups and the New York Times slightly differ, a good approximation is that 4 are recommended for transfer; 10 are either in pre-trial or trial proceedings; 3 have been convicted; and 23 are “high-value detainees” (this concept also part of Bush and Obama Administration policy) who may be subjected to indefinite detention, a dubious practice the Court may have to confront in terms of habeas and due process concerns. Cf. United States v. Ghailani, 733 F.3d 20 (2nd Cir. 2013) (Sixth Amendment speedy trial clause not violated by 5-year delay in trial). During 2013-14, more than 100 prisoners engaged in a hunger strike to protest their continued captivity. More than 40 of these prisoners had to be force-fed to keep them alive. See Aamer v. Obama, 742 F.3d 1023 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (force-feeding likely does not violate prisoner’s due process rights). See generally Allaithi v. Rumsfeld, 753 F.3d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (former detainees at Guantanamo Bay cannot bring claims against captors, who were acting within scope of employment as defined in Westfall Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2679(d)(1); claim must be brought against United States under Federal Tort Claims Act); Al Shimari v. CACI Premier Technology, Inc., 758 F.3d 516 (4th Cir. 2014) (former Abu Ghirab inmates who claim they were tortured by U.S. government contractors in Iraq state viable Federal Tort Claims Act case); Turkmen v. Hasty, 789 F.3d 218 (2nd Cir. 2015) (Arab and Muslim alien detainees held after 9/11 and subjected to prolonged detention state plausible due process claim against Attorney General, FBI Director, and Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service (now ICE: Immigration & Customs Enforcement)).

3. Additional Considerations Regarding Detention of Terrorists or Enemy Combatants

In Rumsfeld v. Padilla, a 5-Justice majority ruled narrowly that “[w]henever a § 2241 habeas petitioner seeks to challenge his present physical custody within the United States, he should name his warden as respondent and file the petition in the district of confinement.” In the Padilla case, although Mr. Padilla had originally been held in the Southern District of New York, by the time he filed his writ of habeas corpus in that district, he had been moved to South Carolina. Thus, he needed to refile his habeas petition there. Justices Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented. They stated: “All Members of this Court agree that the immediate custodian rule should control in the ordinary case and that habeas petitioners should not be permitted to engage in forum shopping. . . . More narrowly, we agree that if jurisdiction was proper when the petition was filed, it cannot be defeated by a later transfer of the prisoner to another district. Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283, 306 (1944).”55 The dissent was likely concerned that the government had engaged in opportunistic forum shopping on its own by transferring Padilla at the last minute to a federal district, in this case South Carolina, where the district court might be more sympathetic to the government in the conduct of any later proceedings.56 The government indicted Padilla in November 2005 for traveling “overseas to train as a terrorist with the intention of fighting a violent jihad," although any allegations involving plotting to carry out a "dirty bomb" attack in this country, for which Padilla was originally detained, were not included in the indictment. On August 16, 2007, Jose Padilla was convicted for aiding and assisting Al Qaeda in terrorist operations overseas. Notwithstanding the reduced charges, on January 22, 2008, Mr. Padilla was sentenced to 17 years, 4 months in prison, which he is serving in a federal high-security facility. His suit against John C. Yoo, a former high-level Department of Justice official, was held barred under the doctrine of qualified immunity because it was not well-settled in 2001-03 that his treatment while in the brig in Charleston, South Carolina constituted torture.57

The due process issues involved in these “war on terrorism” cases are naturally arising in other countries with similar traditions of due process concerns as in America. For example, in Britain, a court ruled key provisions of the British anti-terrorism law, which allowed a form of house arrest for suspected terrorists, to be an “affront to justice” and incompatible with European and British human rights law. British courts have also ruled unlawful the indefinite detention of suspected terrorists, forcing, in the particular case, the release of eight suspects, all Muslim men, who had been detained for up to 3½ years.58 Similar challenges may be brought before courts in America to various provisions of the USA Patriot Act, among other pieces of anti-terrorist legislation.59

A related issue concerns the law regarding acts of torture. Under customary international law, the prohibition of torture is jus cogens – a peremptory norm that is non-derogable under any circumstances, binding on all nations, on par with prohibitions against slavery and genocide. In addition, the United States ratified in 1990 the United Nations Convention Against Torture. To meet its obligations under that Convention, in 1994 Congress criminalized acts of torture committed outside the United States in 18 U.S.C. § 2340. For government acts within the United States, the Eighth Amendment ban on “cruel and unusual punishment” would apply. The Torture Victims Protection Act of 1991 provides civil tort liability for any “individual who, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation . . . subjects an individual to torture.” The Court has held that the term “individual” in the Act refers only to natural persons, meaning the statute does not impose liability against organizations for acts of torture or extrajudicial killing.60

The definition of what constitutes torture is subject to some dispute. The issue has received greater attention since September 11, 2001 following two Department of Justice memos adopting narrow definitions of what constitutes torture under 18 U.S.C. § 2340. Under the first memo, the “Bybee” memo, drafted in August 2002, “The victim must experience intense pain or suffering of the kind that is equivalent to the pain that would be associated with serious physical injury so severe that death, organ failure, or permanent damage resulting in a loss of significant bodily function would likely result.” That memo also adopted a narrow view of the intent component defining torture, requiring the torturer to act with the “precise and express objective” of inflicting severe pain.61

Following intense public criticism of the Bybee memo, once it became public in June 2004, the Bush Administration submitted a new memorandum, called the “Levin” memo, in December 2004. In this memo, the definition of torture was left more vague, but the memo described the severe pain necessary for torture as falling below the level described in the Bybee memo, but above the level of pain derived from cruel and inhuman treatment. The Levin memo also indicated that torture may involve either severe physical suffering or severe physical pain. The Levin memo also retracted the Bybee memo’s language regarding a “precise and express objective” to inflect pain, but did not provide any further clarification, other than to state that it is not enough to act with knowledge that such pain “was reasonably likely to result” from actions or “is certain to occur.”62

The existence of these memos, and the belief that American practices regarding torturing suspects in detention have changed since September 11, 2001, has caused the United States government public relations problems. For example, in holding that three British residents held at Guantanamo Bay may take legal action to try to force the British Government to facilitate their release, a British judge observed the United States’ current idea of what constitutes torture is “not the same as ours and doesn’t appear to coincide with that of most civilized countries.”63 Secretary General of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, indicated his belief in 2006 that the United States should shut the Guantanamo Bay camp "without further delay" and try the detainees held there or release them.64

Another issue that has arisen involves the issue whether a United States citizen, who alleges being arrested, tortured, and detained by agents of a foreign government at the behest of the United States, may seek habeas corpus relief in United States federal district courts because he is “in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States” or “in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.” In Abu Ali v. Ashcroft,65 a federal district court held that such a United States citizen could seek habeas relief. In contrast, foreign nationals held by other countries do not have a right to seek habeas relief, even if held at the behest of the United States.66

In Munaf v. Geren,67 a unanimous Supreme Court held that while the federal courts have jurisdiction to consider petitions for habeas corpus filed on behalf of American citizens held in custody by the United States, even if held overseas, simply because such jurisdiction exists is not a sufficient to grant a preliminary injunction against transferring individuals to that sovereign’s government for criminal prosecution. On the merits, habeas corpus should not be granted on the basis that the other country’s criminal procedures do not provide all of the protections afforded by the Constitution. Further, a claim that the other country engages in torture is for the political branches, not the judiciary, to consider. Finally, there is no rule forbidding the United States from transferring a citizen to another sovereign for criminal prosecution without a specific legal authority to do so given by act of Congress or the terms of a treaty where, as here, the detained persons voluntarily traveled to that country, and it is the very sovereign – Iraq – on whose behalf they are being detained. Justice Souter, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Breyer, wrote a concurring opinion in which he sought to limit the holding to the precise facts of the case.68 Chief Justice Roberts’ majority opinion gave no indication that it was so limited.

4. Detention for Aliens in Immigration Proceedings

Similar issues regarding detention can exist for aliens detained because of alleged violations of immigration laws. Regarding persons detained for violations of immigration laws, the Supreme Court has held that resident aliens charged with being deportable from the United States for various offenses may be detained “for the brief period necessary for their removal proceedings” without an individualized determination that the alien poses either a danger to society or a flight risk. In Demore v Kim, the Court concluded detention was “reasonable” given a general concern that such aliens may continue to engage in crime or fail to appear for their hearings. Regarding longer detentions, the Court held in Zadvydas v. Davis that legal resident aliens likely have a due process right to be free from indefinite detention based on their status as "persons within the United States." Because indefinite detention would raise “serious constitutional concerns,” the “post-removal-period detention” statute was read to contain an implicit "reasonable time" limitation on detentions after 90 days, the application of what constitutes “reasonable time” subject to federal court review.

With regard to aliens seeking admission to the United States, the Court has stated, “[A]liens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law. But an alien on the threshold of initial entry stands on a different footing: ‘Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned.’” It has been noted:

> While it seems straightforward to distinguish between those who are "within the United States" and those who are outside its borders, the paradoxical "entry fiction" in immigration law permits the U.S. government to treat individuals physically inside the country as though they were "continuously knocking at the gate." Immigrant parolees – noncitizens to whom the Attorney General grants a temporary stay in the United States for humanitarian or public interest reasons – fall within the purview of the entry fiction.

      the Market Participant Exception ............................................................................. 605

§ 13.1 Introduction to Congressional Limits on State Power

If Congress enacts a law that is constitutional, conflicting state laws are invalid because of the Supremacy Clause. Article VI, § 2 provides: “This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land.” When a state law conflicts with federal law, state law is said to be preempted by the federal law.1 Preemption is thus a statutory issue of congressional intent, not strictly speaking a constitutional doctrine.

Even where such congressional legislation does not exist, the Court has adopted the view that Congress, in the absence of legislation, supports a background policy of free trade among the states.
During the immediate aftermath of the Revolutionary War, England reduced commercial activities with the newly-freed colonies in 1784-85, including restrictions placed on American merchants’ access to overseas markets, deepening an on-going recession in the new United States. In response, many states adopted protectionist legislation to protect their own state’s commerce from competition.2 This had the effect of retarding economic growth in the United States generally.
Faced with this reality, a meeting in Annapolis, Maryland was called and held in the summer of 1786, particularly to focus on the need to amend the 1781 Articles of Confederation to deal with this economic problem and provide for more uniform rules regarding trade.3 Although only 5 States sent delegates – New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia – the problems raised at that meeting convinced the participants, including James Madison and Alexander Hamilton, to petition the states for a broader Constitutional Convention the following year. This led to the Constitutional Convention in 1787 in Philadelphia, which framed the current United States Constitution.

This history suggests support for free trade generally among the framing and ratifying generation. There is also the economic argument that free trade prompts economic growth in the long-run, and the political argument that individual state legislatures, elected by in-state citizens, may have too great a predisposition for protectionist legislation that might play well with the state electorate to the disservice of the nation as a whole.4 For these combination of reasons, the Supreme Court has always applied some version of Dormant Commerce Clause doctrine. Under this doctrine, even when Congress has been silent, certain state statutes are ruled invalid by the Supreme Court because of a view that they burden interstate commerce more than Congress would want.

Because of the formalist preference for literal text and bright-line rules, it is not surprising that Justices Scalia and Thomas have indicated a desire to abandon scrutiny of state regulations under dormant commerce clause doctrine. Reflecting formalist deference to “settled law,” noted at § 2.4.6 n.79, Justice Scalia stated in American Trucking Association, Inc. v. Michigan Public Service Commission,5 that under dormant commerce clause review the Court should ask only whether the state law “facially discriminates against interstate commerce” or whether it is “indistinguishable from a type of law previously held unconstitutional by this Court.” Justice Thomas added in American Trucking that the Court’s modern dormant commerce clause review “has no basis in the text of the Constitution, makes little sense, and has proved virtually unworkable in application.”6

On the other hand, it may be a justifiable system for Congress to rely on the Supreme Court as the first line of defense against excessive state regulation of interstate commerce. The institutional mechanisms and inertia associated with Congress are ill-suited to review thousands of state statutes that get passed each year relating to commercial matters. A more effective institutional response may well be the current system where individual litigants, if sufficiently burdened by a state law, choose to bring that complaint to a court for initial review. Congress can, of course, always overturn any court decision on dormant commerce clause grounds if Congress so wishes, since the doctrine is ultimately based not on a constitutional requirement, but rather on court attempts to determine implied congressional intent where Congress has been silent. Indeed, Congress could direct the Court to stop engaging in dormant commerce clause review, or to adopt Justice Scalia’s version of dormant commerce clause doctrine. Congress has shown no interest to do either.

§ 13.2 Preemption Doctrine

1. Historical Eras of Preemption Doctrine

During the original natural law era, between 1789-1873, the Court was not faced with many cases raising preemption issues, as the limited amount of federal regulation regarding domestic matters meant that few areas of conflict arose. When such conflicts arose, the Court did not create any preemption nuances. Instead, as in 1824 in Gibbons v. Ogden, the Court simply noted that if there is a collision between federal and state law, the state law must yield.

During the first part of the formalist era, 1873-1937, Congress continued to do little to regulate commerce. Later, as the need for federal economic regulation became more evident and Congress gradually became more active, the Court tended to adopt a bright-line rule that if Congress regulated in an area, Congress should be taken to have occupied the field. Thus, in Napier v. Atlantic Coast Line, congressional action passing the Boiler Inspection Act preempted all state laws regulating locomotive equipment, even where there was no federal rule on the state regulation in question.

The Holmesian Court, from 1937-1954, rejected this simple categorical approach to preemption doctrine, and instead adopted a more functional, weighing of factors analysis giving respect to both federal and state governmental entities. Thus, the Holmesian-era Court held in 1947 in Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp. that if the states had traditionally occupied an area, the Court would assume that state law was not preempted by federal law unless Congress clearly so intended, as where the federal scheme was so pervasive as to leave no room for supplementation, the federal interest was dominant, or state policy produced results inconsistent with federal objectives.

The instrumentalist Court, from 1954-1986, continued this functional analysis, but added a policy component focused on the state’s purposes. If a state's purpose in regulating had protectionist overtones, the Court would more likely find preemption, as in Campbell v. Hussey. On the other hand, where the state’s purpose did not appear to be protectionist in nature, and merely imposed higher standards on business, the liberal predisposition in favor of government regulation more often led to a finding of no federal preemption. For example, in Florida Lime and Avocado Growers, Inc.

7 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 210-11 (1824).
8 272 U.S. 605, 611-13 (1926).
9 331 U.S. 218, 229-31 (1947).
10 368 U.S. 297, 300-02 (1961) (provisions of the Georgia Tobacco Identification Act preempted by the Federal Tobacco Inspection Act, where Georgia law required that tobacco of a certain type, grown principally in Georgia, be marked with a white identification tag when received in warehouses for sale, while the federal law merely required a label truthfully showing the tobacco's official federal type). id. at 302-13 (Black, J., joined by Frankfurter & Harlan, JJ., dissenting) (no indication of congressional intent to preempt complementary state regulation).
v. Paul, a majority said that California requirements on certifying avocados were not preempted by federal regulations requiring avocados to be certified as mature. For the majority, Justice Brennan said the federal law concerned minimum standards, not uniform standards. Here there was no clear congressional intent to exclude state regulation.

The approach of both the majority and dissent in Florida Lime favoring non-protectionist state laws is supported by the doctrine that the burden of proof is on persons who challenge a state law to prove it has been preempted. In Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., in an opinion by Justice White, the Court said that state police power laws are not superseded by federal law unless the Court can find a clear and manifest congressional purpose. That purpose may be evidenced by express words. It may also be implied from the pervasiveness of a federal regulatory scheme, the dominance of federal interest in a field, or the object sought and the character of the obligations imposed by federal law. State law is also void if it conflicts with federal law. A conflict exists if compliance with both regulations is impossible or the state law stands as an obstacle to accomplishing the purposes of Congress.

2. Modern Preemption Doctrine

Since 1986, the Court has continued to use the Ray test for preemption, combined with the Rice presumption of no federal preemption in areas states have traditionally regulated. In applying these principles, however, the Justices do not always agree on: (1) when Congress has explicitly expressed an intent to preempt (express preemption); or (2) whether the Court should find that Congress has impliedly preempted state law (implied preemption). Under Ray, there are two types of implied preemption: (a) field preemption, which occurs where the scheme of federal regulation is so pervasive as to make reasonable an inference that Congress left no room for state supplementation; and (b) conflict preemption, which occurs either where (i) compliance with both state and federal regulations is physically impossible, an easy case for preemption, or (ii) where state law stands as an obstacle to accomplishing Congress' purposes.

11 373 U.S. 132, 143-46 (1963); id. at 165-74 (White, J., joined by Douglas, Black & Clark, JJ., dissenting) (California law was only to protect the good will of the avocado industry).

13 See, e.g., Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52 (1943) (alien registration requirements a field preempted by the federal government, leaving no room for state regulation).

14 See Florida Lime and Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-43 (1963) (that would be the situation in Florida Lime if, for example, the federal orders “forbade the picking and marketing of any avocado testing more than 7% oil, while the California test excluded from the State any avocado measuring less than 8% oil content.”).

Odd combinations of Justices sometimes occur in preemption cases because there are several cross-currents. The first involves differing views on how to determine congressional intent, particularly the extent to which legislative history can be used to make that determination. This is discussed below at § 13.2.2 n.17. Second, there is a cross-current caused by the conservative predisposition to defer to states, but also to be skeptical of state business regulations. Third is the cross-current caused by the liberal predisposition to defer to the federal government, but also to be supportive of state business regulation. The predispositions creating these last two cross-currents are noted at § 1.1.4 text following note 20.

A good example of implied conflict preemption involving cross-currents of predispositions, and thus unusual combinations of Justices in the Court opinions, is Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Association, decided in 1992. In this case, Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices White and Scalia, held that a state regulation of occupational safety and health matters, regarding which a federal OSHA standard was in effect, was impliedly preempted because it was in conflict with the full purposes and objectives of OSHA – among which was to have workers subjected to but one set of standards. Justice Kennedy agreed that there was preemption, but found it expressed in the terms of OSHA. Justice Souter dissented, with Justices Stevens, Blackmun, and Thomas. Justice Souter said the Court should presume that Congress did not intend to displace state law. Justices Stevens and Blackmun probably joined this dissent based on a policy of supporting additional state regulations of business, while Justice Thomas may have joined the dissent based on his strong support for states’ rights.

Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Association
505 U.S. 88 (1992)

Justice O'CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, III, and IV, and an opinion with respect to Part II in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice WHITE, and Justice SCALIA join.

In 1988, the Illinois General Assembly enacted the Hazardous Waste Crane and Hoisting Equipment Operators Licensing Act, Ill. Rev. Stat., ch. 111, PP7701-7717 (1989), and the Hazardous Waste Laborers Licensing Act, Ill. Rev. Stat., ch. 111, PP7801-7815 (1989) (together, licensing acts). The stated purpose of the licensing acts is both "to promote job safety" and "to protect life, limb and property." PP7702, 7802. In this case, we consider whether these "dual impact" statutes, which protect both workers and the general public, are pre-empted by the federal Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, 84 Stat. 1590, 29 U. S. C. § 651 et seq. (OSH Act), and the standards promulgated thereunder by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA).

16 505 U.S. 88, 96-109 (1992); id. at 110-14 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment); id. at 114-122 (Souter, J., joined by Stevens, Blackmun & Thomas, JJ., dissenting).

In response to this congressional directive, OSHA, to which the Secretary has delegated certain of her statutory responsibilities, see Martin v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Comm'n, 499 U.S. 144, 147, n.1 (1991), promulgated regulations on "Hazardous Waste Operations and Emergency Response," including detailed regulations on worker training requirements. 51 Fed. Reg. 45654, 45665-45666 (1986) (interim regulations); 54 Fed. Reg. 9294, 9320-9321 (1989) (final regulations), codified at 29 CFR § 1910.120 (1991). The OSHA regulations require, among other things, that workers engaged in an activity that may expose them to hazardous wastes receive a minimum of 40 hours of instruction off the site, and a minimum of three days actual field experience under the supervision of a trained supervisor. § 1910.120(e)(3)(I). Workers who are on the site only occasionally or who are working in areas that have been determined to be under the permissible exposure limits must complete at least 24 hours of off-site instruction and one day of actual field experience. §§ 1910.120(e)(3)(ii) and (iii). On-site managers and supervisors directly responsible for hazardous waste operations must receive the same initial training as general employees, plus at least eight additional hours of specialized training on various health and safety programs. § 1910.120(e)(4). Employees and supervisors are required to receive eight hours of refresher training annually. § 1910.120(e)(8). Those who have satisfied the training and field experience requirement receive a written certification; uncertified workers are prohibited from engaging in hazardous waste operations. § 1910.120(e)(6).

In 1988, while OSHA's interim hazardous waste regulations were in effect, the State of Illinois enacted the licensing acts at issue here. The laws are designated as acts "in relation to environmental protection," and their stated aim is to protect both employees and the general public by licensing hazardous waste equipment operators and laborers working at certain facilities. Both licensing acts require a license applicant to provide a certified record of at least 40 hours of training under an approved program conducted within Illinois, to pass a written examination, and to complete an annual refresher course of at least eight hours of instruction. Ill. Rev. Stat., ch. 111, PP7705(c) and (e), 7706(c) and (d), 7707(b), 7805(c) and (e), 7806(b). In addition, applicants for a hazardous waste crane operator's license must submit "a certified record showing operation of equipment used in hazardous waste handling for a minimum of 4,000 hours." P7705(d). Employees who work without the proper license, and employers who knowingly permit an unlicensed employee to work, are subject to escalating fines for each offense. PP7715, 7716, 7814.

The respondent in this case, National Solid Wastes Management Association (Association), is a national trade association of businesses that remove, transport, dispose, and handle waste material, including hazardous waste. The Association's members are subject to the OSH Act and OSHA regulations, and are therefore required to train, qualify, and certify their hazardous waste remediation workers. 29 CFR § 1910.120 (1991). For hazardous waste operations conducted in Illinois, certain of the workers employed by the Association's members are also required to obtain licenses pursuant to the Illinois licensing acts. Thus, for example, some of the Association's members must ensure that their employees receive not only the 3 days of field experience required for certification under the OSHA regulations, but also the 500 days of experience (4,000 hours) required for licensing under the state statutes.

Shortly before the state licensing acts were due to go into effect, the Association brought a declaratory judgment action in United States District Court against Bernard Killian, the former Director of the Illinois Environmental Protection Agency (IEPA); petitioner Mary Gade is Killian's successor in office and has been substituted as a party pursuant to this Court's Rule 35.3. The Association sought to enjoin IEPA from enforcing the Illinois licensing acts, claiming that the acts were pre-empted by the OSH Act and OSHA regulations and that they violated the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution.

We granted certiorari, 502 U.S. 1012 (1991), to resolve a conflict between the decision below and decisions in which other Courts of Appeals have found the OSH Act to have a much narrower pre-emptive effect on "dual impact" state regulations. See Associated Industries of Massachusetts v. Snow, 898 F.2d 274, 279 (CA1 1990); Environmental Encapsulating Corp. v. New York City, 855 F.2d 48, 57 (CA2 1988); Manufacturers Assn. of Tri-County v. Knepper, 801 F.2d 130, 138 (CA3 1986), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 815 (1987); New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce v. Hughey, 774 F.2d 587, 593 (CA3 1985).

II

In the OSH Act, Congress endeavored "to assure so far as possible every working man and woman in the Nation safe and healthful working conditions." 29 U.S.C. § 651(b). To that end, Congress authorized the Secretary of Labor to set mandatory occupational safety and health standards applicable to all businesses affecting interstate commerce, 29 U.S.C. § 651(b)(3), and thereby brought the Federal Government into a field that traditionally had been occupied by the States. Federal regulation of the workplace was not intended to be all encompassing, however. First, Congress expressly saved two areas from federal pre-emption. Section 4(b)(4) of the OSH Act states that the Act does not "supersede or in any manner affect any workmen's compensation law or ... enlarge or diminish or affect in any other manner the common law or statutory rights, duties, or liabilities of employers and employees under any law with respect to injuries, diseases, or death of employees arising out of, or in the course of, employment." 29 U.S.C. § 653(b)(4). Section 18(a) provides that the Act does not "prevent any State agency or court from asserting jurisdiction under State law over any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which no [federal] standard is in effect." 29 U.S.C. § 667(a).

Congress not only reserved certain areas to state regulation, but it also, in § 18(b) of the Act, gave the States the option of pre-empting federal regulation entirely. That section provides:

"Submission of State plan for development and enforcement of State standards to preempt applicable Federal standards.

"Any State which, at any time, desires to assume responsibility for development and enforcement therein of occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated [by the Secretary under the OSH Act] shall submit a State plan for the development of such standards and their enforcement." 29 U. S. C. § 667(b).

About half the States have received the Secretary's approval for their own state plans as described in this provision. 29 CFR pts. 1952, 1956 (1991). Illinois is not among them.

In the decision below, the Court of Appeals held that § 18(b) "unquestionably" pre-empts any state law or regulation that establishes an occupational health and safety standard on an issue for which OSHA has already promulgated a standard, unless the State has obtained the Secretary's approval for its own plan. 918 F.2d at 677. Every other federal and state court confronted with an OSH Act pre-emption challenge has reached the same conclusion, and so do we.

Pre-emption may be either expressed or implied, and "is compelled whether Congress' command is explicitly stated in the statute's language or implicitly contained in its structure and purpose." Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525 (1977); Shaw v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 463 U.S. 85, 95 (1983); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 152-153 (1982). Absent explicit pre-emptive language, we have recognized at least two types of implied pre-emption: field pre-emption, where the scheme of federal regulation is "so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it," id., at 153 (quoting Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947)), and conflict pre-emption, where "compliance with both federal and state regulations is a physical impossibility," Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-143 (1963), or where state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress," Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67 (1941); Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 138 (1988); Perez v. Campbell, 402 U.S. 637, 649 (1971).

Our ultimate task in any pre-emption case is to determine whether state regulation is consistent with the structure and purpose of the statute as a whole. Looking to "the provisions of the whole law, and to its object and policy," Pilot Life Ins. Co. v. Dedeaux, 481 U.S. 41, 51 (1987) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted), we hold that nonapproved state regulation of occupational safety and health issues for which a federal standard is in effect is impliedly pre-empted as in conflict with the full purposes and objectives of the OSH Act. The design of the statute persuades us that Congress intended to subject employers and employees to only one set of regulations, be it federal or state, and that the only way a State may regulate an OSHA-regulated occupational safety and health issue is pursuant to an approved state plan that displaces the federal standards.

The principal indication that Congress intended to pre-empt state law is § 18(b)'s statement that a State "shall" submit a plan if it wishes to "assume responsibility" for "development and enforcement . . . of occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated." The unavoidable implication of this provision is that a State may not enforce its own occupational safety and health standards without obtaining the Secretary's approval, and petitioner concedes that § 18(b) would require an approved plan if Illinois wanted to "assume responsibility" for the regulation of occupational safety and health within the State. Petitioner contends, however, that an approved plan is necessary only if the State wishes completely to replace the federal regulations, not merely to supplement them. She argues that the correct interpretation of § 18(b) is that posited by Judge Easterbrook below: i.e., a State may either "oust" the federal standard by submitting a state plan to the Secretary for approval or "add to" the federal standard without seeking the Secretary's approval. 918 F.2d at 685.

Petitioner's interpretation of § 18(b) might be plausible were we to interpret that provision in isolation, but it simply is not tenable in light of the OSH Act's surrounding provisions. "We must not be guided by a single sentence or member of a sentence, but look to the provisions of the whole law." Dedeaux, 481 U.S. at 51 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). The OSH Act as a whole evidences Congress' intent to avoid subjecting workers and employers to duplicative regulation; a State may develop an occupational safety and health program tailored to its own needs, but only if it is willing completely to displace the applicable federal regulations.

We cannot accept petitioner's argument that the OSH Act does not pre-empt nonconflicting state laws because those laws, like the Act, are designed to promote worker safety. In determining whether state law "stands as an obstacle" to the full implementation of a federal law, Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. at 67, "it is not enough to say that the ultimate goal of both federal and state law" is the same, International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 494 (1987). "A state law also is pre-empted if it interferes with the methods by which the federal statute was designed to reach that goal." Ibid.; see also Michigan Canners & Freezers Assn., Inc. v. Agricultural Marketing and Bargaining Bd., 467 U.S. 461, 477 (1984) (state statute establishing association to represent agricultural producers pre-empted even though it and the federal Agricultural Fair Practices Act "share the goal of augmenting the producer's bargaining power"). The OSH Act does not foreclose a State from enacting its own laws to advance the goal of worker safety, but it does restrict the ways in which it can do so. If a State wishes to regulate an issue of worker safety for which a federal standard is in effect, its only option is to obtain the prior approval of the Secretary of Labor, as described in § 18 of the Act.

Petitioner next argues that, even if Congress intended to pre-empt all nonapproved state occupational safety and health regulations whenever a federal standard is in effect, the OSH Act's pre-emptive effect should not be extended to state laws that address public safety as well as occupational safety concerns. As we explained in Part II, we understand § 18(b) to mean that the OSH Act pre-empts all state "occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated." 29 U.S.C. § 667(b). We now consider whether a dual impact law can be an "occupational safety and health standard" subject to pre-emption under the Act.

The OSH Act defines an "occupational safety and health standard" as "a standard which requires conditions, or the adoption or use of one or more practices, means, methods, operations, or processes, reasonably necessary or appropriate to provide safe or healthful employment and places of employment." 29 U.S.C. § 652(8). Any state law requirement designed to promote health and safety in the workplace falls neatly within the Act's definition of an "occupational safety and health standard." Clearly, under this definition, a state law that expressly declares a legislative purpose of regulating occupational health and safety would, in the absence of an approved state plan, be pre-empted by an OSHA standard regulating the same subject matter. But petitioner asserts that if the state legislature articulates a purpose other than (or in addition to) workplace health and safety, then the OSH Act loses its pre-emptive force. We disagree.

Although "part of the pre-empted field is defined by reference to the purpose of the state law in question, . . . another part of the field is defined by the state law's actual effect." English v. General Electric Co., 496 U.S. 72, 84 (1990) (citing Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 212-213 (1983)). In assessing the impact of a state law on the federal scheme, we have refused to rely solely on the legislature's professed purpose and have looked as well to the effects of the law. As we explained over two decades ago: "We can no longer adhere to the aberrational doctrine . . . that state law may frustrate the operation of federal law as long as the state legislature in passing its law had some purpose in mind other than one of frustration. Apart from the fact that it is at odds with the approach taken in nearly all our Supremacy Clause cases, such a doctrine would enable state legislatures to nullify nearly all unwanted federal legislation by simply publishing a legislative committee report articulating some state interest or policy – other than frustration of the federal objective – that would be tangentially furthered by the proposed state law. . . . Any state legislation which frustrates the full effectiveness of federal law is rendered invalid by the Supremacy Clause." Perez v. Campbell, 402 U.S. at 651-652. See also Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. at 141-142 (focus on "whether the purposes of the two laws are parallel or divergent" tends to "obscure more than aid" in determining whether state law is pre-empted by federal law) (emphasis deleted); Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322, 336 (1979) ("When considering the purpose of a challenged statute, this Court is not bound by 'the name, description or characterization given it by the legislature or the courts of the State,' but will determine for itself the practical impact of the law") (quoting Lacoste v. Department of Conservation of Louisiana, 263 U.S. 545, 550 (1924)); Napier v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 272 U.S. 605, 612 (1926) (pre-emption analysis turns not on whether federal and state laws "are aimed at distinct and different evils" but whether they "operate upon the same object").

Our precedents leave no doubt that a dual impact state regulation cannot avoid OSH Act pre-emption simply because the regulation serves several objectives rather than one. As the Court of Appeals observed, "it would defeat the purpose of section 18 if a state could enact measures stricter than OSHA's and largely accomplished through regulation of worker health and safety simply by asserting a non-occupational purpose for the legislation." 918 F.2d at 679. Whatever the purpose or purposes of the state law, pre-emption analysis cannot ignore the effect of the challenged state action on the pre-empted field. The key question is thus at what point the state regulation sufficiently interferes with federal regulation that it should be deemed pre-empted under the Act.

We recognize that "the States have a compelling interest in the practice of professions within their boundaries, and that as part of their power to protect the public health, safety, and other valid interests they have broad power to establish standards for licensees and regulating the practice of professions." Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 792 (1975); see also Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 731 (1963); Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 122 (1889). But under the Supremacy Clause, from which our pre-emption doctrine is derived, "any state law, however clearly within a State's acknowledged power, which interferes with or is contrary to federal law, must yield." Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. at 138 (quoting Free v. Bland, 369 U.S. 663, 666 (1962)); see also De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 357 (1976) ("Even state regulation designed to protect vital state interests must give way to paramount federal legislation"). We therefore reject petitioner's argument that the State's interest in licensing various occupations can save from OSH Act pre-emption those provisions that directly and substantially affect workplace safety.

We also reject petitioner's argument that the Illinois licensing acts do not regulate occupational safety and health at all, but are instead a "pre-condition" to employment. By that reasoning, the OSHA regulations themselves would not be considered occupational standards. SARA, however, makes clear that the training of employees engaged in hazardous waste operations is an occupational safety and health issue, and that certification requirements before an employee may engage in such work are occupational safety and health standards. See 505 U.S. at 92. Because neither of the OSH Act's saving provisions are implicated, and because Illinois does not have an approved state plan under § 18(b), the state licensing acts are pre-empted by the OSH Act to the extent they establish occupational safety and health standards for training those who work with hazardous wastes. Like the Court of Appeals, we do not specifically consider which of the licensing acts' provisions will stand or fall under the pre-emption analysis set forth above.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is hereby affirmed.

Justice KENNEDY, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Though I concur in the Court's judgment and with the ultimate conclusion that the state law is pre-empted, I would find express pre-emption from the terms of the federal statute. I cannot agree that we should denominate this case as one of implied pre-emption. The contrary view of the plurality is based on an undue expansion of our implied pre-emption jurisprudence which, in my view, is neither wise nor necessary.
As both the majority and dissent acknowledge, we have identified three circumstances in which a federal statute pre-empts state law: First, Congress can adopt express language defining the existence and scope of pre-emption. Second, state law is pre-empted where Congress creates a scheme of federal regulation so pervasive as to leave no room for supplementary state regulation. And third, "state law is pre-empted to the extent that it actually conflicts with federal law." English v. General Electric Co., 496 U.S. 72, 78-79 (1990). This third form of pre-emption, so-called actual conflict pre-emption, occurs either "where it is impossible for a private party to comply with both state and federal requirements . . . or where state law 'stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.'" English, 496 U.S. at 79 (quoting Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67 (1941)). The plurality would hold today that state occupational safety and health standards regulating an issue on which a federal standard exists conflict with Congress' purpose to "subject employers and employees to only one set of regulations." This is not an application of our pre-emption standards, it is but a conclusory statement of pre-emption, as it assumes that Congress intended exclusive federal jurisdiction. I do not see how such a mode of analysis advances our consideration of the case.

Our decisions establish that a high threshold must be met if a state law is to be pre-empted for conflicting with the purposes of a federal Act. Any conflict must be "irreconcilable . . . . The existence of a hypothetical or potential conflict is insufficient to warrant the pre-emption of the state statute." Rice v. Norman Williams Co., 458 U.S. 654, 659 (1982); see also English, 496 U.S. at 90 ("The 'teaching of this Court's decisions . . . enjoins seeking out conflicts between state and federal regulation where none clearly exists'") (quoting Huron Portland Cement Co. v. Detroit, 362 U.S. 440, 446 (1960)); Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 222-223 (1983). In my view, this type of pre-emption should be limited to state laws which impose prohibitions or obligations which are in direct contradiction to Congress' primary objectives, as conveyed with clarity in the federal legislation.

The plurality's broad view of actual conflict pre-emption is contrary to two basic principles of our pre-emption jurisprudence. First, we begin "with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States [are] not to be superseded . . . unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947). Second, "the purpose of Congress is the ultimate touchstone" in all pre-emption cases. Malone v. White Motor Corp., 435 U.S. 497, 504 (1978) (quoting Retail Clerks v. Schermerhorn, 375 U.S. 96, 103 (1963)). A freewheeling judicial inquiry into whether a state statute is in tension with federal objectives would undercut the principle that it is Congress rather than the courts that pre-empts state law.

Nonetheless, I agree with the Court that "the OSH Act pre-empts all state 'occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated.'" I believe, however, that this result is mandated by the express terms of § 18(b) of the OSH Act. It follows from this that the pre-emptive scope of the Act is also limited to the language of the statute. When the existence of pre-emption is evident from the statutory text, our inquiry must begin and end with the statutory framework itself.
As the plurality's analysis amply demonstrates, Congress has addressed the issue of pre-emption in the OSH Act. The dissent's position that the Act does not pre-empt supplementary state regulation becomes most implausible when the language of § 18(b) is considered in conjunction with the other provisions of § 18. Section 18(b) provides as follows: "Any State which . . . desires to assume responsibility for development and enforcement therein of occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated . . . shall submit a State plan . . . ." 29 U. S. C. § 667(b) (emphasis added).

The statute is clear: When a State desires to assume responsibility for an occupational safety and health issue already addressed by the Federal Government, it must submit a state plan. The most reasonable inference from this language is that when a State does not submit and secure approval of a state plan, it may not enforce occupational safety and health standards in that area.

In this regard I disagree with the dissent, and find unconvicing its conclusion that Congress intended to allow concurrent state and federal jurisdiction over occupational safety and health issues. The dissent would give the States, rather than the Federal Government, the power to decide whether as to any particular occupational safety and health issue there will exist a single or dual regulatory scheme. Under this theory the State may choose exclusive federal jurisdiction by not regulating; or exclusive state jurisdiction by submitting a state plan; or dual regulation by adopting supplementary rules, as Illinois did here. That position undermines the authority of OSHA in many respects. For example, § 18(c)(2) of the OSH Act allows OSHA to disapprove state plans which "unduly burden interstate commerce." The dissent would eviscerate this important administrative mechanism by allowing the States to sidestep OSHA's authority through the mechanism of supplementary regulation. Furthermore, concurrent state and federal jurisdiction might interfere with the enforcement of the federal regulations without creating a situation where compliance with both schemes is a physical impossibility, which the dissent would require for pre-emption. I would not attribute to Congress the intent to create such a hodgepodge scheme of authority. My views in this regard are confirmed by the fact that OSHA has as a consistent matter, since the enactment of the OSH Act, viewed § 18 as providing it with exclusive jurisdiction in areas where it issues a standard. 29 CFR § 1901.2 (1991); 36 Fed. Reg. 7006 (1971); Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 12-21. Therefore, while the dissent may be correct that as a theoretical matter the separate provisions of § 18 may be reconciled with allowing concurrent jurisdiction, it is neither a natural nor a sound reading of the statutory scheme.

Justice SOUTER, with whom Justice BLACKMUN, Justice STEVENS, and Justice THOMAS join, dissenting.

The Court holds today that § 18 of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (Act), 29 U. S.C. § 667, pre-empts state regulation of any occupational safety or health issue as to which there is a federal standard, whether or not the state regulation conflicts with the federal standard in the sense that enforcement of one would preclude application of the other. With respect, I dissent. In light of our rule that federal pre-emption of state law is only to be found in a clear congressional purpose to supplant exercises of the States' traditional police powers, the text of the Act fails to support the Court's conclusion.
Our cases recognize federal pre-emption of state law in three variants: express pre-emption, field pre-emption, and conflict pre-emption. Express pre-emption requires "explicit pre-emptive language." See Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 203 (1983), citing Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525 (1977). Field pre-emption is wrought by a manifestation of congressional intent to occupy an entire field such that even without a federal rule on some particular matter within the field, state regulation on that matter is pre-empted, leaving it untouched by either state or federal law. 461 U.S. at 204. Finally, there is conflict pre-emption in either of two senses. The first is found when compliance with both state and federal law is impossible, ibid., the second when a state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress," Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67 (1941).

The plurality today finds pre-emption of this last sort, discerning a conflict between any state legislation on a given issue as to which a federal standard is in effect, and a congressional purpose "to subject employers and employees to only one set of regulations." Thus, under the plurality's reading, any regulation on an issue as to which a federal standard has been promulgated has been pre-empted. As one commentator has observed, this kind of purpose-conflict pre-emption, which occurs when state law is held to "undermine a congressional decision in favor of national uniformity of standards," presents "a situation similar in practical effect to that of federal occupation of a field." L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 486 (2d ed. 1988). Still, whether the pre-emption at issue is described as occupation of each narrow field in which a federal standard has been promulgated, as pre-emption of those regulations that conflict with the federal objective of single regulation, or, as Justice Kennedy describes it, as express pre-emption, the key is congressional intent, and I find the language of the statute insufficient to demonstrate an intent to pre-empt state law in this way.

Analysis begins with the presumption that "Congress did not intend to displace state law." Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 746 (1981). "Where, as here, the field which Congress is said to have pre-empted has been traditionally occupied by the States," see, e.g., U.S. Const., Art. I, § 10; Patapsco Guano Co. v. North Carolina, 171 U.S. 345, 358 (1898), "we start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States were not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947). This assumption provides assurance that the "federal-state balance," United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349 (1971), will not be disturbed unintentionally by Congress or unnecessarily by the courts. But when Congress has "unmistakably ... ordained," Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142 (1963), that its enactments alone are to regulate a part of commerce, state laws regulating that aspect of commerce must fall." Jones, 430 U.S. at 525. Subject to this principle, the enquiry into the possibly pre-emptive effect of federal legislation is an exercise of statutory construction. If the statute's terms can be read sensibly not to have a pre-emptive effect, the presumption controls and no pre-emption may be inferred.

At first blush, respondent's strongest argument might seem to rest on § 18(a) of the Act, 29 U. S. C. § 667(a), the full text of which is this:
"(a) Assertion of State standards in absence of applicable Federal standards

"Nothing in this chapter shall prevent any State agency or court from asserting jurisdiction under State law over any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which no standard is in effect under section 655 of this title."

That is to say, where there is no federal standard in effect, there is no pre-emption. The plurality reasons that there must be pre-emption, however, when there is a federal standard in effect, else § 18(a) would be rendered superfluous because "there is no possibility of conflict where there is no federal regulation." Ante, 505 U.S. at 100.

The plurality errs doubly. First, its premise is incorrect. In the sense in which the plurality uses the term, there is the possibility of "conflict" even absent federal regulation since the mere enactment of a federal law like the Act may amount to an occupation of an entire field, preventing state regulation. Second, the necessary implication of § 18(a) is not that every federal regulation pre-empts all state law on the issue in question, but only that some federal regulations may pre-empt some state law. The plurality ignores the possibility that the provision simply rules out field pre-emption and is otherwise entirely compatible with the possibility that pre-emption will occur only when actual conflict between a federal regulation and a state rule renders compliance with both impossible. Indeed, if Congress had meant to say that any state rule should be pre-empted if it deals with an issue as to which there is a federal regulation in effect, the text of subsection (a) would have been a very inept way of trying to make the point. It was not, however, an inept way to make the different point that Congress intended no field pre-emption of the sphere of health and safety subject to regulation, but not necessarily regulated, under the Act. Unlike the case where field pre-emption occurs, the provision tells us, absence of a federal standard leaves a State free to do as it will on the issue. Beyond this, subsection (a) does not necessarily mean anything, and the provision is perfectly consistent with the conclusion that as long as compliance with both a federal standard and a state regulation is not physically impossible, see Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-143 (1963), each standard shall be enforceable. If, indeed, the presumption against pre-emption means anything, § 18(a) must be read in just this way.

Respondent also relies on § 18(b), 29 U. S. C. § 667(b):

"(b) Submission of State plan for development and enforcement of State standards to preempt applicable Federal standards

"Any State which, at any time, desires to assume responsibility for development and enforcement therein of occupational safety and health standards relating to any occupational safety or health issue with respect to which a Federal standard has been promulgated under section 655 of this title shall submit a State plan for the development of such standards and their enforcement."
Respondent argues that the necessary implication of this provision is clear: the only way that a state rule on a particular occupational safety and health issue may be enforced once a federal standard on the issue is also in place is by incorporating the state rule in a plan approved by the Secretary.

As both the plurality and Justice Kennedy acknowledge, however, that is not the necessary implication of § 18(b). See ante, 505 U.S. at 99 (plurality opinion); ante, 505 U.S. at 112-113 (opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment). The subsection simply does not say that unless a plan is approved, state law on an issue is pre-empted by the promulgation of a federal standard. In fact it tugs the other way, and in actually providing a mechanism for a State to "assume responsibility" for an issue with respect to which a federal standard has been promulgated (that is, to pre-empt federal law), § 18(b) is far from pre-emptive of anything adopted by the States. Its heading, enacted as part of the statute and properly considered under our canons of construction for whatever light it may shed, see, e.g., Strathearn S. S. Co. v. Dillon, 252 U.S. 348, 354 (1920); FTC v. Mandel Brothers, Inc., 359 U.S. 385 (1959), speaks expressly of the "development and enforcement of State standards to preempt applicable Federal standards." The provision does not in any way provide that absent such state pre-emption of federal rules, the State may not even supplement the federal standards with consistent regulations of its own. Once again, nothing in the provision's language speaks one way or the other to the question whether promulgation of a federal standard pre-empts state regulation, or whether, in the absence of a plan, consistent federal and state regulations may coexist. The provision thus makes perfect sense on the assumption that a dual regulatory scheme is permissible but subject to state pre-emption if the State wishes to shoulder enough of the federal mandate to gain approval of a plan.

Nor does the provision setting out conditions for the Secretary's approval of a plan indicate that a state regulation on an issue federally addressed is never enforceable unless incorporated in a plan so approved. Subsection (c)(2) requires the Secretary to approve a plan when in her judgment, among other things, it will not "unduly burden interstate commerce." 29 U.S.C. § 667(c)(2). Respondent argues, and the plurality concludes, that if state regulations were not pre-empted, this provision would somehow suggest that States acting independently could enforce regulations that did burden interstate commerce unduly. But this simply does not follow. The subsection puts a limit on the Secretary's authority to approve a plan that burdens interstate commerce, thus capping the discretion that might otherwise have been read into the congressional delegation of authority to the Secretary to approve state plans. From this restriction applying only to the Secretary's federal authority it is clearly a non sequitur to conclude that pre-emption must have been intended to avoid the equally objectionable undue burden that independent state regulation might otherwise impose. Quite the contrary; the dormant Commerce Clause can take care of that, without any need to assume pre-emption.

The final provision that arguably suggests pre-emption merely by promulgation of a federal standard is § 18(h), 29 U. S. C. § 667(h):

"(h) Temporary enforcement of State standards"
"The Secretary may enter into an agreement with a State under which the State will be permitted to continue to enforce one or more occupational health and safety standards in effect in such State until final action is taken by the Secretary with respect to a plan submitted by a State under subsection (b) of this section, or two years from December 29, 1970, whichever is earlier."

This provision of course expired in 1972, but its language may suggest something about the way Congress understood the rest of § 18. Since, all are agreed, a State would not have had reason to file a plan unless a federal standard was in place, § 18(h) necessarily refers to a situation in which there is a federal standard. Respondent argues that the provision for agreements authorizing continued enforcement of a state standard following adoption of a federal standard on the issue it addresses implies that, absent such agreement, a State would have been barred from enforcing any standard of its own.

Once again, however, that is not the necessary implication of the text. A purely permissive provision for enforcement of state regulations does not imply that all state regulations are otherwise unenforceable. All it necessarily means is that the Secretary could agree to permit the State for a limited time to enforce whatever state regulations would otherwise have been pre-empted, as would have been true when they actually so conflicted with the federal standard that an employer could not comply with them and still comply with federal law as well. Thus, in the case of a State wishing to submit a plan, the provision as I read it would have allowed for the possibility of just one transition, from the pre-Act state law to the post-Act state plan. Read as the Court reads it, however, employers and employees in such a State would have been subjected first to state law on a given issue; then, after promulgation of a federal standard, to that standard; and then, after approval of the plan, to a new state regime. One enforced readjustment would have been better than two, and the statute is better read accordingly.

Regarding the first cross-current in preemption cases – differing views on how to determine congressional intent, particularly the extent to which legislative history can be used to make that determination – Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part, cautioned in Bates v. Dow Agrosciences LLC. against any broad use of legislative history. He stated, “The majority notes that Congress must have intended to preserve common-law suits, because the legislative history does not indicate that Congress meant to abrogate such suits. For the Court, then, enacting a pre-emption provision is not enough. Either Congress must speak with added specificity in the statute (to avoid the presumption against pre-emption) or some individuals Members of Congress or congressional committees must display their preference

Thus, state tort law inadequate warning label claims were preempted.); id. at 2582 (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, Breyer & Kagan, JJ., dissenting). The result of the majority’s opinions in these two cases is that drug labels which the initial manufacturer comes to know are faulty can continue to be sold under a generic equivalent without change, and affected individuals have no legal recourse, since the generic makers are not liable in any way under PLIVA, Inc. and Bartlett, and the original manufacturer is not be liable because they would not have sold the drug to the affected individual. Reflecting the impact of the cross-currents caused by the conservative predisposition to defer to states, but also to be skeptical of business regulations versus the liberal predisposition to defer to the federal government, but also be supportive of business regulation, a number of recent preemption cases have favored business interests, while state regulations on business supplementing federal regulation have sometimes survived the Court’s express and implied preemption analysis.
In the field of immigration regulation, a 5-3 Court held in Arizona v. United States that Arizona was preempted by federal immigration law from enacting provisions making the failure to comply with federal alien-registration requirements a state misdemeanor, making it a misdemeanor for an unauthorized alien to seek or engage in work in Arizona, and a provision authorizing state arrests for any individual if the officer has probable cause to believe the individual has committed some other offense that would make the individual removable from the United States. In contrast, a provision requiring officers conducting stops, detentions, or arrests to verify a person's immigration status with the federal government if the officer has a reasonable suspicion that the person was unlawfully in the United States was not facially preempted, since it could be applied consistent with federal immigration law. However, the Court warned the provision could be challenged on an as-applied basis if the stops resulted in prolonged detention or otherwise were done inconsistent with federal policy, such as if done on a racially discriminatory basis. Three Justices dissented.

In Crosby v. National Foreign Trade Council, the Court held that a state law imposing penalties on United States or foreign companies doing business in Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, undermined the president’s ability to conduct foreign policy and were preempted by Congress, which has passed legislation to punish Myanmar. For the Court, Justice Souter said, “It is simply implausible that Congress would have gone to such lengths to empower the president if it had been willing to compromise his effectiveness by deference to every provision of state statute or local ordinance that might, if enforced, blunt the consequences of discretionary presidential action.”

§ 13.3 The Dormant Commerce Clause Doctrine

1. The Evolution of Standards for Dormant Commerce Clause Review

Dormant commerce clause review is not based upon any literal text in the Constitution. Nor is it based on the express purpose of the Commerce Clause, which is merely to grant commerce power to Congress. Rather, it is based on the Court’s view of an implied, or silent, purpose behind the Commerce Clause. That implied purpose is to ensure that the basic purpose of the Commerce Clause, identified as far back as Gibbons v. Ogden as ensuring national economic solutions to national economic problems, is not frustrated by state or local parochial legislation. The doctrine has developed in common-law fashion, and its contours have shifted with each succeeding Court era.

A. The Original Natural Law Era: 1789-1873

During the original natural law era, the Court was faced more with defining federal and state constitutional power to regulate, as discussed in 1824 in Gibbons v. Ogden, excerpted at § 5.4, rather than the interplay between federal and state power when both have the power to regulate. The Taney Court held in 1837 that the power of the state to regulate derives from the state’s own police powers, not from a delegated grant of power from the Commerce Clause.

23 v. Deal, 691 F.3d 1250 (11th Cir. 2012) (same, with respect to Georgia law); Villas at Parkside Partners v. Farmers Branch, Texas, 675 F.3d 802 (5th Cir. 2012) (local occupancy restriction requiring rental tenants to be in the country lawfully is an immigration law posing as a housing regulation, and is preempted), aff’d, 726 F.3d 524 (5th Cir. 2013) (9-6 en banc), cert. denied, 134 S. Ct. 1491 (2014). But see Keller v. City of Fremont, 719 F.3d 931 (8th Cir. 2013) (local occupancy regulation barring renting to illegal aliens not preempted), cert. denied, 134 S. Ct. 2140 (2014).

In 1856, the Taney Court noted in Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co.,\(^26\) that while the Court will make an initial determination in dormant commerce clause cases whether a particular state statute impermissibly burdens commerce, Congress is the ultimate decisionmaker on whether a conflict exists between state and federal law. Thus, where Congress has constitutional power to regulate under the Commerce Clause, Congress can consent to any state regulation of commerce it wishes, as addressed at § 13.4.1, and, as stated in Article I, § 10, cl. 3, with the consent of Congress, any state can enter into an interstate “Agreement or Compact” with other states. If Congress has consented, no dormant commerce clause challenge can be brought. As with preemption doctrine, this means that, strictly speaking, dormant commerce clause analysis is not ultimately constitutionally determined, but rather a matter of congressional intent.

Despite this fact, in Cooley v. Board of Wardens,\(^27\) decided five years earlier in 1851, Justice Curtis had said, “When it is said that the nature of a power requires that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress, it must be intended to refer to the subjects of that power, and to say they are of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress.” Some subjects, he added, require a single uniform rule. Others require local diversity. By this language, the Court seemed to claim the power in Cooley to identify subjects as exclusively for federal or state law-making. Building on the Cooley theory that some subjects are exclusively for Congress, the Court held in 1869 in Woodruff v. Parham\(^28\) that a state may not regulate commerce purely external to the state, nor impose a discriminatory tax on an article brought into it from another state.

B. The Formalist Era: 1873-1937

The formalist-era Court continued occasionally to apply the Cooley doctrine. For example, in 1877 in Hannibal v. Husen,\(^29\) the Court held that it was unconstitutional for Missouri to bar the import of all Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle from March to November, without regard to whether there was any possibility of the cattle being diseased, despite the state’s concern that some of these cattle may have the “Spanish or Texas fever.” Similarly, in 1886 in Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Co. v. Illinois,\(^30\) the Court held unconstitutional under the Cooley doctrine an Illinois railroad regulation as interfering with the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate railroad commerce.

\(^{27}\) 53 U.S. (12 How.) 299, 319 (1851).

\(^{28}\) 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 123, 138-40 (1869).

\(^{29}\) 95 U.S. 465, 469-74 (1877). But see Mintz v. Baldwin, 289 U.S. 346, 349-52 (1933) (state was allowed to require imported cattle to be from a herd certified free of Bang's disease).

Since 1937, the Court has not relied upon Cooley, but has phrased dormant commerce clause analysis as ultimately a matter of congressional intent. Towards the end of the formalist era, the Court held in 1936 in Baldwin v. Seelig\textsuperscript{31} that the Commerce Clause bars state laws whose purpose and effect is to suppress the consequences of competition between states, with Justice Cardozo saying, "The peoples of the several states must sink or swim together."

C. The Holmesian Era: 1937-1954

As the Court did with many doctrines at the beginning of the Holmesian era in 1937, the Court adopted a functional test that depended upon the impact of the state regulation on the free flow of commerce. Building on Baldwin v. Seelig, the underlying theory behind dormant commerce clause review was phrased in 1946 in Freeman v. Hewit as follows: “The very purpose of the Commerce Clause was to create an area of free trade among the several states. . . . It is now established beyond dispute that the Commerce Clause was not merely an authorization to Congress to enact laws for the protection and encouragement of commerce among the States, but by its own force created an area of trade free from interference by the States.”\textsuperscript{32} The Court reached a similar result in 1949 when New York, to protect its local economy, refused to license the sale of milk destined for export. In H.P. Hood & Sons, Inc. v. Du Mond, Justice Jackson said: “Our system, fostered by the Commerce Clause, is that every farmer and every craftsman shall be encouraged to produce by the certainty that he will have free access to every market in the Nation, that no home embargoes will withhold his export, and no foreign state will by customs or duties or regulations exclude them.”\textsuperscript{33}

In general, conservative Justices tend to give greater emphasis to deferring to state governments; more liberal Justices tend to defer to the federal government, as noted at § 8.1.1(E) n.30. Thus, among Holmesian Justices on the Court since 1945, it has tended to be the more conservative Holmesian Justices, like Chief Justice Rehnquist, who have more often supported state attempts at regulation, while more liberal Holmesian Justices, like Justice White, have more often found the state regulations invalid as too great burdens on interstate commerce.\textsuperscript{34}

D. The Instrumentalist Era: 1954-1986

The instrumentalist-era Court between 1954 and 1986 continued a rigorous approach towards dormant commerce clause review. For example, in Bibb v. Navajo, the Court invalidated an Illinois ban on straight mudflaps, which were held to have inconclusive safety benefits while being inconsistent with laws in 45 other states. In Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp., the Court struck down Iowa's ban on 65-foot double semis on the similar ground that it too greatly interfered with the interstate trucking industry with no clear overall safety benefits.

The Court has noted that there are four kinds of dormant commerce clause cases: (1) the state legislation burdens interstate commerce on its face; (2) the state legislation is the product of a purpose to discriminate against interstate commerce; (3) the state legislation has a discriminatory effect on interstate commerce; and (4) the state regulates in-state and out-of-state commerce even-handedly and only involves an incidental effect on interstate commerce. In the first three of these cases, the Court has stated that the burden is on the state to justify its regulation. For state regulation that burdens interstate commerce on its face, the Court places the burden on the state to establish the validity of the enactment, as in Maine v. Taylor. In Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., the Court stated that the same standard applies if the state law has either a discriminatory purpose or effect. With regard to the fourth kind of case, the Court held in Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc.:

If a state statute has only indirect effects on interstate commerce and regulates evenhandedly, the dormant Commerce Clause is violated only if plaintiff shows that the burden on interstate commerce is clearly excessive in relation to local interests. When making that determination, the Court considers the nature of the local interest and whether it could be promoted as well by laws having a lesser impact on interstate activities.

Under the language of the instrumentalist-era cases, the Pike v. Bruce Church test and the Maine v. Taylor test are basically the same, with only the burden shifting. Each focuses on: (1) the state’s sink-or-swim policy of laissez-faire economics would be debatable had Congress chosen to enact it; but Congress has done nothing of the kind. It is the Court which has imposed the policy under the dormant Commerce Clause, a policy which bodes ill for the values of federalism . . . ”).

legitimate, non-protectionist interest; (2) whether the state’s interest could be promoted as well by less discriminatory alternatives; and (3) given these two considerations whether the burden on interstate commerce caused by the state regulation is clearly excessive. As the Court has stated, “In either situation the critical consideration is the overall effect of the statute on both local and interstate activity.”\(^{40}\) In practice, however, the instrumentalist Court stated that there is “a virtual \textit{per se} rule of invalidity” for state legislation facially discriminating against interstate commerce or involving a discriminatory purpose or effect.\(^{41}\)

As the “virtual \textit{per se}” language suggests, it can prove very difficult for the state to meet its burden in cases of discriminatory legislation. For example, in 1978, in \textit{Philadelphia v. New Jersey},\(^ {42}\) the Court said that New Jersey was being "protectionist" when it barred import of waste because it was running out of landfill space. There a state-authorized ban on accepting out-of-state waste discriminated on its face against interstate commerce, so the state had the burden of proving that it furthered health and safety concerns which could not adequately be served by nondiscriminatory alternatives. The Court said that the state had not met this burden because it provided no valid health and safety reason for limiting the amount of waste that a landfill operator may accept from outside the state, but not the amount the operator may accept from inside the state. An overall limit on waste would have met the concern with landfill space and would not have been discriminatory.

In 1979, the same rigorous approach to facial discrimination was applied in \textit{Hughes v. Oklahoma}.\(^ {43}\) In \textit{Hughes}, the Court invalidated a state ban on export of minnows seized within the state, ostensibly an environmental concern with ensuring sufficient minnows remained to repopulate the species. Justice Brennan explained that the state had chosen the most discriminatory means without showing that nondiscriminatory methods, such as an overall ban on minnows seized from state rivers in any one year, were unfeasible. In 1982, in \textit{New England Power Co. v. New Hampshire},\(^ {44}\) a ban on export of electricity generated within a state was struck down as "simple economic protectionism."

However, a ban on export of ground water was sustained in \textit{Sporhase v. Nebraska}.\(^ {45}\) The Court said that the state was not discriminating since it also controlled intrastate transfer of water. Using the \textit{Pike} balancing test, the Court said that the burden on interstate commerce was not excessive.

\(^{42}\) 437 U.S. 617 (1978).

because: (1) the state was taking reasonable measures to protect a vital resource in a time of shortage, (2) its purpose was protecting health, (3) some precedents recognized state power to restrict transfer of water, (4) a state's claim to ownership of groundwater might support a limited preference to its own citizens, and (5) where a conservation program is in place, groundwater is something like the state-produced cement in Reeves, that case discussed at § 13.4.2 n.58.

The instrumentalist Court has noted that even under the Pike test for even-handed state regulations the courts determine for themselves the extent of the legislature’s legitimate purposes, and whether the means adopted reflect a “clearly excessive” burden on interstate commerce. Thus, the courts do not defer to rational basis judgments of the legislature, as they defer to Congress in Commerce Clause cases, noted at § 6.3 nn.25-27, perhaps because of a greater willingness to trust that Congress is regulating in the national interest. In Dormant Commerce Clause cases, the district court will hear the evidence concerning the state’s alleged legitimate interest, as well as evidence concerning the burden on interstate commerce, and then will balance the extent of the state’s benefits against the degree of interference with interstate commerce. As a factual decision made by the district court, this conclusion will be entitled to deference on appeal, and subject to being reversed on only if it is “clearly erroneous.”

2. The Modern Standards for Dormant Commerce Clause Review

Since 1986, the Court has continued to follow the Holmesian and instrumentalist-era dormant commerce clause doctrine. The Court uses the tests stated in Pike v. Bruce Church, excerpted at § 13.3.4, and Maine v. Taylor, excerpted at § 13.3.3, holding that a state law that discriminates against interstate commerce must be justified by the state showing that the law satisfies the higher Taylor standard of (1) serving a legitimate local interest, unrelated to economic protectionism, whose (2) legitimate interest could not be adequately served by reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives.

47 See, e.g., Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp., 450 U.S. 662, 669-71 (1981). Reflecting their predisposition to favor states, conservative Holmesian Justices Stewart and Rehnquist, along with conservative formalist Chief Justice Burger, dissented from this conclusion in Kassel, stating that if a traffic safety law is not merely a pretext for discrimination the Court should ask only whether it is rational. Id. at 691-93 (Rehnquist, J., joined by Burger, C.J., and Stewart, J., dissenting). The rest of the Court, however, rejected this view.

48 See id. at 670-71.

In many cases, the state fails one of these two considerations, and thus the Court does not address the additional issue of whether the law nonetheless represents (3) a “clearly excessive” burden under Pike. Since the Taylor test is phrased as a more rigorous version of Pike, this third requirement logically must be present in both Pike and Taylor kinds of cases. Of course, as addressed at § 13.4.1, federal law, if "unmistakably clear," can sanction state laws that burden interstate commerce in ways the Court would otherwise hold invalid because dormant commerce clause review, like preemption, is ultimately a matter of deciphering congressional intent.

3. Review of Laws that Discriminate Against Interstate Commerce

Dean Milk v. City of Madison
340 U.S. 349 (1951)

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This appeal challenges the constitutional validity of two sections of an ordinance of the City of Madison, Wisconsin, regulating the sale of milk and milk products within the municipality's jurisdiction. One section in issue makes it unlawful to sell any milk as pasteurized unless it has been processed and bottled at an approved pasteurization plant within a radius of five miles from the central square of Madison. Another section, which prohibits the sale of milk, or the importation, receipt or storage of milk for sale, in Madison unless from a source of supply possessing a permit issued after inspection by Madison officials, is attacked insofar as it expressly relieves municipal authorities from any duty to inspect farms located beyond twenty-five miles from . . . the city.

Appellant is an Illinois corporation engaged in distributing milk and milk products in Illinois and Wisconsin. It contended below, as it does here, that both the five-mile limit on pasteurization plants and the twenty-five-mile limit on sources of milk violate the Commerce Clause and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin upheld the five-mile limit on pasteurization. As to the twenty-five-mile limitation the court ordered the complaint dismissed for want of a justiciable controversy. 43 N. W. 2d 480 (1950). This appeal, contesting both rulings, invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under 28 U.S.C. § 1257 (2).

The City of Madison is the county seat of Dane County. Within the county are some 5,600 dairy farms with total raw milk production in excess of 600,000,000 pounds annually and more than ten times the requirements of Madison. Aside from the milk supplied to Madison, fluid milk produced in the county moves in large quantities to Chicago and more distant consuming areas, and the remainder is used in making cheese, butter and other products. At the time of trial the Madison milkshed was not of "Grade A" quality by the standards recommended by the United States Public Health Service, and no milk labeled "Grade A" was distributed in Madison.

For further discussion of why the Taylor test is better viewed as a higher version of the Pike test, with the burden of proof shifted to the state, rather than a separate test, akin to “strict scrutiny,” such as is applied under the Equal Protection Clause, see Charles D. Kelso & R. Randall Kelso, THE PATH OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 20.3.2.2 (2007) (http://libguides.stcl.edu/kelsonmaterials).

The area defined by the ordinance with respect to milk sources encompasses practically all of Dane County and includes some 500 farms which supply milk for Madison. Within the five-mile area for pasteurization are plants of five processors, only three of which are engaged in the general wholesale and retail trade in Madison. Inspection of these farms and plants is scheduled once every thirty days and is performed by two municipal inspectors, one of whom is full-time. The courts below found that the ordinance in question promotes convenient, economical and efficient plant inspection.

Appellant purchases and gathers milk from approximately 950 farms in northern Illinois and southern Wisconsin, none being within twenty-five miles of Madison. Its pasteurization plants are located at Chemung and Huntley, Illinois, about 65 and 85 miles respectively from Madison. Appellant was denied a license to sell its products within Madison solely because its pasteurization plants were more than five miles away.

It is conceded that the milk which appellant seeks to sell in Madison is supplied from farms and processed in plants licensed and inspected by public health authorities of Chicago, and is labeled "Grade A" under the Chicago ordinance which adopts the rating standards recommended by the United States Public Health Service. Both the Chicago and Madison ordinances, though not the sections of the latter here in issue, are largely patterned after the Model Milk Ordinance of the Public Health Service. However, Madison contends and we assume that in some particulars its ordinance is more rigorous than that of Chicago.

[T]his regulation, like the provision invalidated in Baldwin v. Seelig, Inc., [294 U.S. 511 (1935)], in practical effect excludes from distribution in Madison wholesome milk produced and pasteurized in Illinois. "The importer . . . may keep his milk or drink it, but sell it he may not." Id., at 521. In thus erecting an economic barrier protecting a major local industry against competition from without the State, Madison plainly discriminates against interstate commerce. [FN 4: It is immaterial that Wisconsin milk from outside the Madison area is subjected to the same as that moving in interstate commerce.] This it cannot do, even in the exercise of its unquestioned power to protect the health and safety of its people, if reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives, adequate to conserve legitimate local interests, are available. Our issue then is whether the discrimination inherent in the Madison ordinance can be justified in view of the character of the local interests and the available methods of protecting them. Cf. Union Brokerage Co. v. Jensen, 322 U.S. 202, 211 (1944).

It appears that reasonable and adequate alternatives are available. If the City of Madison prefers to rely upon its own officials for inspection of distant milk sources, such inspection is readily open to it without hardship for it could charge the actual and reasonable cost of such inspection to the importing producers and processors. Cf. Sprout v. City of South Bend, 277 U.S. 163, 169 (1928); see Miller v. Williams, 12 F. Supp. 236, 242, 244 (D. Md. 1935). Moreover, appellee Health Commissioner of Madison testified that as proponent of the local milk ordinance he had submitted the provisions here in controversy and an alternative proposal based on § 11 of the Model Milk Ordinance recommended by the United States Public Health Service. The model provision imposes no geographical limitation on location of milk sources and processing plants but excludes from the municipality milk not produced and pasteurized conformably to standards as high as those enforced by the receiving city. In implementing such an ordinance, the importing city obtains milk ratings based on uniform standards and established by health authorities in the jurisdiction where production and processing occur. The receiving city may determine the extent of enforcement of sanitary standards in the exporting area by verifying the accuracy of safety ratings of specific plants or of the milkshed in the distant jurisdiction through the United States Public Health Service, which routinely and on request spot checks the local ratings. The Commissioner testified that Madison consumers "would be safeguarded adequately" under either proposal and that he had expressed no preference. To permit Madison to adopt a regulation not essential for the protection of local health interests and placing a discriminatory burden on interstate commerce would invite a multiplication of preferential trade areas destructive of the very purpose of the Commerce Clause. Under the circumstances here presented, the regulation must yield to the principle that "one state in its dealings with another may not place itself in a position of economic isolation." Baldwin v. Seelig, Inc., supra, at 527.

For these reasons we conclude that the judgment below sustaining the five-mile provision as to pasteurization must be reversed.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin thought it unnecessary to pass upon the validity of the twenty-five-mile limitation, apparently in part for the reason that this issue was made academic by its decision upholding the five-mile section. In view of our conclusion as to the latter provision, a determination of appellant's contention as to the other section is now necessary. As to this issue, therefore, we vacate the judgment below and remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with the principles announced in this opinion.

Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Commission
432 U.S. 333 (1977)

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1973, North Carolina enacted a statute which required, inter alia, all closed containers of apples sold, offered for sale, or shipped into the State to bear “no grade other than the applicable U.S. grade or standard.” N.C. Gen. Stat. § 106-189.1 (1973). In an action brought by the Washington State Apple Advertising Commission, a three-judge Federal District Court invalidated the statute insofar as it prohibited the display of Washington State apple grades on the ground that it unconstitutionally discriminated against interstate commerce.

Washington State is the Nation's largest producer of apples, its crops accounting for approximately 30% of all apples grown domestically and nearly half of all apples shipped in closed containers in interstate commerce. As might be expected, the production and sale of apples on this scale is a multimillion dollar enterprise which plays a significant role in Washington's economy. Because of the importance of the apple industry to the State, its legislature has undertaken to protect and enhance the reputation of Washington apples by establishing a stringent, mandatory inspection program, administered by the State's Department of Agriculture, which requires all apples shipped in interstate commerce to be tested under strict quality standards and graded accordingly. In all cases, the Washington State grades, which have gained substantial acceptance in the trade, are the equivalent of, or superior to, the comparable grades and standards adopted by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA). Compliance with the Washington inspection scheme costs the State's growers approximately $1 million each year.

In 1972, the North Carolina Board of Agriculture adopted an administrative regulation, unique in the 50 States, which in effect required all closed containers of apples shipped into or sold in the State to display either the applicable USDA grade or none at all. State grades were expressly prohibited.
In addition to its obvious consequence prohibiting the display of Washington State apple grades on containers of apples shipped into North Carolina, the regulation presented the Washington apply industry with a marketing problem of potentially nationwide significance. Washington apple growers annually ship in commerce approximately 40 million closed containers of apples, nearly 500,000 of which eventually find their way into North Carolina, stamped with the applicable Washington State variety and grade. It is the industry's practice to purchase these containers preprinted with the various apple varieties and grades, prior to harvest. After these containers are filled with apples of the appropriate type and grade, a substantial portion of them are placed in cold-storage warehouses where the grade labels identify the product and facilitate its handling.
These apples are then shipped as needed throughout the year; after February 1 of each year, they constitute approximately two-thirds of all apples sold in fresh markets in this country. Since the ultimate destination of these apples is unknown at the time they are placed in storage, compliance with North Carolina's unique regulation would have required Washington growers to obliterate the printed labels on containers shipped to North Carolina, thus giving their product a damaged appearance. Alternatively, they could have changed their marketing practices to accommodate the needs of the North Carolina market, i.e., repack apples to be shipped to North Carolina in containers bearing only the USDA grade, and/or store the estimated portion of the harvest destined for that market in such special containers. As a last resort, they could discontinue the use of the preprinted containers entirely. None of these costly and less efficient options was very attractive to the industry.
Moreover, in the event a number of other States followed North Carolina's lead, the resultant inability to display the Washington grades could force the Washington growers to abandon the State's expensive inspection and grading system which their customers had come to know and rely on over the 60-odd years of its existence.

As the District Court correctly found, the challenged statute has the practical effect of not only burdening interstate sales of Washington apples, but also discriminating against them. This discrimination takes various forms. The first, and most obvious, is the statute's consequence of raising the costs of doing business in the North Carolina market for Washington apple growers and dealers, while leaving those of their North Carolina counterparts unaffected.
Second, the statute has the effect of stripping away from the Washington apple industry the competitive and economic advantages it has earned for itself through its expensive inspection and grading system.

Third, by prohibiting Washington growers and dealers from marketing apples under their State's grades, the statute has a leveling effect which insidiously operates to the advantage of local apple producers. As noted earlier, the Washington State grades are equal or superior to the USDA grades in all corresponding categories. Hence, with free market forces at work, Washington sellers would normally enjoy a distinct market advantage vis-a-vis local producers in those categories where the Washington grade is superior. However, because of the statute's operation, Washington apples which would otherwise qualify for and be sold under the superior Washington grades will now have to be marketed under their inferior USDA counterparts.

Despite the statute's facial neutrality, the Commission suggests that its discriminatory impact on interstate commerce was not an unintended byproduct and there are some indications in the record to that effect. The most glaring is the response of the North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner to the Commission's request for an exemption following the statute's passage in which he indicated that before he could support such an exemption, he would “want to have the sentiment from our apple producers since they were mainly responsible for this legislation being passed . . . .” App. 21 (emphasis added). Moreover, we find it somewhat suspect that North Carolina singled out only closed containers of apples, the very means by which apples are transported in commerce, to effectuate the statute's ostensible consumer protection purpose when apples are not generally sold at retail in their shipping containers. However, we need not ascribe an economic protection motive to the North Carolina Legislature to resolve this case; we conclude that the challenged statute cannot stand insofar as it prohibits the display of Washington State grades even if enacted for the declared purpose of protecting consumers from deception and fraud in the marketplace.

When discrimination against commerce of the type we have found is demonstrated, the burden falls on the State to justify it both in terms of the local benefits flowing from the statute and the unavailability of nondiscriminatory alternatives adequate to preserve the local interests at stake. Dean Milk Co. v. Madison, 340 U.S. at 354. North Carolina has failed to sustain that burden on both scores.

The several States unquestionably possess a substantial interest in protecting their citizens from confusion and deception in the marketing of foodstuffs, but the challenged statute does remarkably little to further that laudable goal at least with respect to Washington apples and grades. The statute, as already noted, permits the marketing of closed containers of apples under no grades at all. Such a result can hardly be thought to eliminate the problems of deception and confusion created by the multiplicity of differing state grades; indeed, it magnifies them by depriving purchasers of all information concerning the quality of the contents of closed apple containers. Moreover, although the statute is ostensibly a consumer protection measure, it directs its primary efforts, not at the consuming public at large, but at apple wholesalers and brokers who are the principal purchasers of closed containers of apples. And those individuals are presumably the most knowledgeable individuals in this area. Since the statute does nothing at all to purify the flow of information at the retail level, it does little to protect consumers against the problems it was designed to eliminate.

In addition, it appears that nondiscriminatory alternatives to the outright ban of Washington State grades are readily available. For example, North Carolina could effectuate its goal by permitting out-of-state growers to utilize state grades only if they also marked their shipments with the applicable USDA label. In that case, the USDA grade would serve as a benchmark against which the consumer could evaluate the quality of the various state grades. If this alternative was for some reason inadequate to eradicate problems caused by state grades inferior to those adopted by the USDA, North Carolina might consider banning those state grades which, unlike Washington's, could not be demonstrated to be equal or superior to the corresponding USDA categories. Concededly, even in this latter instance, some potential for "confusion" might persist. However, it is the type of "confusion" that the national interest in the free flow of goods between the States demands be tolerated. [Ed.: That is, even if the statute did advance legitimate interests with no less discriminatory alternatives, it would still be invalid as an "clearly excessive" burden on "the free flow of goods" in interstate commerce.]

Maine v. Taylor

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellee Robert J. Taylor (hereafter Taylor or appellee) operates a bait business in Maine. Despite a Maine statute prohibiting the importation of live baitfish, he arranged to have 158,000 live golden shiners delivered to him from outside the State. The shipment was intercepted, and a federal grand jury in the District of Maine indicted Taylor for violating and conspiring to violate the Lacey Act Amendments of 1981, 95 Stat. 1073, 16 U.S.C. §§ 3371-3378. Section 3(a)(2)(A) of those Amendments, 16 U.S.C. § 3372(a)(2)(A), makes it a federal crime "to import, export, transport, sell, receive, acquire, or purchase in interstate or foreign commerce . . . any fish or wildlife taken, possessed, transported, or sold in violation of any law or regulation of any State or in violation of any foreign law."

The Commerce Clause of the Constitution grants Congress the power "[to] regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." Art. I, § 8, cl. 3. Although the Clause thus speaks in terms of powers bestowed upon Congress, the Court long has recognized that it also limits the power of the States to erect barriers against interstate trade." Lewis v. BT Investment Managers, Inc., 447 U.S. 27, 35 (1980). Maine's statute restricts interstate trade in the most direct manner possible, blocking all inward shipments of live baitfish at the State's border. Still, as both the District Court and the Court of Appeals recognized, this fact alone does not render the law unconstitutional. The limitation imposed by the Commerce Clause on state regulatory power "is by no means absolute," and "the States retain authority under their general police powers to regulate matters of 'legitimate local concern,' even though interstate commerce may be affected." Id., at 36.
In determining whether a State has overstepped its role in regulating interstate commerce, this Court has distinguished between state statutes that burden interstate transactions only incidentally, and those that affirmatively discriminate against such transactions. While statutes in the first group violate the Commerce Clause only if the burdens they impose on interstate trade are "clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits," Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142 (1970), statutes in the second group are subject to more demanding scrutiny. The Court explained in Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S., at 336, that once a state law is shown to discriminate against interstate commerce "either on its face or in practical effect," the burden falls on the State to demonstrate both that the statute "serves a legitimate local purpose," and that this purpose could not be served as well by available nondiscriminatory means. See also, e.g., Sporhase v. Nebraska ex rel. Douglas, 458 U.S. 941, 957 (1982); Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 353 (1977); Dean Milk Co. v. Madison, 340 U.S. 349, 354 (1951)

The District Court and the Court of Appeals both reasoned correctly that, since Maine's import ban discriminates on its face against interstate trade, it should be subject to the strict requirements of Hughes v. Oklahoma, notwithstanding Maine's argument that those requirements were waived by the Lacey Act Amendments of 1981. It is well established that Congress may authorize the States to engage in regulation that the Commerce Clause would otherwise forbid. See, e.g., Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona ex rel. Sullivan, 325 U.S. 761, 769 (1945). But because of the important role the Commerce Clause plays in protecting the free flow of interstate trade, this Court has exempted state statutes from the implied limitations of the Clause only when the congressional direction to do so has been "unmistakably clear." South-Central Timber Development, Inc. v. Wunnicke, 467 U.S. 82, 91 (1984). The 1981 Amendments of the Lacey Act clearly provide for federal enforcement of valid state and foreign wildlife laws, but Maine identifies nothing in the text or legislative history of the Amendments that suggests Congress wished to validate state laws that would be unconstitutional without federal approval.

Before this Court, Maine concedes that the Lacey Act Amendments do not exempt state wildlife legislation from scrutiny under the Commerce Clause. See Reply Brief for Appellant 3, n.2. The State insists, however, that the Amendments should lower the intensity of the scrutiny that would otherwise be applied. We do not agree. An unambiguous indication of congressional intent is required before a federal statute will be read to authorize otherwise invalid state legislation, regardless of whether the purported authorization takes the form of a flat exemption from Commerce Clause scrutiny or the less direct form of a reduction in the level of scrutiny. Absent "a clear expression of approval by Congress," any relaxation in the restrictions on state power otherwise imposed by the Commerce Clause unacceptably increases "the risk that unrepresented interests will be adversely affected by restraints on commerce." South-Central Timber, supra, at 92.

The District Court found after an evidentiary hearing that both parts of the Hughes test were satisfied, but the Court of Appeals disagreed. We conclude that the Court of Appeals erred in setting aside the findings of the District Court. To explain why, we need to discuss the proceedings below in some detail.
The evidentiary hearing on which the District Court based its conclusions was one before a Magistrate. Three scientific experts testified for the prosecution and one for the defense. The prosecution experts testified that live baitfish imported into the State posed two significant threats to Maine's unique and fragile fisheries. First, Maine's population of wild fish – including its own indigenous golden shiners – would be placed at risk by three types of parasites prevalent in out-of-state baitfish, but not common to wild fish in Maine. See, e.g., App. 39-55. Second, nonnative species inadvertently included in shipments of live baitfish could disturb Maine's aquatic ecology to an unpredictable extent by competing with native fish for food or habitat, by preying on native species, or by disrupting the environment in more subtle ways. See, e.g., id., at 59-70, 141-149.

The prosecution experts further testified that there was no satisfactory way to inspect shipments of live baitfish for parasites or commingled species. According to their testimony, the small size of baitfish and the large quantities in which they are shipped made inspection for commingled species "a physical impossibility." Id., at 81. Parasite inspection posed a separate set of difficulties because the examination procedure required destruction of the fish. Id., at 81-82, 195. Although statistical sampling and inspection techniques had been developed for salmonids (i.e., salmon and trout), so that a shipment could be certified parasite-free based on a standardized examination of only some of the fish, no scientifically accepted procedures of this sort were available for baitfish. See, e.g., id., at 71, 184, 193-194.

Appellee's expert denied that any scientific justification supported Maine's total ban on the importation of baitfish. Id., at 241. He testified that none of the three parasites discussed by the prosecution witnesses posed any significant threat to fish in the wild, id., at 206-212, 228-232, and that sampling techniques had not been developed for baitfish precisely because there was no need for them. Id., at 265-266. He further testified that professional baitfish farmers raise their fish in ponds that have been freshly drained to ensure that no other species is inadvertently collected. Id., at 239-240.

Weighing all the testimony, the Magistrate concluded that both prongs of the Hughes test were satisfied, and accordingly that appellee's motion to dismiss the indictment should be denied. Appellee filed objections, but the District Court, after an independent review of the evidence, reached the same conclusions. First, the court found that Maine "clearly has a legitimate and substantial purpose in prohibiting the importation of live bait fish," because "substantial uncertainties" surrounded the effects that baitfish parasites would have on the State's unique population of wild fish, and the consequences of introducing nonnative species were similarly unpredictable. 585 F.Supp., at 397. Second, the court concluded that less discriminatory means of protecting against these threats were currently unavailable, and that, in particular, testing procedures for baitfish parasites had not yet been devised. Id., at 398. Even if procedures of this sort could be effective, the court found that their development probably would take a considerable amount of time. Id., at 398, n.11.

Although the Court of Appeals did not expressly set aside the District Court's finding of a legitimate local purpose, it noted that several factors "cast doubt" on that finding. 752 F.2d, at 762. First, Maine was apparently the only State to bar all importation of live baitfish. See id., at 761. Second, Maine accepted interstate shipments of other freshwater fish, subject to an inspection requirement. Third, "an aura of economic protectionism" surrounded statements made in 1981 by the Maine Department of Inland Fisheries and Wildlife in opposition to a proposal by appellee himself to repeal the ban. Ibid. Finally, the court noted that parasites and nonnative species could be transported into Maine in shipments of nonbaitfish, and that nothing prevented fish from simply swimming into the State from New Hampshire. Id., at 762, n.12.

Although the proffered justification for any local discrimination against interstate commerce must be subjected to "the strictest scrutiny," Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S., at 337, the empirical component of that scrutiny, like any other form of factfinding, "is the basic responsibility of district courts, rather than appellate courts," Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 291 (1982), quoting DeMarco v. United States, 415 U.S. 449, 450, n. (1974). As this Court frequently has emphasized, appellate courts are not to decide factual questions de novo, reversing any findings they would have made differently. See, e.g., Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573 (1985); Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 123 (1969). The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure contain no counterpart to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(a), which expressly provides that findings of fact made by the trial judge "shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous." But the considerations underlying Rule 52(a) – the demands of judicial efficiency, the expertise developed by trial judges, and the importance of first-hand observation, all apply with full force in the criminal context, at least with respect to factual questions having nothing to do with guilt. Accordingly the "clearly erroneous" standard of review long has been applied to nonguilt findings of fact by district courts in criminal cases. See Campbell v. United States, 373 U.S. 487, 493 (1963); 2 C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure § 374 (2d ed. 1982). We need not decide now whether all such findings should be reviewed under the "clearly erroneous" standard, because appellee concedes that the standard applies to the factual findings made by the District Court in this case. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 27. We note, however, that no broader review is authorized here simply because this is a constitutional case, or because the factual findings at issue may determine the outcome of the case. See Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 501 (1984); Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S., at 287.

No matter how one describes the abstract issue whether “alternative means could promote this local purpose as well without discriminating against interstate commerce," Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S., at 336, the more specific question whether scientifically accepted techniques exist for the sampling and inspection of live baitfish is one of fact, and the District Court's finding that such techniques have not been devised cannot be characterized as clearly erroneous. Indeed, the record probably could not support a contrary finding. Two prosecution witnesses testified to the lack of such procedures, and appellee's expert conceded the point, although he disagreed about the need for such tests. See App. 74-75, 184, 265-266. That Maine has allowed the importation of other freshwater fish after inspection hardly demonstrates that the District Court clearly erred in crediting the corroborated and uncontradicted expert testimony that standardized inspection techniques had not yet been developed for baitfish. This is particularly so because the text of the permit statute suggests that it was designed specifically to regulate importation of salmonids, for which, the experts testified, testing procedures had been developed.
The Commerce Clause significantly limits the ability of States and localities to regulate or otherwise burden the flow of interstate commerce, but it does not elevate free trade above all other values. As long as a State does not needlessly obstruct interstate trade or attempt to "place itself in a position of economic isolation," Baldwin v. G.A.F. Seelig, Inc., 294 U.S. 511, 527 (1935), it retains broad regulatory authority to protect the health and safety of its citizens and the integrity of its natural resources. The evidence in this case amply supports the District Court's findings that Maine's ban on the importation of live baitfish serves legitimate local purposes that could not adequately be served by available nondiscriminatory alternatives. This is not a case of arbitrary discrimination against interstate commerce; the record suggests that Maine has legitimate reasons, "apart from their origin, to treat [out-of-state baitfish] differently," Philadelphia v. New Jersey, 437 U.S., at 627. The judgment of the Court of Appeals setting aside appellee's conviction is therefore reversed.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

There is something fishy about this case. Maine is the only State in the Union that blatantly discriminates against out-of-state baitfish by flatly prohibiting their importation. Although golden shiners are already present and thriving in Maine (and, perhaps not coincidentally, the subject of a flourishing domestic industry), Maine excludes golden shiners grown and harvested (and, perhaps not coincidentally, sold) in other States. This kind of stark discrimination against out-of-state articles of commerce requires rigorous justification by the discriminating State. "When discrimination against commerce of the type we have found is demonstrated, the burden falls on the State to justify it both in terms of the local benefits flowing from the statute and the unavailability of nondiscriminatory alternatives adequate to preserve the local interests at stake." Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 353 (1977).

Like the District Court, the Court concludes that uncertainty about possible ecological effects from the possible presence of parasites and nonnative species in shipments of out-of-state shiners suffices to carry the State's burden of proving a legitimate public purpose. The Court similarly concludes that the State has no obligation to develop feasible inspection procedures that would make a total ban unnecessary. It seems clear, however, that the presumption should run the other way. Since the State engages in obvious discrimination against out-of-state commerce, it should be put to its proof. Ambiguity about dangers and alternatives should actually defeat, rather than sustain, the discriminatory measure.

Significantly, the Court of Appeals, which is more familiar with Maine's natural resources and with its legislation than we are, was concerned by the uniqueness of Maine's ban. That court felt, as I do, that Maine's unquestionable natural splendor notwithstanding, the State has not carried its substantial burden of proving why it cannot meet its environmental concerns in the same manner as other States with the same interest in the health of their fish and ecology.

I respectfully dissent.
4. Laws That are Non-Discriminatory in Purpose or Effect

Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc.
397 U.S. 137 (1970)

Justice STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellee is a company engaged in extensive commercial farming operations in Arizona and California. The appellant is the official charged with enforcing the Arizona Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act.

A provision of the Act requires that, with certain exceptions, all cantaloupes grown in Arizona and offered for sale must "be packed in regular compact arrangement in closed standard containers approved by the supervisor." Invoking his authority under that provision, the appellant issued an order prohibiting the appellee company from transporting uncrated cantaloupes from its Parker, Arizona, ranch to nearby Blythe, California, for packing and processing. The company then brought this action in a federal court to enjoin the order as unconstitutional. A three-judge court was convened. 28 U.S.C. §§ 2281, 2284. After first granting temporary relief, the court issued a permanent injunction upon the ground that the challenged order constituted an unlawful burden upon interstate commerce. This appeal followed. 28 U.S.C. § 1253. 396 U.S. 812.

The facts are not in dispute, having been stipulated by the parties. The appellee company has for many years been engaged in the business of growing, harvesting, processing, and packing fruits and vegetables at numerous locations in Arizona and California for interstate shipment to markets throughout the Nation. One of the company's newest operations is at Parker, Arizona, where, pursuant to a 1964 lease with the Secretary of the Interior, the Colorado River Indian Agency, and the Colorado River Indian Tribes, it undertook to develop approximately 6,400 acres of uncultivated, arid land for agricultural use. The company has spent more than $3,000,000 in clearing, leveling, irrigating, and otherwise developing this land. The company began growing cantaloupes on part of the land in 1966, and has harvested a large cantaloupe crop there in each subsequent year. The cantaloupes are considered to be of higher quality than those grown in other areas of the State. Because they are highly perishable, cantaloupes must upon maturity be immediately harvested, processed, packed, and shipped in order to prevent spoilage. The processing and packing operations can be performed only in packing sheds. Because the company had no such facilities at Parker, it transported its 1966 Parker cantaloupe harvest in bulk loads to Blythe, California, 31 miles away, where it operated centralized and efficient packing shed facilities. There the melons were sorted, inspected, packed, and shipped. In 1967 the company again sent its Parker cantaloupe crop to Blythe for sorting, packing, and shipping. In 1968, however, the appellant entered the order here in issue, prohibiting the company from shipping its cantaloupes out of the State unless they were packed in containers in a manner and of a kind approved by the appellant. Because cantaloupes in the quantity involved can be so packed only in packing sheds, and because no such facilities were available to the company at Parker or anywhere else nearby in Arizona, the company faced imminent loss of its anticipated 1968 cantaloupe crop in the gross amount of $700,000. It was to prevent this unrecoverable loss that the District Court granted preliminary relief.
After discovery proceedings, an agreed statement of facts was filed with the court. It contained a stipulation that the practical effect of the appellant's order would be to compel the company to build packing facilities in or near Parker, Arizona, that would take many months to construct and would cost approximately $200,000. After briefing and argument, the court issued a permanent injunction, finding that "the order complained of constitutes an unlawful burden upon interstate commerce.

Although the criteria for determining the validity of state statutes affecting interstate commerce have been variously stated, the general rule that emerges can be phrased as follows: Where the statute regulates even-handedly to effectuate a legitimate local public interest, and its effects on interstate commerce are only incidental, it will be upheld unless the burden imposed on such commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits. Huron Cement Co. v. Detroit, 362 U.S. 440, 443. If a legitimate local purpose is found, then the question becomes one of degree. And the extent of the burden that will be tolerated will of course depend on the nature of the local interest involved, and on whether it could be promoted as well with a lesser impact on interstate activities.

At the core of the Arizona Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act are the requirements that fruits and vegetables shipped from Arizona meet certain standards of wholesomeness and quality, and that they be packed in standard containers in such a way that the outer layer or exposed portion of the pack does not "materially misrepresent" the quality of the lot as a whole. The impetus for the Act was the fear that some growers were shipping inferior or deceptively packaged produce, with the result that the reputation of Arizona growers generally was being tarnished and their financial return concomitantly reduced. It was to prevent this that the Act was passed in 1929. The State has stipulated that its primary purpose is to promote and preserve the reputation of Arizona growers by prohibiting deceptive packaging.

We are not, then, dealing here with "state legislation in the field of safety where the propriety of local regulation has long been recognized," or with an Act designed to protect consumers in Arizona from contaminated or unfit goods. Its purpose and design are simply to protect and enhance the reputation of growers within the State. These are surely legitimate state interests. We have upheld a State's power to require that produce packaged in the State be packaged in a particular kind of receptacle, Pacific States Box & Basket Co. v. White, 296 U.S. 176. And we have recognized the legitimate interest of a State in maximizing the financial return to an industry within it. Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341. Therefore, as applied to Arizona growers who package their produce in Arizona, we may assume the constitutional validity of the Act. We may further assume that Arizona has full constitutional power to forbid the misleading use of its name on produce that was grown or packed elsewhere. And, to the extent the Act forbids the shipment of contaminated or unfit produce, it clearly rests on sure footing.

But application of the Act through the appellant's order to the appellee company has a far different impact, and quite a different purpose. The cantaloupes grown by the company at Parker are of exceptionally high quality. The company does not pack them in Arizona and cannot do so without making a capital expenditure of approximately $200,000. It transports them in bulk to nearby Blythe, California, where they are sorted, inspected, packed, and shipped in containers that do not identify them as Arizona cantaloupes, but bear the name of their California packer. The appellant's order would forbid the company to pack its cantaloupes outside Arizona, not for the purpose of keeping the reputation of its growers unsullied, but to enhance their reputation through the reflected good will of the company's superior produce. The appellant, in other words, is not complaining because the company is putting the good name of Arizona on an inferior or deceptively packaged product, but because it is not putting that name on a product that is superior and well packaged.

Although it is not easy to see why the other growers of Arizona are entitled to benefit at the company's expense from the fact that it produces superior crops, we may assume that the asserted state interest is a legitimate one. But the State's tenuous interest in having the company's cantaloupes identified as originating in Arizona cannot constitutionally justify the requirement that the company build and operate an unneeded $200,000 packing plant in the State. The nature of that burden is, constitutionally, more significant than its extent. For the Court has viewed with particular suspicion state statutes requiring business operations to be performed in the home State that could more efficiently be performed elsewhere. Even where the State is pursuing a clearly legitimate local interest, this particular burden on commerce has been declared to be virtually per se illegal. Foster-Fountain Packing Co. v. Haydel, 278 U.S. 1; Johnson v. Haydel, 278 U.S. 16.

The appellant argues that the above cases are different because they involved statutes whose express or concealed purpose was to preserve or secure employment for the home State, while here the statute is a regulatory one and there is no hint of such a purpose. But in Toomer v. Witsell, supra, the Court indicated that such a burden upon interstate commerce is unconstitutional even in the absence of such a purpose. In Toomer the Court held invalid a South Carolina statute requiring that owners of shrimp boats licensed by the State to fish in the maritime belt off South Carolina must unload and pack their catch in that State before "shipping or transporting it to another State." What we said there applies to this case as well: "There was also uncontradicted evidence that appellants' costs would be materially increased by the necessity of having their shrimp unloaded and packed in South Carolina ports rather than at their home bases in Georgia where they maintain their own docking, warehousing, refrigeration and packing facilities. In addition, an inevitable concomitant of a statute requiring that work be done in South Carolina, even though that be economically disadvantageous to the fishermen, is to divert to South Carolina employment and business which might otherwise go to Georgia; the necessary tendency of the statute is to impose an artificial rigidity on the economic pattern of the industry." 334 U.S., at 403-404.

While the order issued under the Arizona statute does not impose such rigidity on an entire industry, it does impose just such a straitjacket on the appellee company with respect to the allocation of its interstate resources. Such an incidental consequence of a regulatory scheme could perhaps be tolerated if a more compelling state interest were involved. But here the State's interest is minimal at best – certainly less substantial than a State's interest in securing employment for its people. If the Commerce Clause forbids a State to require work to be done within its jurisdiction to promote local employment, then surely it cannot permit a State to require a person to go into a local packing business solely for the sake of enhancing the reputation of other producers within its borders.

The judgment is affirmed.
Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co.

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1977, the Minnesota Legislature enacted a statute banning the retail sale of milk in plastic nonreturnable, nonrefillable containers, but permitting such sale in other nonreturnable, nonrefillable containers, such as paperboard milk cartons. 1977 Minn. Laws, ch. 268, Minn. Stat. § 116F.21 (1978).

The purpose of the Minnesota statute is set out as § 1:

"The legislature finds that the use of nonreturnable, nonrefillable containers for the packaging of milk and other milk products presents a solid waste management problem for the state, promotes energy waste, and depletes natural resources. The legislature therefore, in furtherance of the policies stated in Minnesota Statutes, Section 116F.01, determines that the use of nonreturnable, nonrefillable containers for packaging milk and other milk products should be discouraged and that the use of returnable and reusable packaging for these products is preferred and should be encouraged." 1977 Minn. Laws, ch. 268, § 1, codified as Minn. Stat. § 116F.21 (1978).

Section 2 of the Act forbids the retail sale of milk and fluid milk products, other than sour cream, cottage cheese, and yogurt, in nonreturnable, nonrefillable rigid or semirigid containers composed at least 50% of plastic. Minnesota Stat. § 116F.01 (1978) provides in relevant part:

"Statement of policy. The legislature seeks to encourage both the reduction of the amount and type of material entering the solid waste stream and the reuse and recycling of materials. Solid waste represents discarded materials and energy resources, and it also represents an economic burden to the people of the state. The recycling of solid waste materials is one alternative for the conservation of material and energy resources, but it is also in the public interest to reduce the amount of materials requiring recycling or disposal."

When legislating in areas of legitimate local concern, such as environmental protection and resource conservation, States are nonetheless limited by the Commerce Clause. If a state law purporting to promote environmental purposes is in reality "simple economic protectionism," we have applied a "virtually per se rule of invalidity." Philadelphia v. New Jersey, 437 U.S. 617, 624 (1978). Even if a statute regulates "evenhandedly," and imposes only "incidental" burdens on interstate commerce, the courts must nevertheless strike it down if "the burden imposed on such commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits." Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142 (1970). Moreover, "the extent of the burden that will be tolerated will of course depend on the nature of the local interest involved, and on whether it could be promoted as well with a lesser impact on interstate activities." Ibid.
Minnesota’s statute does not effect "simple protectionism," but "regulates evenhandedly" by prohibiting all milk retailers from selling their products in plastic, nonreturnable milk containers, without regard to whether the milk, the containers, or the sellers are from outside the State. . . . [T]he controlling question is whether the incidental burden imposed on interstate commerce by the Minnesota Act is "clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits." Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., supra, at 142. We conclude that it is not.

The burden imposed on interstate commerce by the statute is relatively minor. Milk products may continue to move freely across the Minnesota border, and since most dairies package their products in more than one type of containers, the inconvenience of having to conform to different packaging requirements in Minnesota and the surrounding States should be slight. See Pacific States Box & Basket Co. v. White, 296 U.S. 176, 184 (1935). Within Minnesota, business will presumably shift from manufacturers of plastic nonreturnable containers to producers of paperboard cartons, refillable bottles, and plastic pouches, but there is no reason to suspect that the gainers will be Minnesota firms, or the losers out-of-state firms. Indeed, two of the three dairies, the sole milk retailer, and the sole milk container producer challenging the statute in this litigation are Minnesota firms.

Pulpwood producers are the only Minnesota industry likely to benefit significantly from the Act at the expense of out-of-state firms. . . . [P]lastic resin, the raw material used for making plastic nonreturnable milk jugs, is produced entirely by non-Minnesota firms, while pulpwood, used for making paperboard, is a major Minnesota product. . . . [I]t is clear that respondents exaggerate the degree of burden on out-of-state interests, both because plastics will continue to be used in the production of plastic pouches, plastic returnable bottles, and paperboard itself, and because out-of-state pulpwood producers will presumably absorb some of the business generated by the Act.

Even granting that the out-of-state plastics industry is burdened relatively more heavily than the Minnesota pulpwood industry, we find that this burden is not "clearly excessive" in light of the substantial state interest in promoting conservation of energy and other natural resources and easing solid waste disposal problems . . . . Moreover, we find that no approach with "a lesser impact on interstate activities," Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., supra, at 142, is available. Respondents have suggested several alternative statutory schemes, but these alternatives are either more burdensome on commerce than the Act (as, for example, banning all nonreturnables) or less likely to be effective (as, for example, providing incentives for recycling). See Brief for Respondents 32-33.

In Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117 (1978), we upheld a Maryland statute barring producers and refiners of petroleum products – all of which were out-of-state businesses – from retailing gasoline in the State. We stressed that the Commerce Clause "protects the interstate market, not particular interstate firms, from prohibitive or burdensome regulations." Id., at 127-128. A nondiscriminatory regulation serving substantial state purposes is not invalid simply because it causes some business to shift from a predominantly out-of-state industry to a predominantly in-state industry. Only if the burden on interstate commerce clearly outweighs the State's legitimate purposes does such a regulation violate the Commerce Clause.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.
JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

The Court's Commerce Clause analysis suffers from the same flaw as its equal protection analysis. The Court rejects the findings of the Minnesota trial court, not because they are clearly erroneous, but because the Court is of the view that the Minnesota courts are not authorized to exercise such a broad power of review over the Minnesota Legislature. After rejecting the trial court's findings, the Court goes on to find that any burden the Minnesota statute may impose upon interstate commerce is not excessive in light of the substantial state interests furthered by the statute. However, the Minnesota Supreme Court expressly found that the statute is not rationally related to the substantial state interests identified by the majority. Because I believe that the Court's intrusion upon the lawmaking process of the State of Minnesota is without constitutional sanction or precedential support it is clear to me that the findings of the Minnesota Supreme Court must be respected by this Court. Accordingly, the essential predicate for the majority's conclusion that the “local benefits [are] ample to support Minnesota's decision under the Commerce Clause,” is absent.

In Quill v. North Dakota, 504 U.S. 298 (1992), the Court reaffirmed the rule from National Bellas Hess, Inc. v. Department of Revenue of Illinois, 386 U.S. 753 (1967), that under dormant commerce clause analysis a state cannot require a retailer having no physical presence in that state to collect and remit sales taxes on the sales it makes. Quill thus gave a real competitive advantage to Internet sellers, who were in their infancy at the time. For example, Amazon started selling books in 1995. In Quill, Justices Scalia, Kennedy, and Thomas indicated they ruled in Quill based on precedent, while noting, as discussed below at § 13.4.1, that Congress could overturn National Bellas Hess by statute at any time. 504 U.S. 319-20. Justice White dissented from the holding. Id. at 321.

After Quill, states and lower federal courts struggled with the competitive advantage given by Quill. Cf. Brohl v. Direct Marketing Ass’n, 814 F.3d 1129 (10th Cir. 2016) (law requiring out-of-state retailers to report such sales to the state and notify their customers of their obligation to pay state sales tax, including an “annual purchase summary” if the customer bought more than $500 during the year, constitutional as not excessive burden under Pike v. Bruce Church). More recently, Justices called for the Court to reexamine Quill. See District Marketing Ass’n v. Brohl, 135 S. Ct. 1124, 1135 (2015) (Kennedy, J., concurring) (“The legal system should find an appropriate case for this Court to reexamine Quill . . .”). In 2018, the Supreme Court overruled Quill in South Dakota v. Wayfair, Inc., 138 S. Ct. 2080 (2018) (Roberts, C.J., joined by Breyer, Sotomayor & Kagan, JJ., dissenting based on following Quill as precedent without regard to the fairness of the doctrine). This decision now permits states to implement sales tax regimes for both in-state and out-of-state sales.

§ 13.4 Exceptions to Dormant Commerce Clause Doctrine: Congressional Acts and the Market Participant Exception

1. Congressional Authorization of State Action

Because dormant commerce clause review, like preemption, is based on implied congressional intent, Congress can use its Commerce Clause power to overturn any Court decision under the dormant commerce clause, either ratifying a state law that the Court struck down, or preempting a state law that the Court held valid. For example, under the McCarran-Ferguson Act of 1945, Congress has exempted from Dormant Commerce Clause review state regulation and taxing of the business of insurance.55 This is true even though one author has argued that the Court should view dormant commerce clause doctrine not as implied congressional intent, but as a categorical constitutional rule denying states ability to regulate, as under the Cooley approach that some things “are in their nature national.”56 As a separate exception, under Article I, § 10, cl. 3, with the consent of Congress, states can “enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State,” even one that might involve burdening interstate commerce. The 1996 Northeast Dairy Compact, which permits the 6 New England states power to regulate the price of milk, is a prime example.

2. The Market Participant Exception to Dormant Commerce Clause Review

Beginning in 1976, the Court has created an additional exception to dormant commerce clause review called the “market participation” exception. In 1976, in Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp.,57 the Court decided that there is no dormant commerce clause review at all if a state acts as a participant in the marketplace, rather than as a regulator or taxing authority. The analytic justification for this development was that a state should be treated equally as a business when the state is running a business. Since private businesses can choose to discriminate against interstate commerce in their choice of customers or choice of business partners, states should not be put to a competitive disadvantage in such an enterprise. The specific facts in Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap involved the state of Maryland paying bounties for every Maryland-titled junk car converted to scrap. Maryland used higher document requirements for out-of-state processors. Rejecting a dormant commerce clause challenge, Justice Powell wrote for the Court that the state's action, as a market participant, was not the kind of action with which the Clause is concerned.

The market participant theory was elaborated further in 1980 in Reeves, Inc. v. Stake,58 where the Court held that South Dakota could prefer South Dakota residents in the sale of cement from a state-owned cement plant. For a 5-4 Court, Justice Blackmun said that the framers did not intend to limit the ability of states to operate freely in the open market. Moreover, state proprietary activities often are regulated with the same restrictions imposed on private business. Justice Powell, dissenting, with Justices Brennan, White, and Stevens, said the market participant doctrine should be limited to procuring goods and services for government operations.

In White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers, Inc., Justice Rehnquist, writing for a 7-2 Court in 1983, upheld an order that all city construction projects should be performed by a work force consisting of at least one-half bona fide city residents. Rehnquist explained that the city was a market participant when spending its own funds because every one affected by the order was, in a sense, working for the city. Justices Blackmun and White agreed that Congress approved the favoritism but said that the city, in using its own money, went beyond Reeves to govern private economic relationships, a form of regulation.

The following year, an outer limit to the market participant doctrine was noted in South Central Timber Development, Inc. v. Wunnik, excerpted below. In this case, the Justices most skeptical of the market participant doctrine, Justices White, Brennan, Blackmun and Stevens (though not Justice Marshall who took no part in the decision of the case), joined in a plurality opinion, which concluded: (1) Congress did not implicitly authorize Alaska to require that timber taken from state lands and sold by the state be processed within the state prior to export; (2) in making such a rule Alaska was a regulator rather than a market participant; and (3) the Commerce Clause barred the local-processing requirement. Justices Rehnquist and O'Connor, dissenting, said Alaska was only doing indirectly what it could do directly, i.e., sell only processed logs.

In another case to comment on the market participant doctrine, the Court held in 1988 that an Ohio motor vehicle fuel sales tax, which gave a tax credit for the sale of ethanol produced in Ohio, was regulatory rather than proprietary government activity, even though the purpose and effect of the credit was to subsidize a local industry. Therefore, the market participant doctrine did not apply to protect the tax from Commerce Clause scrutiny. The Court has also had to consider whether to extend the market participant exception to other constitutional doctrines, such as the Article IV, § 2 Privileges and Immunities Clause, addressed at § 14.2, which the Court has declined to do. The Court has also never really considered that while private businesses have strong profit incentives not to engage in discrimination against interstate commerce, except in unusual circumstances, and thus court review of their activities is not particularly necessary, a state-run business entity does not have the same kind of profit incentive. Thus, a doctrine based on the equivalence of state-run and private businesses may be a doctrine not based on adequate empirical premises.

More recently, the market participant exception was held to apply where a state contracted with a private bridge company to build new ramps and roads to access a bridge in the state. The market participant exception was also held to apply to a case involving dormant commerce clause doctrine applied to foreign commerce.

South-Central Timber Development v. Wunnike
467 U.S. 82 (1984)

Justice WHITE announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I and II, and an opinion with respect to Parts III and IV, in which Justice BRENNAN, Justice BLACKMUN, and Justice STEVENS joined.

In September 1980, the Alaska Department of Natural Resources published a notice that it would sell approximately 49 million board-feet of timber in the area of Icy Cape, Alaska, on October 23, 1980. The notice of sale, the prospectus, and the proposed contract for the sale all provided, pursuant to 11 Alaska Admin. Code § 76.130 (1974), that "[primary] manufacture within the State of Alaska will be required as a special provision of the contract." App. 35a. Under the primary-manufacture requirement, the successful bidder must partially process the timber prior to shipping it outside of the State. The requirement is imposed by contract and does not limit the export of unprocessed timber not owned by the State. The stated purpose of the requirement is to "protect existing industries, provide for the establishment of new industries, derive revenue from all timber resources, and manage the State's forests on a sustained yield basis." Governor's Policy Statement, App. 28a. When it imposes the requirement, the State charges a significantly lower price for the timber than it otherwise would. Brief for Respondents 6-7.

The major method of complying with the primary-manufacture requirement is to convert the logs into cants, which are logs slabbed on at least one side. In order to satisfy the Alaska requirement, cants must be either sawed to a maximum thickness of 12 inches or squared on four sides along their entire length.

66 Antilles Cement Corp. v. Fortuno, 670 F.3d 310 (1st Cir. 2012) (protectionist Puerto Rican law that favors Puerto Rican construction materials for Commonwealth-operated or-funded projects permissible because Puerto Rico is acting as a market participant). But see American Trucking Ass'ns Inc. v. City of Los Angeles, 133 S. Ct. 2096 (2013) (mandatory concession agreement with truckers required by the Port of Los Angeles is a regulatory measure, not the City acting as a market participant, and thus is preempted by federal law).
Petitioner, South-Central Timber Development, Inc., is an Alaska corporation engaged in the business of purchasing standing timber, logging the timber, and shipping the logs into foreign commerce, almost exclusively to Japan. It does not operate a mill in Alaska and customarily sells unprocessed logs. When it learned that the primary-manufacture requirement was to be imposed on the Icy Cape sale, it brought an action in Federal District Court seeking an injunction, arguing that the requirement violated the negative implications of the Commerce Clause.

Although the Commerce Clause is by its text an affirmative grant of power to Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, the Clause has long been recognized as a self-executing limitation on the power of the States to enact laws imposing substantial burdens on such commerce. It is equally clear that Congress may "redefine the distribution of power over interstate commerce" by "[permitting] the states to regulate the commerce in a manner which would otherwise not be permissible." Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 325 U.S. 761, 769 (1945). See also Sporhase v. Nebraska ex rel. Douglas, 458 U.S. 941, 958-960 (1982). The Court of Appeals held that Congress had done just that by consistently endorsing primary-manufacture requirements on timber taken from federal land. 693 F.2d, at 893. Although the court recognized that cases of this Court have spoken in terms of express approval by Congress, it stated: "But such express authorization is not always necessary. There will be instances, like the case before us, where federal policy is so clearly delineated that a state may enact a parallel policy without explicit congressional approval, even if the purpose and effect of the state law is to favor local interests." Ibid.

We agree that federal policy with respect to federal land is "clearly delineated," but the Court of Appeals was incorrect in concluding either that there is a clearly delineated federal policy approving Alaska's local-processing requirement or that Alaska's policy with respect to its timber lands is authorized by the existence of a "parallel" federal policy with respect to federal lands.

Since 1928, the Secretary of Agriculture has restricted the export of unprocessed timber cut from National Forest lands in Alaska. The current regulation, upon which the State places heavy reliance, provides: "Unprocessed timber from National Forest System lands in Alaska may not be exported from the United States or shipped to other States without prior approval of the Regional Forester. This requirement is necessary to ensure the development and continued existence of adequate wood processing capacity in that State for the sustained utilization of timber from the National Forests which are geographically isolated from other processing facilities." 36 CFR § 223.10(c) (1983).

From 1969 to 1973, Congress imposed a maximum export limitation of 350 million board-feet of unprocessed timber from federal lands lying west of the 100th meridian (a line running from central North Dakota through central Texas). 16 U.S.C. § 617(a). Beginning in 1973, Congress imposed, by way of a series of annual riders to appropriation Acts, a complete ban on foreign exports of unprocessed logs from western lands except those within Alaska. See, e.g., Pub. L. 96-126, Tit. III, § 301, 93 Stat. 979. These riders limit only foreign exports and do not require in-state processing before the timber may be sold in domestic interstate commerce. The export limitation with respect to federal land in Alaska, rather than being imposed by statute, was imposed by the above-quoted regulation, and applies to exports to other States, as well as to foreign exports.
Alaska argues that federal statutes and regulations demonstrate an affirmative expression of approval of its primary-manufacture requirement for three reasons: (1) federal timber export policy has, since 1928, treated federal timber land in Alaska differently from that in other States; (2) the Federal Government has specifically tailored its policies to ensure development of wood-processing capacity for utilization of timber from the National Forests; and (3) the regulation forbidding without prior approval the export from Alaska of unprocessed timber or its shipment to other States demonstrates that it is the Alaska wood-processing industry in particular, not the domestic wood-processing industry generally, that has been the object of federal concern.

Acceptance of Alaska’s three factual propositions does not mandate acceptance of its conclusion. Neither South-Central nor the United States challenges the existence of a federal policy to restrict the out-of-state shipment of unprocessed Alaska timber from federal lands. They challenge only the derivation from that policy of an affirmative expression of federal approval of a parallel policy with respect to state timber. They argue that our cases dealing with congressional authorization of otherwise impermissible state interference with interstate commerce have required an "express" statement of such authorization, and that no such authorization may be implied.

It is true that most of our cases have looked for an express statement of congressional policy prior to finding that state regulation is permissible. For example, in Sporhase v. Nebraska ex rel. Douglas, supra, the Court declined to find congressional authorization for state-imposed burdens on interstate commerce in ground water despite 37 federal statutes and a number of interstate compacts that demonstrated Congress' deference to state water law. We noted that on those occasions in which consent has been found, congressional intent and policy to insulate state legislation from Commerce Clause attack have been "expressly stated." 458 U.S., at 960. Similarly, in New England Power Co. v. New Hampshire, 455 U.S. 331 (1982), we rejected a claim by the State of New Hampshire that its restriction on the interstate flow of privately owned and produced electricity was authorized by § 201(b) of the Federal Power Act. That section provides that the Act "shall not . . . deprive a State or State commission of its lawful authority now exercised over the exportation of hydroelectric energy which is transmitted across a State line." 16 U.S.C. § 824(b). We found nothing in the statute or legislative history "[evincing] a congressional intent 'to alter the limits of state power otherwise imposed by the Commerce Clause.'" 455 U.S., at 341 (quoting United States v. Public Utilities Comm'n of California, 345 U.S. 295, 304 (1953)).

The fact that the state policy in this case appears to be consistent with federal policy – or even that state policy furthers the goals we might believe that Congress had in mind – is an insufficient indicium of congressional intent. Congress acted only with respect to federal lands; we cannot infer from that fact that it intended to authorize a similar policy with respect to state lands. Accordingly, we reverse the contrary judgment of the Court of Appeals.

We now turn to the issues left unresolved by the Court of Appeals. The first of these issues is whether Alaska's restrictions on export of unprocessed timber from state-owned lands are exempt from Commerce Clause scrutiny under the "market-participant doctrine."
Our cases make clear that if a State is acting as a market participant, rather than as a market regulator, the dormant Commerce Clause places no limitation on its activities. See White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers, Inc., 460 U.S., at 206-208 [1984]; Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429, 436-437 (1980); Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794, 810 (1976). The precise contours of the market-participant doctrine have yet to be established, however, the doctrine having been applied in only [these] three cases of this Court to date.

The State of Alaska contends that its primary-manufacture requirement fits squarely within the market-participant doctrine, arguing that "Alaska's entry into the market may be viewed as precisely the same type of subsidy to local interests that the Court found unobjectionable in Alexandria Scrap." Brief for Respondents 24. However, when Maryland became involved in the scrap market it was as a purchaser of scrap; Alaska, on the other hand, participates in the timber market, but imposes conditions downstream in the timber-processing market. Alaska is not merely subsidizing local timber processing in an amount "roughly equal to the difference between the price the timber would fetch in the absence of such a requirement and the amount the state actually receives." Ibid. If the State directly subsidized the timber-processing industry by such an amount, the purchaser would retain the option of taking advantage of the subsidy by processing timber in the State or forgoing the benefits of the subsidy and exporting unprocessed timber. Under the Alaska requirement, however, the choice is made for him.

The State also would have us find Reeves controlling. It states that "Reeves made it clear that the Commerce Clause imposes no limitation on Alaska's power to choose the terms on which it will sell its timber." Brief for Respondents 25. Such an unrestrained reading of Reeves is unwarranted. Although the Court in Reeves did strongly endorse the right of a State to deal with whomever it chooses when it participates in the market, it did not – and did not purport to – sanction the imposition of any terms that the State might desire. For example, the Court expressly noted in Reeves that "Commerce Clause scrutiny may well be more rigorous when a restraint on foreign commerce is alleged," 447 U.S., at 438, n. 9; that a natural resource "like coal, timber, wild game, or minerals," was not involved, but instead the cement was "the end product of a complex process whereby a costly physical plant and human labor act on raw materials," id., at 443-444; and that South Dakota did not bar resale of South Dakota cement to out-of-state purchasers, id., at 444, n.17. In this case, all three of the elements that were not present in Reeves – foreign commerce, a natural resource, and restrictions on resale – are present.

Finally, Alaska argues that since the Court in White upheld a requirement that reached beyond "the boundary of formal privity of contract," 460 U.S., at 211, n.7, then, a fortiori, the primary-manufacture requirement is permissible, because the State is not regulating contracts for resale of timber or regulating the buying and selling of timber, but is instead "a seller of timber, pure and simple." Brief for Respondents 28. Yet it is clear that the State is more than merely a seller of timber. In the commercial context, the seller usually has no say over, and no interest in, how the product is to be used after sale; in this case, however, payment for the timber does not end the obligations of the purchaser, for, despite the fact that the purchaser has taken delivery of the timber and has paid for it, he cannot do with it as he pleases. Instead, he is obligated to deal with a stranger to the contract after completion of the sale.
That privity of contract is not always the outer boundary of permissible state activity does not necessarily mean that the Commerce Clause has no application within the boundary of formal privity. The market-participant doctrine permits a State to influence "a discrete, identifiable class of economic activity in which [it] is a major participant." White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Workers, Inc., 460 U.S., at 211, n.7. Contrary to the State's contention, the doctrine is not carte blanche to impose any conditions that the State has the economic power to dictate, and does not validate any requirement merely because the State imposes it upon someone with whom it is in contractual privity. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 35.

At the heart of the dispute in this case is disagreement over the definition of the market. Alaska contends that it is participating in the processed timber market, although it acknowledges that it participates in no way in the actual processing. Id., at 34. South-Central argues, on the other hand, that although the State may be a participant in the timber market, it is using its leverage in that market to exert a regulatory effect in the processing market, in which it is not a participant. We agree with the latter position.

There are sound reasons for distinguishing between a State's preferring its own residents in the initial disposition of goods when it is a market participant and a State's attachment of restrictions on dispositions subsequent to the goods coming to rest in private hands. First, simply as a matter of intuition a state market participant has a greater interest as a "private trader" in the immediate transaction than it has in what its purchaser does with the goods after the State no longer has an interest in them. The common law recognized such a notion in the doctrine of restraints on alienation. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 404 (1911); but cf. Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 53, n.21 (1977). Similarly, the antitrust laws place limits on vertical restraints. It is no defense in an action charging vertical trade restraints that the same end could be achieved through vertical integration; if it were, there would be virtually no antitrust scrutiny of vertical arrangements. We reject the contention that a State's action as a market regulator may be upheld against Commerce Clause challenge on the ground that the State could achieve the same end as a market participant. We therefore find it unimportant for present purposes that the State could support its processing industry by selling only to Alaska processors, by vertical integration, or by direct subsidy. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 34, 37, 45.

Second, downstream restrictions have a greater regulatory effect than do limitations on the immediate transaction. Instead of merely choosing its own trading partners, the State is attempting to govern the private, separate economic relationships of its trading partners; that is, it restricts the post-purchase activity of the purchaser, rather than merely the purchasing activity. In contrast to the situation in White, this restriction on private economic activity takes place after the completion of the parties' direct commercial obligations, rather than during the course of an ongoing commercial relationship in which the city retained a continuing proprietary interest in the subject of the contract.

Finally, the State argues that even if we find that Congress did not authorize the processing restriction, and even if we conclude that its actions do not qualify for the market-participant exception, the restriction does not substantially burden interstate or foreign commerce under ordinary Commerce Clause principles. We need not labor long over that contention.
Viewed as a naked restraint on export of unprocessed logs, there is little question that the processing requirement cannot survive scrutiny under the precedents of the Court. For example, in Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137 (1970), we invalidated a requirement of the State of Arizona that all Arizona cantaloupes be packed within the State. The Court noted that the State's purpose was "to protect and enhance the reputation of growers within the State," a purpose we described as "surely legitimate." Id., at 143. We observed: "[The] Court has viewed with particular suspicion state statutes requiring business operations to be performed in the home State that could more efficiently be performed elsewhere. Even where the State is pursuing a clearly legitimate local interest, this particular burden on commerce has been declared to be virtually per se illegal. Id., at 145.

We held that if the Commerce Clause forbids a State to require work to be done within the State for the purpose of promoting employment, then, a fortiori, it forbids a State to impose such a requirement to enhance the reputation of its producers. Because of the protectionist nature of Alaska's local-processing requirement and the burden on commerce resulting therefrom, we conclude that it falls within the rule of virtual per se invalidity of laws that "[block] the flow of interstate commerce at a State's borders." City of Philadelphia v. New Jersey, 437 U.S. 617, 624 (1978).

We are buttressed in our conclusion that the restriction is invalid by the fact that foreign commerce is burdened by the restriction. It is a well-accepted rule that state restrictions burdening foreign commerce are subjected to a more rigorous and searching scrutiny. It is crucial to the efficient execution of the Nation's foreign policy that "the Federal Government . . . speak with one voice when regulating commercial relations with foreign governments. " Michelin Tire Corp. v. Wages, 423 U.S. 276, 285 (1976). In light of the substantial attention given by Congress to the subject of export restrictions on unprocessed timber, it would be peculiarly inappropriate to permit state regulation of the subject. See Prohibit Export of Unprocessed Timber: Hearing on H.R. 639 before the Subcommittee on Forests, Family Farms, and Energy of the House Committee on Agriculture, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981).

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for proceedings consistent with the opinion of this Court.

Justice MARSHALL took no part in the decision of this case.

Justice BRENNAN, concurring.

I join Justice White's opinion in full because I believe Alaska's in-state processing requirement constitutes market regulation that is not authorized by Congress. In my view, Justice White's treatment of the market-participant doctrine and the response of Justice Rehnquist point up the inherent weakness of the doctrine. See Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794, 817 (1976) (Brennan, J., dissenting).
Justice POWELL, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join Parts I and II of Justice White's opinion [on congressional authorization]. I would remand the case to the Court of Appeals to allow that court to consider whether Alaska was acting as a "market participant" and whether Alaska's primary-manufacture requirement substantially burdened interstate commerce under the holding of Pike v. Bruce Church, 397 U.S. 137 (1970).

Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, dissenting.

In my view, the line of distinction drawn in the plurality opinion between the State as market participant and the State as market regulator is both artificial and unconvincing. The plurality draws this line "simply as a matter of intuition," but then seeks to bolster its intuition through a series of remarks more appropriate to antitrust law than to the Commerce Clause. For example, the plurality complains that the State is using its "leverage" in the timber market to distort consumer choice in the timber-processing market, ibid., a classic example of a tying arrangement. See, e.g., United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc., 429 U.S. 610, 619-621 (1977). And the plurality cites the common-law doctrine of restraints on alienation and the antitrust limits on vertical restraints in dismissing the State's claim that it could accomplish exactly the same result in other ways.

Perhaps the State's actions do raise antitrust problems. But what the plurality overlooks is that the antitrust laws apply to a State only when it is acting as a market participant. See, e.g., Jefferson County Pharmaceutical Assn., Inc. v. Abbott Laboratories, 460 U.S. 150, 154 (1983) (state action immunity "does not apply where a State has chosen to compete in the private retail market"). When the State acts as a market regulator, it is immune from antitrust scrutiny. See Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 350-352 (1943). Of course, the line of distinction in cases under the Commerce Clause need not necessarily parallel the line drawn in antitrust law. But the plurality can hardly justify placing Alaska in the market-regulator category, in this Commerce Clause case, by relying on antitrust cases that are relevant only if the State is a market participant.

The contractual term at issue here no more transforms Alaska's sale of timber into "regulation" of the processing industry than the resident-hiring preference imposed by the city of Boston in White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers, Inc., 460 U.S. 204 (1983), constituted regulation of the construction industry. Alaska is merely paying the buyer of the timber indirectly, by means of a reduced price, to hire Alaska residents to process the timber. Under existing precedent, the State could accomplish that same result in any number of ways. For example, the State could choose to sell its timber only to those companies that maintain active primary-processing plants in Alaska. Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429 (1980). Or the State could directly subsidize the primary-processing industry within the State. Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794 (1976). The State could even pay to have the logs processed and then enter the market only to sell processed logs. It seems to me unduly formalistic to conclude that the one path chosen by the State as best suited to promote its concerns is the path forbidden it by the Commerce Clause.

For these reasons, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

§ 14.1 Introduction to Constitutional Limits on State Power ................................................. 615

§ 14.2 Article IV, § 2 Privileges and Immunities Clause Doctrine ............................. 625

§ 14.3 Incorporation of the Bill of Rights Made Applicable to the States .......... 636

§ 14.4 Federal Common Law and Other Related Limits on State Power ............ 645

§ 14.1 Introduction to Constitutional Limits on State Power

A range of limitations on state power appear in the Constitution. These appear principally in two places in the Constitution, Article I, § 10, addressed at § 14.1.1, and Article IV, principally addressed at § 14.1.2. The Article IV, § 2 Privileges and Immunities Clause is addressed at § 14.2. The Civil War Amendments (13th -15th), which also limit state power, are addressed at § 14.3. Federal common law and other related limitations on state power are addressed at § 14.4

1. Article I, § 10 Limitations on State Power

Article I, § 10 of the Constitutions contains three clauses providing for specific textual limitations on state power. These clauses tend to be clear in their meaning, and thus have not provided the source for many cases. These three provisions provide:

(1) No state shall enter into any treaty or alliance; coin money; pass any bill of attainder, addressed at § 16.2.2, or ex post facto law, addressed at § 16.2.3, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, addressed at §§ 18.1-18.2; or grant any title of nobility;

(2) No state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay duties on imports or exports, except what is absolutely necessary for inspection laws, and the net profit from any duties shall be held for the federal treasury; and

(3) No state shall, without the consent of Congress, keep troops or ships in time of peace; enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power; or engage in war unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

2. Article IV Limitations on State Power

Article IV of the Constitution has a number of provisions dealing with Admittance of New States, State Power over Property, the Guarantee Clause, Full Faith and Credit Clause, Extradition Clause, and Fugitive Slave Clause. The Privileges and Immunities Clause of Art. IV, § 2, cl.1 is addressed at § 14.2.
A. Admittance of New States

Under Article IV, § 3, cl. 1, “New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.” The Court has never interpreted this clause, and given its text and subject-matter, any issues raised by it would probably be viewed as political questions. This would be particularly true for the first clause dealing with admission of new states into the Union by Congress, which seems a clear textually demonstrable constitutional commitment to Congress under Baker v. Carr, discussed at § 4.3.1(D) n.49.

Nevertheless, as a matter of literal textual analysis, two main issues are raised by the second and third clauses. The first issue is whether any state can be formed within the jurisdiction of any existing state with the appropriate consent given, or whether the consent clause, at the end, only applies to forming states from junctions of two or more states, or parts of states. Normal textual analysis would say the consent clause only modifies the last enumerated power under both the last antecedent maxim of grammatical construction, and the use of semi-colons, which separates the rule banning new states from being formed within the jurisdiction of any state from new states from being formed by junction of two or more states. Under this interpretation, no new state could ever be formed from parts of one existing state only. This would make the states of West Virginia, Kentucky, Maine, and possibly Vermont, all unconstitutional. As has been noted:

This is perhaps not (quite) as crazy as it seems, if one considers the Philadelphia Convention’s obsession with the rule of equal state representation in the Senate and the care the Framers took to build anti-circumvention rules into the Constitution to preserve this crucial compromise. If big States could somehow convince Congress to assent, couldn't they deal themselves more senators simply by dividing up into smaller States? (Imagine Utah today, divided into four, multiplying conservative Republican senators!)

But is Article IV, Section 3 really a reflection of such constitutional paranoia? And could Utah and Nevada not conspire to circumvent such an anticircumvention rule anyway, simply by conjoining pieces of their States to each other? For that matter, couldn't Pennsylvania lend an acre or two to West Virginia, in order to circumvent such a strict formal requirement? Or is the fact that an anti-circumvention rule is not conspiracy-proof of little probative value?

A similar problem exists with respect to the congressional joint resolution admitting Texas to the Union. In that provision, Congress authorized the Texas legislature to divide the state into as many as five states by creating four new states within its limits. As part of political maneuvering to curry

favor with voters in Southern slaveholding states, both Democrats and Whigs supported a resolution which provided, "New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the federal constitution."\(^3\)

Under this resolution, each new state would be automatically admitted into the Union, with no additional congressional action required. One author has noted: “Imagine that – five Texases! Eight additional senators and electoral votes. Four more stars on the flag. And all if the Texas legislature gets the itch to do so. But, would this be constitutional? It seems just plain weird for a state to spontaneously divide, as if it were a political amoeba. While weirdness is not a constitutional standard, it should at least cause us to ask questions.”\(^4\)

Of course, this question is not ripe for judicial review, as the Texas legislature has never come close to dividing the state, and it is not under active consideration. Under non-formalist models of constitutional interpretation, considerations of legislative and executive practice, judicial precedents assuming the constitutionality of West Virginia, Kentucky, Maine, and Vermont, and prudential considerations would likely conclude that those states are constitutional, but that any power Texas had to divide into more than one state, if it ever existed, has long since passed. From a formalist model, however, with its “static” concept of interpretation and great focus on literal text, verbal maxims of construction, and specific historical intent, and eschewing such later events as reflecting an “evolving” Constitution, those other states may be unconstitutional, and Texas might still have the power to divide. Of course, even a formalist judge might nonetheless conclude that the issues surrounding these matters are “settled law,” that doctrine discussed at § 2.4.6 n.79, or “political questions” not appropriate for Court review, that doctrine addressed at § 4.3.

The second issue raised by this clause would be that even if a state like West Virginia could be formed within the jurisdiction of Virginia alone, was actual “consent” properly given under the consent clause. As has been noted:

> In the summer of 1861, following the outbreak of the Civil War, thirty-five counties of Virginia west of the Shenandoah Valley and north of the Kanawha River met in convention in the town of Wheeling, to consider seceding from secessionist Virginia. In short order, the Wheeling convention declared itself the official, lawful, loyal government of Virginia and organized a proposed new State of (what would come to be called) West Virginia. Then, in what must certainly rank as one of the great constitutional legal fictions of all time, the legislature of Virginia (at Wheeling) and the proposed government of the new State of West Virginia (at Wheeling), with the approval of Congress, agreed to the creation of a new State of West Virginia (at Wheeling), thereby purporting to satisfy the requirements of Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution for admission of new States "formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State."5

Of course, this issue of consent, if ever presented, might well be viewed as a political question for Congress to resolve. One could argue that addition of new states to the Union is similar to addition of amendments to the Constitution, and that ratification of amendments are typically viewed as political questions, addressed at § 4.3.1(B)-(C), including ratification of the 14th Amendment, which raised similar concerns of whether meaningful consent was given, addressed at § 16.4.2 nn.42-43.

B. State Power over Property

Under Article IV, § 3, cl. 2, Congress is given the power to “dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.” As discussed at § 2.1.4 nn.21-28, state versus state cases are brought as a matter of original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court. Typically, the Court will refer the case to a special master, who will receive evidence and prepare a record, rather than the Court hearing the evidence itself. The Court's original jurisdiction has brought a variety of disputes between sovereign states within its reach, such as disputes over water apportionment and interstate commercial burdens, including controversies regarding the control of water rights and the diversion of state waters; burdensome commercial activities and restrictions imposed by another state or to collect sizable estate taxes, as when California and Texas battled over the right to tax Howard Hughes' estate; which state has the right to profits from unclaimed securities belonging to unidentified holders; and the apportionment of Civil War-era state debt following West Virginia's secession from the Commonwealth of Virginia to join Union forces.6

States can also be sued by the federal government in appropriate cases. For example, in United States v. Louisiana,7 the United States sued Louisiana for a declaration that the United States was entitled to exclusive possession of and power over lands underlying the Gulf of Mexico more than three geographical miles from the coast, with cross motions for entry of judgment in favor of Louisiana. The Court concluded that the part of Louisiana's coastline which, under the Submerged Lands Act, consisted of the “line marking seaward limit of inland waters” was to be drawn in accordance with the Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, and a Special Master was appointed to make a determination of submerged lands owned by Louisiana in Gulf of Mexico.

C. The Guarantee Clause

The Guarantee Clause in the Constitution, Article IV, § 4, provides, “The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.” As discussed at § 4.3.1(A)-(D), the Court has usually held that questions under the Guarantee Clause regarding federal obligations are political questions not appropriate for Court review. As a corollary to the Guarantee Clause, however, the Court has noted that the Guarantee Clause assumes that each state enters the union with a republican form of government.8

Compliance with this duty falls principally to the officials who act for the state, including its governor, attorney general, and secretary of state, but can also involve the views of state judges. A number of these cases have involved whether provisions allowing citizens directly to vote for state initiatives or referendums violate the concept of a republican form of government. One author has noted: “Many states have in fact established and increasingly use citizen ‘initiatives’ whereby the People at large directly pass laws or even amend their constitutions, rather than rely exclusively on their elected representatives. On its face, the citizen initiative seems to embody democracy in action. But even as this popular method of lawmaking spreads, so does opposition to it. A chorus of legal scholars assails direct democracy, citing two primary (related) concerns: (i) that it will tyrannize minorities, and (ii) that it will produce short-sighted, selfish legislation rather than public-spirited deliberation.”9 In cases where courts have considered the issue, such referendums have not been held to violate the requirement of a republican form of government. A particularly influential case so holding is the Oregon Supreme Court’s decision in Kadderly v. City of Portland.10 As has been noted, “Other courts quickly cited Kadderly as the answer to attacks on direct legislation in their states. The California Supreme Court cited it in 1906 to observe that the federal Guarantee Clause did not necessarily confine initiatives to local uses. The Oklahoma and Kansas courts relied on Kadderly's holding that the initiative and referendum do not conflict with the Guarantee Clause.”11

Other concerns regarding a republican form of government are unrelated to initiatives. They may involve issues of separation of powers. Former Chief Justice of the Oregon Supreme Court, Hans Linde, has noted:

8 Minor v. Happersatt, 88 U.S. 162, 175-78 (1874). As noted at § 4.3.2 n.38, while older cases used the term “Guaranty Clause,” the more recent term is “Guarantee Clause.”

10 74 P. 710 (Or. 1903), reh'g denied, 75 P. 222 (Or. 1904).

Thirty years ago, Kansas amended its constitution to reorganize executive departments subject only to legislative disapproval rather than prior authorization. The Kansas Supreme Court called squaring this change with the Guarantee Clause "the decisive question in the case," and it sustained the amendment after a lengthy review of James Madison's writings on the tests of republican government.

About the same time, the Wisconsin Supreme Court decided that republican government does not require a strict separation of executive and judicial powers. The same conclusion was announced in Colorado and in Rhode Island. In a 1991 opinion, Oklahoma's justices overcame their concern with republican government and allowed a constitutional proposal to refer all future revenue bills to the voters. These and other modern opinions faced and disposed of the issue on the merits.12

D. The Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, § 1 of the United States Constitution provides, "Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof." In 1790, Congress enacted the first version of the full faith and credit statute. That statute provided:

That the acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto: That the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state, shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form. And the said records and judicial proceedings authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records are or shall be taken.13

12 Id. at 953 (citations omitted). In a recent case, the issue arose whether the Massachusetts Supreme Court granting gays and lesbians the right to marry under the Equal Protection Clause of the Massachusetts Constitution usurped “legislative prerogatives” to such an extent to deprive Massachusetts of a Republican form of Government under the Guarantee Clause. Not surprisingly, such a challenge failed. In so holding, the First Circuit Court of Appeals noted that the Guarantee Clause “does not require a particular allocation of power within each state so long as a republican form of government is preserved.” Since provisions exist in Massachusetts for the legislature and voters to amend the Constitution if they so wish, no Guarantee Clause issue was seriously presented. Largess v. Supreme Judicial Court for State of Massachusetts, 373 F.3d 219, 226-29 (1st Cir. 2004).

13 Act of May 26, 1790, ch. 11, 1 Stat. 122 (1790).
Predominantly, this statute provided how state statutes and judicial records and proceedings are to be authenticated so that they may be admitted into evidence in other states, but did not literally require the effect that those proceedings would be given res judicata or collateral estoppel effect. Based on the natural law focus on purpose, as well as literal text, the Supreme Court soon held that res judicata and collateral estoppel were part of Congress’ intent in 1790. Speaking for the Court in Mills v. Duryee, Justice Story noted, “It is argued that this act provides only for the admission of such records as evidence, but does not declare the effect of such evidence when admitted. This argument cannot be supported. The act declares that the record duly authenticated shall have such faith and credit as it has in the state Court from whence it is taken. If in such Court it has the faith and credit of evidence of the highest nature, viz. record evidence, it must have the same faith and credit in every other Court. Congress have therefore declared the effect of the record by declaring what faith and credit shall be given to it.”

In 1948, Congress amended the full faith and credit statute, which now provides, at 28 U.S.C. § 1738, that "judicial proceedings . . . shall have the same full faith and credit in every court within the United States and its Territories and Possessions as they have by law or usage in the courts of such State." This statute has been held to encompass the doctrines of res judicata, or "claim preclusion," and collateral estoppel, or "issue preclusion." Under this doctrine, there still is an important difference between a formal judgment and giving “faith and credit” to one state’s laws that may differ from another state. The Court stated in Franchise Tax Board of California v. Hyatt:

As we have explained, "[o]ur precedent differentiates the credit owed to laws (legislative measures and common law) and to judgments." Whereas the full faith and credit command "is exacting" with respect to "[a] final judgment . . . rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment," it is less demanding with respect to choice of laws. We have held that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not compel "a state to substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes dealing with a subject matter concerning which it is competent to legislate."

Perhaps the greatest area of contemporary concern under the Full Faith and Credit clause involves issues of marriage and divorce, in particular whether gay marriages or civil unions performed in those states permitting such arrangements must be given full faith and credit in other states. Historically, the divorce cases have been treated differently than the marriage cases, since divorce judgments, including property and custody decisions, are judgments of the court entitled to greater weight under the Full Faith and Credit Clause than marriage ceremonies. It has been noted:

The most common situation in which a divorce court faces the fact that the law of a state other than the forum is . . . eligible to have its law applied is where one spouse has left the marital
